We will assume that the attention of the inquirer has been arrested, possibly by hearing a lecture, and that a desire exists to pursue the subject further. The first question that will present itself will probably be, What is Spiritualism? To this we may answer that the fundamental principle of modern Spiritualism is that there is a possibility of communion between this world and the unseen world of spirit, whereby through the medium of certain abnormal phenomena as yet little understood, evidence of a life to come is afforded. This statement will, no doubt, at once fully arouse the curiosity of the inquirer, and in reply to the next query which will, without fail, spring to his lips, viz., How can I satisfy myself of this? we would counsel all who wish to investigate the matter, to read a few of the standard books on the subject, which have been published, before attempting to get practical demonstration of the facts. The time so occupied will be well spent, and will save the new beginner from stumbling into many a pitfall. The Central Association of Spiritualists, 38, Great Russell-street, W.C., has the finest library of such works in the world, and inquirers cannot do better than communicate personally or by letter with the resident secretary, Mr. T. Blyton, who will, we are sure, most willingly give all who seek information any assistance in his power. Persons presenting a satisfactory reference can have the use of the circulating library upon the payment of a nominal monthly fee for two or three months, it being understood that at the expiration of that period they will affiliate themselves more closely with the Association if they desire to continue their researches. No publicity whatever is given to the names of those who attend the rooms of the Association or use its library.

The inquirer having, to some extent, grounded himself in the general principles, and got, as it were, a bird's-eye view of the rise, progress, and aims of modern Spiritualism, and become acquainted with a broad outline of the different phases of the phenomena which he may expect to see, and also learnt the views of the many eminent men who have satisfied themselves of the reality of the phenomena, will then probably be in a better position to understand the facts when he receives palpable demonstration of their existence through the aid of the physical senses, than if he had been thrust without previous preparation into the midst of phenomena, strange in themselves, and the import of which he would not in the least understand. At this stage we should recommend the formation of home experimental circles, proper directions for which will be found on page 224; or if the inquirer is, through circumstances, unable to follow this course, he may be able to obtain personal conviction through the use of the Planchette or Psychograph. Many who were unable to form circles for investigation have been convinced in this way. The Psychograph is a small, heart-shaped piece of wood, mounted on legs or castors at the widest part, while at the point is a hole for a pencil to be inserted. The hands are then placed on the top of the little instrument, which, if the inquirer is himself a sensitive, will, after a time, commence to move. An hour a-day should be devoted to the trial for, say a month, at the end of which period, if no indications of external power are perceptible, the investigator would have reasonable ground for supposing that he was not a psychic, or rather that he was not possessed of sufficient power as a sensitive to make it of any practical value for strictly personal and private investigation. Failure to obtain results in the time mentioned could not, however, be taken as absolute evidence that the power did not exist. With a protracted trial it is not improbable that success would attend the efforts of the inquirer. In the event of the trial being made with the Planchette, a considerable amount of weariness may be avoided if the inquirer peruses a book or paper while he is sitting with his hand (right or left as preferred) on the little instrument in question. Such a course, too, is useful in producing a frame of mind somewhat favourable to success, viz., an attitude of unexpectancy. In many instances the Psychograph will after a time begin to move across the paper, tracing at first lines and strokes with no apparent meaning in them. Do not trouble about that—the meaning of it all will appear in good time. Do not interrupt until fluency of motion is attained, when the power moving the instrument may be questioned. Often directions will then be given how best to facilitate the manifestations; also messages on personal and other topics. Address the "power," or "force," or "intelligence"—whatever you may prefer to call it—in the same way as you would any stranger you met, listening courteously, but keeping your eyes and ears open. Above all, use your reason. Never for one moment surrender it.

If, however, the inquirer can induce one or two friends to join him the chances of success are increased in proportion. The plan suggested for "table movements" and "rappings" could then be tried. It is impossible to say what number is best for a circle. Sometimes two or three would obtain better results than seven or eight; it is a matter of experiment, and a great deal depends upon those forming the circle. As a rule, however, eight or nine is a very good number, although the party may be limited to three or four or five persons with good effect.

Such are a few hints that it occurs to us may be useful to investigators. The "Testimony of Eminent Persons" and the "Rules for forming Circles" given on page 224 should be attentively read. If, however, any difficulty arises we shall be very happy to answer inquirers either privately or through these columns if communications are accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication but as a guarantee of good faith.

We append a list of a few books that will prove useful to inquirers:—

How to Investigate Spiritualism (Farmer); Miracles and Modern Spiritualism (A. R. Wallace); Researches in Spiritualism (W. Crookes); From Matter to Spirit (De Morgan); The Debateable Land (Dale Owen); Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World (Dale Owen); Planchette (Eppe Sargent); Proof Palpable of Immortality; The Scientific Basis of Spiritualism (Eppe Sargent); Report of the Dialectical Society; Zöllner's Transcendental Physics (*Translated by C. ## LECTURE NOTES.

It will be seen by a reference to our advertisement columns that the first lecture of this series takes place at Langham Hall on Tuesday evening, May 15th, when the Rev. John Page Hopps, of Leicester, and the editor of the Truthseeker, will deliver a lecture on "A Scientific and Spiritual Basis of Belief in a Future Life." The chair will be taken at eight p.m. by the Hon. Percy Wyndham, M.P. The lecturer has so many friends in London, both amongst Spiritualists and the general public, that there will no doubt be a large attendance. Spiritualists are not only invited to attend themselves, but are also requested to bring these lectures to the notice of any of their friends who are interested in Spiritualism.

Admission is free to certain parts of the hall, but there will be a limited number of reserved seats, tickets for which can be obtained of Mr. T. Blyton, 38, Great Russell-street, W.C., or of Mr. J. J. Morse, 4, New Bridge-street, E.C. They will also, through the courtesy of Mr. Sandys Britton, be on sale at the bookstall at Cavendish Rooms, on Sunday evening next, or application may be made to the office of this paper. There are three sets of tickets, viz.:—Specially reserved numbered sofa stalls, for the course of six lectures, one guinea each, single tickets, 4s.; reserved seats, 2s. and 1s. each lecture, or 10s. and 5s. for the course.

We are requested to state that no money can be taken for tickets at the doors on the evening in question, a clause in the lease under which Langham Hall is held prohibiting their sale in the approaches of the building. It is, therefore, absolutely necessary that applications for reserved seat tickets should be made before the day of the lecture. Will friends please bear this in mind?

We have also much pleasure in announcing that the Rev. S. E. Bengough, M.A., has kindly consented to lecture on June 26th, his subject being:—"The Oldest Psychology Extant." Mr. Bengough's name will be familiar to many Spiritualists as that of a contributor to the old Spiritual Magazine from its commencement in 1860. We are sure London Spiritualists will be glad of an opportunity of welcoming Mr. Bengough once more in public.

The cost of the series of six lectures is estimated at £70. Friends who intend contributing to this fund are requested to communicate as early as possible with Mr. T. Blyton, 38, Great Russell-street, W.C. Only half the requisite amount has, as yet, been subscribed.

"SPIRIT TEACHINGS," BY "M. A. (OXON.)."—The first series will shortly be issued in book form. Those who make immediate application for copies can be supplied at the subscription price.

AN EVENING WITH EPES SARGENT.

by Robert Cooper.

During my residence in Boston I was in the habit of visiting Mr. Epes Sargent, whose acquaintance I made soon after my arrival in that city, having a letter of introduction to him from the late Mr. B. Coleman, who made Mr. Sargent's personal acquaintance when he visited America on a spiritual mission, about the year 1860.

Eppe Sargent at Home.

Mr. Sargent's residence was in the suburbs of Boston, a locality known as Roxbury, and readily reached by tram-car. It was a handsome villa, with extensive grounds, delightfully situated. The time I generally chose for calling was in the evening, when I was almost sure to find him in his library engaged in his literary work. This, on my arrival, he would set aside, and begin to converse on the subject in which we were mutually interested, Spiritualism. He was anxious to hear what I had to tell him in connection with the movement, not being accustomed himself to attend any of the meetings, and only occasionally visiting mediums. He was, however, a studious reader of the spiritual papers, and was well posted in all that transpired both in England and America. An hour or two was very pleasantly passed in discoursing on these themes, Mr. Sargent being a very agreeable conversationalist, very genial and unassuming in his manner, and one with whom you always felt at ease. He had an extensive collection of books in his library, and would very often get up and take one from the shelf and find out something relative to the subject we were discussing. He seemed to have everything at his finger's ends. The last time I saw him he was employed in revising the proofs of a work on which he was engaged for Harper Brothers, the well-known publishers, an encyclopædia of English poetry, and at his request I called upon the Rev. Minot J. Savage, a popular Boston clergyman, to ascertain whether he had published any poetry in a collected form. Mr. Savage informed me he had published a small volume, and provided me with a copy for Mr. Sargent's use. The MS. of "The Scientific Basis of Spiritualism," I had the opportunity of looking through some two years before it was published. The words of the once popular song, "A Life on the Ocean Wave," Mr. Sargent informed me he was the author of. I told him I had set some of his poetry to music and afterwards submitted it to him; whereupon he wrote to Mr. Oliver Ditson, the principal American music publisher, who, he said, was an old schoolfellow of his, and got him to publish it. The title of this song is, "In our hearts is summer still."

Thinking it would be of interest to our English friends to hear this much of Mr. Sargent, whose name is a household word amongst Spiritualists, I have thought well to introduce the foregoing remarks, but my object in writing this article is to give an account of some interesting and remarkable phenomena that occurred in my presence at Mr. Sargent's residence.

A New Kind of Abnormal Writing.

Some three or four years ago, a medium, W. H. Powell, came to Boston, whose manifestations were of an original and unique character—in fact I do not know of any other who possesses his peculiar phase of mediumship. The first I heard of him was at a lecture by Mr. E. S. Wheeler, of Philadelphia, who, in the course of his address, referred to a new medium who possessed the remarkable power of writing with his bare finger, and at times could produce writing on a wall by motioning his hand in front of it without coming in contact with it; the letters in fact would appear following the motion of the hand. This statement, of course, appeared rather incredible, but an opportunity soon occurred of receiving ocular demonstration of the fact. In due course, Mr. Powell arrived in Boston, and I took an early opportunity of witnessing his phenomenal powers, and soon became satisfied that the writing was produced in the way described. Not only was writing produced by the medium's bare finger, but when my own finger was used, my hand being held by the medium, the same effect was produced. But on this occasion I saw no writing produced without contact, as described by Mr. Wheeler. I, however, saw writing produced by the gloved finger of a lady; also when a hand was enclosed in a handkerchief. I accompanied the medium to the offices of the Boston Herald, when he exhibited his peculiar powers before two of the staff.

It occurred to me that this novel and singular phase of spirit-power would be of interest to Mr. Sargent, and I accordingly suggested to Mr. Powell to pay him a visit, undertaking to accompany and introduce him. It was ultimately arranged to make up a party selected from the "Spiritualists' Home," where Mr. Powell was located. The party consisted of Mr. Powell and his wife, Mrs. Thayer, the wonderful flower-medium, Mr. W. J. Colville, and myself. I entered the house in advance to ascertain whether it would be agreeable to Mr. Sargent to receive the intended visitors, and finding it would be so, signalled them to enter. After a little preliminary conversation respecting Mr. Powell's mediumship, slates were produced and the medium became entranced and spoke under the alleged influence of an Indian spirit named Tecumseh. Before this happened Mr. Powell drank copiously of cold water, which, I believe, is his usual custom on these occasions. After a due examination of the medium's fore-finger by all present it was placed direct upon the slate and wrote in letters about half-an-inch in height as if done by a blunt slate-pencil. The communication sometimes occupied both sides of two or three slates; and one or more spare slates were held by the person sitting next, in order that there might be no break in the continuity of the messages. These were for the most part common-place and unimportant. Mr. Sargent, however, received one or two communications that purported to come from a deceased relative and which seemed to greatly interest him. Experiments were next made with writing with other persons' fingers, Mrs. Sargent's and another lady's being used for that purpose. It was now intimated that an experiment of a different character would be tried and the medium suggested that a slate belonging to Mr. Sargent should be used for the purpose, and he went out of the room to obtain one. After being requested to examine it to see there was nothing on it, we were asked to hold the slate in a horizontal position. Accordingly Mr. and Mrs. Sargent and myself, standing in the centre of the room, took hold of the slate, each with one hand. The medium, standing behind us, asked what we would like to have drawn on the slate. One suggested a flower, and I followed by saying, "Draw a rose." Hereupon Mr. Powell, stretching his hand over our shoulders, moved it about over the slate, but not in contact with it, for the space of a few seconds, and then told us to look on the under side, where we found the representation of a rose, and underneath it the word "Winoona." We were, of course, all very much astonished at such an unexpected result, and Mr. Sargent, particularly, regarded it with great interest, and seemed to attach great importance to it. An account of the manifestation was published by him in the Banner of Light, and is also referred to in a foot-note in his work, "The Scientific Basis of Spiritualism."

This was the first occasion on which Mr. W. J. Colville and Mr. Sargent had met, and a conversation followed between them relative to the mediumship of the latter. Mr. Sargent said he had recently been studying the subject of "Double Consciousness," and desired further information on the subject. Hereupon Mr. Colville was controlled, and gave a lucid dissertation on this theme, and further, replied to queries that were put by our host. An impromptu poem, the subject suggested by Mr. Sargent, closed the proceedings, and all seemed well satisfied with what had taken place.

With respect to Mr. Powell's peculiar form of mediumship, I would remark that, with one exception, I have never heard of any other medium possessing the like powers. There was a report of a lad at Philadelphia who was said to possess the power of writing in the same way as Mr. Powell, differing in this respect, that the writing produced was in colours. I never heard any authentication of the report. Mr. Powell's mediumship was investigated by a committee of scientists at Philadelphia, who certified to the genuineness of the phenomena and made an analysis of the substance of which the writing was composed. When my finger was used I could feel a small particle like a grain of sand under it; but what was most extraordinary, on one occasion, when I was writing a line with my finger, a second one seemed to form of itself underneath, not so clear but perfectly distinct, and as it were, a reflex of the original.

Mr. Powell's mediumship, taking place as it always does, in full light, is very useful in confounding and convincing sceptics, and he appears to be doing a good work in this way. I frequently notice accounts of him in the American spiritual journals, and the reports are uniformly favourable. In a recent number of the Religio-Philosophical Journal is the following from a correspondent at Terre Haute, Ind.:—"He is without doubt a wonderful medium, and though he has been under the scrutiny of observant Spiritualists and critical sceptics, nothing like fraud has been charged or detected." I also accompanied Mr. Sargent on a visit to the remarkable slate-writing medium Watkins, and may at some future time give an account of his doings, if acceptable to the readers of "LIGHT."

SPIRITUALISM IN BELGIUM.

The second quarterly number of the Bulletin de la Fédération Spirite Belge (Brussels) is just to hand. From it we learn that various local societies, called groupes, in all parts of the country, send delegates to constitute a central conference to consider questions affecting them individually and collectively as Spiritualists. They bring reports and communications. At the second meeting of the Confederation there were delegates from thirty-two groupes. As a specimen of the reports we take the following from that of Ostend.

"Spiritualism made its appearance in Ostend in the form of a book. One of us passing a bookseller's saw in the window the 'Livre des Esprits.' He bought it and was captivated by it. Through his zeal a dozen copies were soon in circulation. He with his friends and other readers, used to meet and discuss it in a private room in the Hotel Mertian. This was in 1867. In 1873 we engaged convenient rooms in a private house. In 1875 we formally organised ourselves and met regularly. We had a dozen writing mediums and one seeing medium. After a time we established a little journal and appointed a lecturer. This our first group we called the Kring de Rots, the Rock group. We kept this chiefly for new disciples, in which we taught the efficacy of prayer in behalf of undeveloped spirits. Then the Dupuis group was formed, through the activity of one of us of that name, for Spiritualists of some experience. In this group are mediums for healing, writing, drawing, and for physical manifestations. Every Sunday we have a lecture, and we have published translations and tracts. Our healing medium, Galeyn, is remarkable for the rapidity of the cures through him; he is clairvoyant; he sees the effect produced by the fluid from his hands. One of his cures is in the person of one of our local physicians, who said while under treatment 'This man cannot have been always a workman: he must have studied at hospitals.'

"Our drawing medium, Vanhercke, has no notion of what is coming through his hand, which works by making a series of rapid dots, his pen, dipped in ink, being held perpendicularly. The ink never makes blots. His hand is moved rapidly from one part of the paper to another, even while the medium looks at and talks to those around him. In this way six drawings have been executed by his hand, admired by artists equally on account of design and rapidity of work.

"We have not reached the present point of our history without trials. We used to be intruded upon by false, frivolous, and perverse spirits, and we have had some obsessions. These trials have contributed to our steady progress. The spirits who come to us now have to come through the door of prayer."

THE VISIT OF MRS. FOX JENCKEN TO RUSSIA.

By S. C. Hall.

Mrs. Fox Jencken has returned in good health from her visit to Russia, where she had been invited by M. Aksakof, by whom all her arrangements for "sittings" were made. Her residence in St. Petersburg lasted for seven weeks, on every day of which she met some persons (most of them of high social, professional, or political rank) to whom she manifested the marvels of Spiritualism. Her mission was entirely successful, although it does not appear that any peculiar "novelties" attended, or arose out of it. The result was, however, to convince the hundreds who attended her sittings; and, undoubtedly, belief in Spiritualism and thoroughly confirmed faith in the verity of the phenomena, have resulted from the lady's visit to the Imperial city.

Mrs. Jencken expresses warm gratitude to M. Aksakof. Rooms were provided for her at the principal hotel; a carriage was placed at her disposal; her two orphan boys, who accompanied her, were placed at a temporary school; her daily callers were very numerous; in a word, the result was far more than merely satisfactory to her, while gratifying, convincing, and happy to her sitters, on every occasion for which appointments and arrangements had been made.

The manifestations were sometimes by night and as often by day—in full light: forms were occasionally visible, messages were written in Russian, both by the hand of Mrs. Jencken, and in "direct writing." Several names were communicated of persons "gone before." The raps on the table, floor and walls were even more than usually loud and strong: lights were seen in various parts of the room: a small bell was rung repeatedly in various parts of it: palpable "touchings" were numerous, with clear evidence as to the identity of the "touchers": in short, all the usual phenomena familiar to advanced Spiritualists, were communicated to the sitters—such evidence being fully and entirely accepted by several of the most learned professors of the Russian capital. And, although there does not seem to have been any marked or peculiar manifestations, the result was eminently and entirely satisfactory, confirming the very general belief in Spiritualism that prevails in the great city of Northern Europe: the acceptance of Spiritualism as a solemn, impressive, and happy truth.

It would be of little value to go at length into a history of the exceedingly satisfactory visit of Mrs. Jencken; she expresses much gratitude to the ladies and gentlemen, the men of science and letters, leading professors and renowned physicians, who were present at her sittings. No single unpleasant incident occurred during the seven weeks of her residence. Everything was in every way made pleasant to her. A warm invitation to "come again" was conveyed to her, and we, as well as Mrs. Jencken, may repeat the words "it is a sweet memory to look back upon."

She can relate facts far more effectually and emphatically than they can be recorded by written words. Her account of her residence is of very great interest. But space may be better occupied than in giving details.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

CAVENDISH ROOMS, 51 AND 53, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

The evening of Sunday, the 6th inst., at these rooms, was appropriated to "Question and Answer": a form of instruction and evidence which is introduced periodically as a test of the quality and resources of trance-speaking under the skillful and experienced charge of the controls of Mr. Morse. The opportunity thus afforded for the relief of personal doubts, if these are of a character likely to interest generally an intelligent audience, and for a brief but judicious and cogent exhibition of some of the prominent aspects of the Spiritualist's philosophy, is so largely appreciated that the difficulty of dealing adequately with all the points raised increases with each meeting. Upwards of twenty questions were proposed and answered, and we would gladly supply at once an abstract of the answers, if by any possibility we could fairly reproduce their pertinent and searching character within the limits allotted to this report. Nor can we attempt a selection of special points, for our sense of exact justice to all inquirers restrains us. Under the circumstances we can only repeat the announcement made from the platform, that if a sufficient number of subscribers will give in their names and addresses for the purchase of a verbatim report of the proceedings this shall be supplied within a week or two.

Names can be received by the secretary at 53, Sigdon-road, Dalston, E., or at the rooms, not later than Tuesday, the 15th inst. The price will be the same as that for the number already printed and in circulation, namely, 4d. for one copy, 10d. for three, 1s. 6d. for six, with gratuitous distribution of Farmer's pamphlet, "How to Investigate."

The consultation with the controls closed with the expression of the cordial thanks of the meeting and their amiable acknowledgment. They were also sufficiently considerate to announce (and to bespeak a large attendance for the occasion) that on Sunday, the 13th, Mr. E. W. Wallis, from Nottingham, will occupy the platform and speak upon the question, "After Death, What?"—S.B.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A. J. C.—Received. Will appear.

NORTHUMBRIA.—Will appear next week. We have been obliged to postpone the publication of all intelligence this week.

THE VEGETARIAN "APPLE TREE."—Mr. Glendinning, the well-known Spiritualist, has been, for some time past, proprietor of the "Apple Tree" Restaurant, in London Wall. The following lines written on the subject give a new turn to an old legend. The initials will reveal the poet.

Said He—

"You are fair—you always were;
And yet your beauty shews,
A dawn to-day more dainty-rate
Than any tint of rose!"

Said She—

"Pure living makes pure blood,
And, if you will follow me
As tempter to a healthier food,
Just try the 'Apple Tree!'"

SHAKESPEARE AND THE SUPERNATURAL.—In his address at the Shakespeare soiree, at Birkenhead, the other evening, the Rev. W. Binns said:—"Shakespeare had a supernatural theory, such as it was, of the ordinary sort. In Shakespeare's mind the things every day evident to the senses, constituted the kingdom of nature. Of these things God was the author. Behind all that we saw God existed, and out of the fulness of His life He poured forth the forms of finite being, and yet did not exhaust Himself by what He poured forth. There was always an infinite in the background. Nineteen persons out of twenty would agree with this. But this was not all. What we might call the natural supernaturalism of Shakespeare included a belief in mysterious powers which only made their appearances in the world on rare occasions, or when our own minds were so tuned that we could perceive the presence of spiritual realities which were always there. Shakespeare had a genuine faith in ghosts, witches, and fairies. They were by no means to him, as they were to modern science, the relics of superstition, or the creation of a vagrant imagination abandoning itself to the despotism of subjectivity, and bodying forth in the world without that which only existed in the world within. If we ask, do ghosts, witches, and fairies really exist, he had no answer to give. He had never met with any himself. But there were more things in heaven and earth than were dreamt of in our philosophy. Shakespeare believed in them, and the belief of such a man was not to be contemptuously dismissed as an effete superstition."—The Christian Life.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.—(To the Editor of the Daily News).—Sir,—The learned writer of your Saturday's leader on our "proceedings" (whose active co-operation in the department of the research to which he so earnestly directs us would be even more welcome than his admonitions) has not wholly avoided the common confusion between "collective illusion" and "collective hallucination." It of course often happens that two or more people, usually under the influence of suggestion, misinterpret in the same way the signs presented to their senses, and so agree in mis-seeing or mis-hearing some real object. On the other hand, I know of no evidence to prove that two or more persons have ever simultaneously perceived, and mistaken for reality, some unsuggested and purely subjective image having no external basis. But, your critic urges, such an occurrence should at any rate present no difficulties to us, who believe in the possibility of thought-transference; for why should not the image, however subjective in origin, be transferred from one mind to another? This is an acute and pertinent observation; and the answer to it would need more space than I can ask for. I will only remark that to those whose chief aim for some time has been to establish the simpler facts of thought-transference, it is a fair (and now by no means a rare) ground of satisfaction to find the reality of that power, so lately wholly unrecognised by science, suggested as a plausible scientific explanation for various further classes of doubtful or discredited phenomena. I would ask, in conclusion, whether it is quite fair to describe, in a way which implies that we have treated them as credible and valuable cases, stories which we have expressly quoted to illustrate the manner in which evidence is apt to break down under strict examination?—Yours obediently, EDMUND GURNEY.—Devonshire Club, May 6th.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Fries, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

Is it Conjuring?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HOUDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See "Psychische Studien" for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBS, writing to the editor of Licht, Mekt Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism and also 'the individuality of the spirit' in Spiritual manifestation."

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butler off, in St. Petersburg; to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a Notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex; the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cool breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form-manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly—Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning Spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your Reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

THE CONDUCT OF PUBLIC PHYSICAL SEANCES.

Circular issued by the Central Association of Spiritualists, 33, Great Russell-street, W.C.

Few Spiritualists can have failed to note, with regret, the deterioration which has of late years taken place in the conditions under which physical phenomena have been sought in public séances.

These conditions—so favourable to fraud on the part of dishonest mediums, and so calculated to excite suspicion in the minds of observers—have led to the most disastrous results. We are not speaking without full warrant when we say that there is hardly a public medium for physical manifestations in this country against whom, at one time or other, charges of imposture have not been brought. We fear that in some cases no reasonable doubt can be entertained that fraud of the grossest kind was really perpetrated; while in other cases there is reason to believe that—whatever may have been the appearance to inexperienced spectators—there was no conscious deception on the part of the medium.

But in either case the name of Spiritualism has been brought into discredit, and we are forcibly driven to the conclusion that other methods of procedure must be amended. We must demonstrate our abhorrence of imposture by disavowing and discouraging all conditions which do not plainly shut out even the suspicion of its impossibility.

Obviously these remarks can have little reference to family circles, which are naturally held sacred by those who regard them as affording opportunities for veritable "communion with the dead." But it is open to grave question whether—even in the case of family circles—inquirers should ever be permitted to make their first acquaintance with Spiritual phenomena by introduction to séances held for physical manifestations in the dark, or where a cabinet is used for the seclusion of the medium.

We are chiefly concerned, however, with what are known as public or promiscuous séances for physical manifestations.

These have been of late years generally marked by the following characteristics:—(1) The séance has been conducted in imperfect light, or in total darkness. (2) The medium has been isolated from the circle, by being placed either in a cabinet or behind a curtain. (3) The sitters have been, either wholly or in part, unacquainted with the subject and with each other. (4) There has not unfrequently been a manifest want of harmony, consequent upon differences of opinion as to the nature and value of the tests employed.

These conditions, usually found in combination, effectually preclude careful and dispassionate investigation; open wide an avenue to fraud; suggest suspicion of its presence even where it does not exist; and in many cases, we fear, expose the medium to very injurious influences.

Such conditions should be allowed to prevail no longer. "Mixed" circles should be as little mixed as possible—mere wonder-seekers, and men whose moral atmosphere is known to be impure, being carefully excluded. Above all, darkness should give way to light. In the early days of Spiritualism public dark circles were the exception, and there is no need for them now. There is abundant evidence that, with mediums of the present day, satisfactory phenomena, including even "form" manifestations, can be obtained without isolation—the medium, where a cabinet is used, being placed near, but outside of it, and in full view of the sitters. But even if this were not so, it is neither wise nor honourable to expose mediums to the risks which have been shewn to attend séances held under the conditions that have of late been prevalent; and it were far better that we should have no public manifestations of physical phenomena than that they should be sought under circumstances which, to say the least, inevitably conduce to suspicion.

In view of all these considerations, believing that fraud is not of the essence of this confessedly obscure subject, but rather an accident dependent on faulty conditions of research; feeling that Spiritualists have the remedy for the evil in their own hands, and that without its conscientious application they cannot hope to maintain a fair reputation before the world; we earnestly recommend—That in all public circles held for physical phenomena, the medium be so placed, and in such light, as to be continuously under observation by each member of the circle.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

(With which is Incorporated the British National Association of Spiritualists. Established 1873.)

38, GREAT RUSSELL ST., BLOOMSBURY, LONDON, W.C.
(Entrance in WOBURN STREET.)

THIS ASSOCIATION was formed for the purpose of uniting Spiritualists of every variety of opinion in an organised body, with a view of promoting the investigation of the facts of Spiritualism, and of aiding students and inquirers in their researches by providing them with the best means of investigation.

The Association is governed by a President, Vice-Presidents, and a Council of thirty Members elected annually.

The Reference and Lending Libraries contain a large collection of the best works on Spiritualism and occult subjects. Spiritualist and other newspapers and periodicals from all parts of the world are regularly supplied for the Reading Room, to which Members have access daily.

The Secretary, or his representative, is in attendance to receive visitors, and answer enquiries; on Saturdays, from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m.; on other days from 2 p.m. to 9 p.m. On Sundays the Rooms are closed.

Spiritualists and others visiting the Metropolis are cordially invited to visit the Association and inspect the various objects of interest on view in the Reading Room and Library. Information is cheerfully afforded to enquirers on all questions affecting Spiritualism.

Members' Free, Séances are held on Wednesday evenings, at 8 o'clock prompt, subject to certain regulations, which can be ascertained on application.

Discussion Meetings are held fortnightly during the winter months. Admission free to Members and Subscribers, who can introduce one or more friends to each meeting. Programmes can be obtained on application during the winter season.

Soirées, at which all friends are welcome, are held at intervals during the season. An admission fee is charged, including refreshments:

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

A new magazine which professes to embody the thoughts and aspirations of the passing hour, deals necessarily with that wide range of subjects which come within the sphere of this journal. Accordingly we have in To-day (as the magazine is called) the opening chapters of a story that I am not concerned to criticize, in which Spiritualism plays a part, and one Professor Hoaxley talks with Carpenterian glibness of unconscious cerebration, thought-reading, and the spirit of the age. "Unconscious cerebration on the one hand and trickery on the other—in these behold the solution of every difficulty," is a dictum quite worthy of certain self-styled philosophers. In another part of the same number the "Bold Thoughts of Science" are admirable reading. The materialistic tendencies of science are dealt with in a manner that is very refreshing. While gratefully acknowledging the debt that the world owes to the patient investigations of modern science, the writer administers a snub to the inordinate pretensions which are put forward in its name.

Science now-a-days has adopted rather a patronising air to her sisters, art and literature. After proving to her satisfaction that we human beings are the chosen samples of the great ape family, and that even the longest pedigree includes a baboon and a whelk or two; after reducing the soul to a chemical product, and casting doubts upon its existence hereafter, the science of the time affects a tolerant but slightly superior attitude to poetry and painting. "Scientific accuracy," the fetish of the more advanced scientific thinkers of the day, is shewn, with much force, to be, good as it is in its own place, not the highest ideal in art. "Mere exactness of portrayal is not the true aim of the artist." "A table of statistics is infinitely higher than a fine poem" is not an axiom that can be suffered to pass unchallenged. Science, "this golden image of superior enlightenment," has its feet of clay. The limitations of scientific knowledge are very clearly demonstrated; and also the bareness of that so-called knowledge when divorced from imagination—the divinest faculty in man, and the most luminous.

"Material philosophers," says the writer, "have well-nigh succeeded in endowing matter and motion with Divine attributes, and the time has now come for a breaking of the bonds that thus tie down research and thought. Science must step forth into the glad light and look around at the world of feeling and imagination. She must dare to think boldly; she must dare even to consort with fancy. Let her remember that the bounds of the imaginable are continuous with those of the possible, and that it is only the inconceivable that cannot be. Who, for example, can maintain that there does not exist some vast region of space utterly void of matter. This may well be, and the question then arises whether this material vacuum is also a vacuum from an immaterial point of view. We may concede the absence of atoms, ether, and the physical forces, and yet hold that a something is still there, that life, and feeling, and thought are not absent, that joy, and beauty, and truth may gladden that unfathomable universe of souls . . . . This exercise of the imagination teaches us that immaterial existences and influences may be amongst us in this grosser region of space, and that possibly they to some extent control the working of the material phenomena to which we consider our experience to be limited. A Tyndall or a Huxley may refuse to indulge in such speculations . . . but it is surely more truly scientific to hold that the generation of to-day is like past generations in knowing but a portion of the forces and influences that exist, than to assert the impossibility of there being anything in existence dissimilar to what we have already experienced." All which is excellent and timely. The minute investigation of microscopic facts, their tabulation and arrangement are serviceable work, but not the noblest or the only work that man may fitly do. And when this study is pursued to the exclusion of that which involves the use of man's spiritual faculties, it is cramping to the intellect, and robs the soul of its birthright.

This it is that seems to ring out as the note of the age. Men have narrowed down the meaning of science until the word has become synonymous with that which has no real pretension to knowledge. They have crawled on their bellies, groping in the dust, and have lost conception of the bright heavens that are overhead. A Newton and a Darwin were cast in another mould, and therefore, they were true teachers; but most of the work called scientific, useful in its own way, falls short of that highest excellence which man's best nature craves. "It is not in papers on the spectrum of a comet, or the chemical analysis of a new mineral, that the soul can find its proper pabulum." Yet see the dwarfing and cramping effect of science on the mind! The very proof of a soul in man is viewed with such suspicion that it is received, if at all, with a violent prejudice against its probability, and the men of science who meddle with the evidence at all, act apologetically, as men with a craze, and take elaborate pains to point out that they are certainly not to be convinced of any spiritual existence, or unembodied entity, without prolonged and reiterated proof. They have arrived at a condition when they think it monstrous in us to demonstrate to them that they have a soul which may possibly survive physical death. That a reaction is setting in to this miserable, bald conception is due chiefly to Spiritualism, and finds demonstration in To-day, which puts forward as part of its creed that "in every being there is that which has begun not and will never end."

The "Grim Tales" in the same magazine, if they are as forceful as the present one, will add to the reputation of their writers. This instalment, an imaginative and horribly realistic development of what many Spiritualists will easily conceive of as possible, is ghastly enough for the most exacting. The writer must know some of the phenomena of the dark séance well.

While I am noting various contributions to general literature on these subjects, I may draw attention to an article on "Unfathomed Mysteries" in the current number of Blackwood's Magazine. The paper is chiefly remarkable for the admissions made in it of the reality of the facts observed by the writer. The editor introduces him as a well-known writer for the Press, and, by implication, assures his readers that, however suspicious it may be to find such a man writing as he does, he is not actually mad. This voucher made, the editor goes on to stultify himself by saying in effect that the article shews up the tricks of mediums. Whereas that is just what it does not do. The mysteries are still unexplained to the satisfaction of the writer, though he is inclined to credit them to the devil; that most convenient scapegoat who is always ready when the unexplained and unclassified truths, that vex impartial minds, have to be got rid of. How many of such have in the past been credited to him until they have taken their place among the blessings that are then credited to God! All unknown things are evil; all evil is of the devil. All that man sees to be true is good; all good is of God. A simple division; but hardly scientific, or satisfactory to any but a very elementary and simple mind: so convenient, however, and so venerable as a method that it will survive to the end. When I hear now that anything is of the devil I prick up my ears in anticipation of coming across something at once new and true.

A PAPAL BULL OF EXCOMMUNICATION AGAINST SPIRITUALISTS.

The following is the verbatim text of the Papal Bull of excommunication recently sent by the Pope to various Bishops and hurled by the Archbishop of Santander (Spain) against Spiritualists in general, and certain editors in his diocese especially. In the course of our researches we come, at times, across curious facts, and we think it well to place this one on record. It will come in handy some day; meanwhile, Spiritualists will no doubt very modestly hide their diminished heads:—

BULL OF EXCOMMUNICATION.

"May Almighty God and His holy saints curse the Spiritualists and their journals with the perpetual malediction launched against the devil and his angels! May they be accursed like Judas the traitor, and Julian the apostate; and may they perish like Nero. May the Lord judge them as He judged Dathan and Abiram and command the earth to swallow them alive. May they be crushed and swept away from the face of the earth and all memory of them disappear for ever and ever; and may they be seized with terrible death and hurled alive, they and their progeny, into hell for damnation everlasting, so as not to leave a seed of themselves upon the surface of the globe. May the few days that are yet in store for them be full of gall and bring on incessant disasters and unhappiness to the accursed ones. Let them suffer hunger, thirst, and nakedness, and be visited by every unclean disease and pain, and through wretched poverty and misery. Accursed be every bit of their property and every blessing and prayer instead of benefiting be changed for them into a curse. Let them be cursed everywhere and at every hour; cursed day and night, sleeping and waking, in eating, in drinking, and during fast; cursed when they speak and when they keep silent; cursed at home and abroad; cursed on land and on water; cursed from the top of their heads down to the soles of their feet! May their eyes be blinded, their ears deaf, their tongues dumb and rooted to their palates! Cursed be every member of their family and every limb of their body! Let them be cursed from to-day and for ever! Let light be changed for them into darkness before the face of the Creator, on the great day of the last judgment! May their sepulchre be that of dogs and asses! May famished wolves prey upon their corpses and may their eternal company be that of Satan and his angels!"

"UNFATHOMED MYSTERIES."

Under this heading, Blackwood's Magazine for May contains an article which is in every way remarkable, not only on account of the experiences which it relates, but also for the deductions drawn by the writer with reference to the evil moral effects of what he calls "dabbling in Spiritualism." The narrative bears on the face of it an impress of truthfulness; and moreover, an editorial footnote is appended, explaining that "the personal experiences narrated in this paper are those of a writer whose good faith is unimpeachable, whose powers of observation are of a very high order, and who most positively affirms that every detail herein related is accurately described without any exaggeration." The editor then very naively continues that "never in spiritualistic literature" has he "met with more striking proof of the wonderful success with which professional mediums practise their delusions." We say (and we are inclined to think all who look at the narrative in the light of common-sense will agree with us), that having regard to the strong testimony given as to the good faith and the high order of the writer's powers of observation, we have never come across a more striking proof of the wonderful success with which some professional littérateurs "practise their delusions." To turn such a literary somersault needs professional skill; no amateur could have done it half so well!

After a preliminary canter of gossiping chit chat on "Thought-Reading," "Brain Waves," &c., &c., the writer relates "an incident of so personal a character that I (he) should otherwise shrink from relating" were it not that "all well-authenticated evidence in any way bearing on the subject must possess a certain value in the eyes of those who are seeking a solution of the question." His story is as follows:—

"Two years ago, I chanced to find myself in Boston (Massachusetts), the fortunate guest of one whose hospitable home has for many years been the centre of the most delightful society in that literary city. Knowing Boston to be a centre of so-called Spiritualism, I remarked to a friend of my host that it was really quite wrong that travellers should be there and not see something of the Spiritualism for which it is so famous. He replied that he himself knew nothing whatever about it, but that if I cared to interview a medium, he would find out how to arrange the meeting, and would be glad to escort me. Of course I agreed, and he went off to ask an acquaintance learned in such matters how he was to set about it.

"His friend told him that it was the simplest thing in the world. He had only to go to a central office, called 'The Banner of Light,' and there he would obtain all necessary information. To this office he accordingly proceeded, and was received in the most business-like manner. 'He wished to see a medium?' Certainly. He had only to select the one he preferred. Thereupon a large book of reference was produced, like a servants' register, in which were entered the names and addresses of a multitude of professional mediums, on any one of whom he was at liberty to call and make his own arrangements.

"Quite at random he took note of several addresses and drove off to the first on his list. He was received by an unpleasant-looking woman, in a dingy house, and resolved to try his luck elsewhere. At the next house he was received in a pretty room by an attractive little lady of fragile and delicate appearance. She consulted her list of engagements, and said she could spare an hour on the following day, when she would expect us.

"Three other ladies had by this time expressed a wish to accompany us. The medium, Mrs. N. W., made some demur to the presence of so many, on the score that it was much more fatiguing to her. However, she waived this objection, and on the following morning we proceeded to her house. We were a party of five, almost strangers one to another—certainly not knowing one incident in one another's lives. Mrs. N. W. did not know even our names. Had she done so, they could certainly have conveyed nothing to her mind.

"We started immediately after breakfast, on a brilliant winter's morning, cold and crisp, with bright sunshine. We were all in the most mirthful frame of mind—amused by the novelty of the proceeding, and certainly without one thought of anything serious in the matter. The only definite idea we had concerning the coming interview was, that we would ask the medium to tell us about a packet of papers which I had lost and could not trace,—not that we for one moment expected her to throw any light on the subject.

"On arriving at her house, we were received by a tidy little maid, and were shewn into a little drawing-room, into which the full sunlight poured, lighting up every corner. There was no question of darkened rooms or mysticism of any sort: only the simplest furniture—a few pretty cane chairs adorned with blue ribbons. We all carried large bunches of most fragrant winter violets; and when after a few moments, Mrs. N. W. entered the room, we offered her a bunch, which she accepted pleasantly, observing, 'All good spirits love flowers.' Though our friend had prepared us to see a very fair, delicate little lady, we were all startled by the unnatural pallor of her wax-like complexion—due, we suppose, to passing so large a portion of her life in some unnatural condition.

"After a few words of greeting, during which our previous levity was considerably toned down by her evident earnestness in the matter on hand, she asked us to sit in a small circle holding hands, for about one minute (all in full sunshine). Then she said, 'I must sleep;' and passing her hand a few times across her own face, she went off into a sort of waking trance. Then, much to our amazement, in a strange, unnatural voice, she began to pray a simple and most earnest prayer to the Great Spirit of all good and holiness, that He would bestow upon us all goodness, and grant us a closer union with the spirits of all His children; and especially she prayed that none but good spirits might be allowed to communicate with us. I must confess that we were all utterly taken aback—so entirely incongruous was this solemn appeal with the spirit in which we had sought the interview.

"Ere we had recovered from our astonishment, our medium commenced talking in a shrill child's voice. (The idea seems, to be, that during the trance the medium is no longer himself or herself, but is merely a passive agent, of whose faculties some spirit present takes the mastery, while acting as spokesman for all others present.)

"Turning to one of the ladies, she told her that several of her near relations, who were dead, were present, and desired her to deliver certain messages. Knowing nothing about the lady in question, I took little interest in what was said, but I saw that she did so, and that she seemed rather surprised.

"Suddenly turning to the gentleman who had brought us, she told him that his father was standing beside him. She proceeded to describe him minutely, and said he bade her tell his son that his blessing rested on him because of his lifelong devotion to his invalid sister. This was startling: and I learnt subsequently that the invalid sister and the brother's devoted care were prominent facts in his life's history. Then she told him that a young girl—'Nelly'—was coming close up to speak to him; that she said how bitterly she had grieved at having to leave him, for she had been so happy with him that she had no wish to enter the spirit world. Then turning aside, as if speaking to the girl, she said, 'Now, Nelly, you must not cry; for if you do so, I cannot hear what you say.' A few moments later she said, 'Nelly bids me tell you that you are not to trust George so thoroughly. You know who I mean by George. A man who transacts business for you—no relation, only a business friend. She says he is not acting well for you. Those last shares he bought are not good. You had better look after that matter.'

"Throughout this communication—of which I omit many details—our friend was evidently much astonished; and though, of course, I could not venture to make any inquiry concerning his lost love, I did ask if there was such a person as 'George,' and was told in a whisper that there was, and that in every particular the medium had rightly described their relations.

"Suddenly Mrs. N. W. turned to me, saying that a spirit was pressing forward to get close to me—'a short, thick-set man; he has been an old-fashioned-looking fellow ever since his boyhood.' She then proceeded to give a most minute description of various physical peculiarities, so very marked as to be quite unmistakable. Yet so little had I dreamt of harbouring one thought concerning the sacred dead at such a time, that I could scarcely believe I heard aright when she added, 'He says he is your brother!—his name is JOHN. That is John.' She again commented freely on his personal appearance, adding, 'But what a good companion he is; and how he does love sport!' Then suddenly pressing her hand on her head, she said, with a look of great pain, 'Oh, poor fellow! how dreadfully he suffered here before he died!'

"Now I am positively certain that it was not till nearly all these details had been minutely described that my thoughts definitely recurred to the brother who, of all the dear ones gone hence, would, I think, draw nearest to me, were it in his power; the one brother who, in bodily presence, differed so strangely from all his stalwart brethren, though excelled by none in his skill as a mighty hunter; the brother who, after long years of toil in Ceylon, had died of a sudden and agonising pressure on the brain, at the very moment when he had definitely decided on returning home—so that the same ship which was to have brought him back to England brought the tidings of his death.

"Ere I had fully realised what had been said, the medium resumed. 'There is a dark-complexioned woman standing beside him, who loves you both dearly.' Then she minutely described her, adding, 'She is your sister.' She took my hand, and wrote three letters, so plainly that there could be no mistake, saying each as she did so—I D A. Doubtless, the name had risen in my mind, so that thought-reading might account for this. But certainly not one soul in all America knew any one of the facts which Mrs. N. W. told me that day; so that by no possible means could she have obtained any information concerning my family, even had she known my name, which she did not.

"Then, apparently as a means of identification, and although my own thoughts had most certainly not turned to the subject, she went on to say how terribly this spirit had suffered in her last long illness—how the internal complaint had puzzled and baffled all the doctors, whereas she (the medium) saw plainly that the cause of death had been different from what they imagined, and she named another malady.

"Feeling these revelations to be terribly painful, and being, moreover, determined that neither by look nor word would I allow any one present to detect how strangely true was every syllable spoken, I tried to turn the subject; but the medium went on—as if analysing some curious case—to describe various prominent features of a character which, in its various moods, was more strongly marked than that of any other woman I have ever known.

"Oh," she said, 'how full of fun and mischief she is! What a capital racy story she can tell, and how witty she is! But some days, when she is in great pain, you know, she is so low and depressed that for days together she can scarcely speak. And then the moment she is a little better she is as full of wit and frolic as ever.'

"All this (with other strangely accurate details) was so startlingly exact a description of one endowed with most rare conversational powers, and a fund of mother wit which bubbled to the surface whenever the pressure of great physical pain was removed for a little season, that I could scarcely credit my hearing (especially as ten years had elapsed since those days of alternating mirth and suffering). But a moment later the medium added, 'She wants me to tell you, that you need fear nothing in coming to the spirit world, for there are so many there who love you, and wait to welcome you.'

"The medium added, 'There is a young man standing close to your sister; she is speaking to him.' She went on to describe one who was buried on the field of Alma in 1854; and as I plainly recognised her description, I asked, with carefully assumed indifference, what was his name? In my own mind I thought of the name by which we always addressed him. She replied, 'I will tell you when I hear it.' A moment later, to my amazement, she uttered, not the name that was in my mind, but that by which his wife alone called him! Then she said, 'There is another lady with them—also a sister; she is taller, and has smooth dark hair. She has an uncommon name—S E V—I cannot make out the last syllable.' I need scarcely say that the name of my eldest sister, Seymour, had presented itself vividly to my mind, yet she could not make this out. This, then, was clearly not thought-reading.

"She did not lose more than a few seconds in this effort. Then turning from me to a lady who sat opposite, she said, 'I have much to tell you—from Annie, your sister-in-law.' She then described the spirit in question, and, correcting herself, said, 'Oh! her name is not Annie—it is Fanny. I had not heard rightly at first.' Then she said, 'Come close, that I may tell you in a whisper, for you will not like the others to hear what I have to say, and it is no concern of theirs.'

"She spoke for some minutes in a whisper, quite inaudible to the rest of the party; but I watched the lady who was thus addressed start, as if utterly amazed by what was said, and she appeared more and more perplexed as she listened. She told us afterwards that she could not possibly repeat what had been said to her, but that it had reference to strictly private family affairs, which she was convinced that no one outside of her own domestic circle could possibly know. On returning home she told her relations what had been said, and all were alike perplexed. She said her father had the greatest horror of Spiritualism, and had never allowed any of them to dabble in it; and evidently this revelation confirmed his objections.

"As soon as this private aside was ended, I asked Mrs. N. W. whether she could tell anything about people who were still alive, in the ordinary acceptance of the word. She replied in the affirmative; whereupon I said there were two men concerning whom I should like to have information. I certainly did not expect to receive any, but my thoughts turned to my brother and my half-brother, both in Afghanistan.

"She said, 'Tell me in what sort of country to look for them—a hot country or a cold one?' It was in the depth of winter, so I replied, 'A cold country.'

"After a moment's pause, she said, 'I see them both. One is more nearly related to you than the other. He is your brother. His name is Frank. I think he must be some sort of merchant, for he has long trains of animals carrying heavy burdens. There are strange wild-looking people about him—something like our wild Indian tribes, but different. I think there must be some disturbance or trouble in the country for he seems to be anxious for peace,—something like what was going on where the poor Prince Imperial was killed.'

"Strange to say this brother was then in charge of a land transport corps, oppressed by the amount of work thrown on his shoulders, in organising means of transporting all stores to the front, and personally inspecting every detail. The long caravans of laden camels and pack-horses might well have seemed suggestive of trains of merchandise.

"I asked her to tell me the name of the other man. A first she could not, for she said he was ill—not seriously ill, but that somehow she could not make out his name. Some minutes later she said, 'The name of that other man—the one who is not so closely related to you—is Fred. They will both come home safely.'

"So far all she had said was extraordinarily accurate. Now, however, she seemed to be exceedingly weary, and as if speaking at random. I asked if she could tell me about a lost packet of papers. She replied, 'Oh yes; they are lost to you for ever. You need take no further trouble to recover them. (I did recover them a few days later.) She then volunteered to tell me that I should very soon go 'across the pond' (Anglic, return to England, which, in fact, I did a week later); that an old friend would come to welcome me, but that within ten days he would die suddenly. Her description of this gentleman so far resembled a friend who actually did most unexpectedly come to meet me, that I frankly confess to having been unable to shake off an uneasy qualm till the allotted ten days were well over. But I am thankful to say that in this case also, our medium proved herself quite unable to prophesy, for my friend continues to this day in perfect health.

"The fragile little woman now said she was very tired, and must awaken. She passed her hand over her face, shivered, and seemed by a voluntary effort to come out from her trance. She appeared utterly exhausted, and confessed to feeling so. The death-like pallor which had at first struck us so painfully, seemed even more ghastly than before. Strange to say, all this had occurred within the hour which she had previously allotted to us—for a specified pecuniary consideration. Throughout the séance she had continued to speak in the strained unnatural voice, purporting to be that of the child who was supposed to be speaking through her agency. We were glad once more to hear her speak in her natural voice. She told us she had other appointments in the course of the day, and must rest; so we left her and passed out into the crisp sunlight of the New England winter, and went on our way feeling considerably bewildered by our interview.

"Much of what she had said was so utterly unaccountable, that I, for one, could not put it from me for days. It really seemed as if, but for lack of time, and the presence of others all claiming their share of one short hour, she might have gone on speaking consecutively, as one who had something definite to tell; or else, if there were any fraud in the matter (which seemed quite impossible), I might have obtained some clue to it.

"I could not attribute her words to thought-reading; for in almost each case the thoughts were entirely of her suggestion; and in several instances where she addressed the others, she had to explain something of which she had to remind them; saying, 'Don't you remember?' and they answered, 'Yes; but I had forgotten.'

So much for the story. Where the "delusion" comes in unless the narrator deliberately mis-states facts, we fail to see. Subsequently he attended a spiritualistic lecture in New York, of which he says "the one object was to prove that the reality of Spiritualism rests on evidence of precisely the same character as that of Christianity."

This rather shocked the nerves of our friend. He considered this method of "treating sacred subjects could not but sound painfully irreverent." Here again we fail to appreciate the situation, especially as it is admitted that "this was evidently not the intention of the speaker nor the impression produced on his hearers." The conclusions drawn are stated as follows:—

"The advance of modern science has taught us to despise the superstitions of the dark ages. Necromancy and witchcraft are deemed things of the past. Yet under new names, and with refinements better suited to this nineteenth century, the same beliefs would seem to be at work. A few years ago, a simple little heart-shaped piece of wood, called 'Planchette,' running on wheels, and pierced by a pencil, became a favourite drawing-room plaything, and was required to act the part of the divining-rod in the hand of the Eastern magicians. So eerie were the answers thus obtained to various questions, that in many cases the inquirers took alarm, and solemnly condemned their 'Planchette' to an auto da fé. We know of one which was deliberately sunk in the Nile, and another in the Thames, as being decidedly 'uncanny.'

"Then we have had the whole array of evidence concerning table-turning and spirit-rapping, which for so many years formed a fruitful topic of conversation and wonder. Add to these, numerous indisputable stories of unaccountable apparitions, such as those vouched for by Mr. Lane and his sister during their residence in Egypt; and also such mysterious rappings as continued for years to disturb the pious home of the Wesleys; and many other instances equally well authenticated.

"All I can learn on this subject, and its effect on those who have gone most deeply into its study, inclines me to believe that it is one which it is well to leave untouched, and so my inquiries have gone no further. From what I can gather, I infer that the whole question of Spiritualism is full of difficulty; that those who start on the endeavour to follow it out soon find themselves plunged in an intricate labyrinth, from which escape becomes more and more hopeless the further they advance—a labyrinth in which light becomes darkness, and in which they who once enter are beguiled ever onward, in the vain hope of grasping something tangible, which for ever eludes their quest."

This is the old tale in which "bogie" turns up once more as lively as ever. We were under the impression that the "devil-theory" had died a natural death long ago, when lo! it is re-dressed for further service. This particular impeachment of Spiritualism has been answered over and over again, and we do not feel ourselves specially called upon to give reiterated denial to statements made by those who "having eyes they see not and having ears they hear not." The accusation may be true in exceptional cases; as regards Spiritualism generally it is totally false. But, perhaps, we have taken this paper too much au sérieux.

THE BARONESS VON VAY, the well-known Austrian Spiritualist, is a powerful healer. Rich and poor are treated alike without fee or reward.

We learn that the late Madame Kardec bequeathed her property, which represented a considerable amount, to the "Society for the Continuation of the Spiritualistic Works of Allan Kardec."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, the eminent French astronomer and Spiritualist, never shrinks from avowing his belief in the reality of the spiritual phenomena, and is ever willing on all suitable occasions to take his part in the public advocacy of the spiritual movement.

EXPERIENCES IN A "HAUNTED HOUSE."

Five years since being obliged to enlarge my borders, I took the house I am now occupying, for a term of seven years, thinking myself fortunate in having secured so eligible a place for the requirements of my profession.

The first afternoon of our being here a young lady, whom I had sent to lie down, told me that a tall lady had stood by her side. I fully believed, and persuaded the young lady so, that it was merely a chimera of a disordered brain.

We had been located here about a month, when I went away to spend my Easter holidays. On my return my mother had a strange tale to tell, viz., that the young ladies left here and the domestics and herself had been very much frightened by strange noises. Believing that these had been nothing but noises proceeding from natural causes, exaggerated by a distorted imagination, I ridiculed the whole affair, desiring them "to let me hear no more of that nonsense." A short time afterwards, however, I was myself suddenly awakened by a terrible thud as of some falling furniture. This was at two o'clock in the morning, and from that time until after four, I was kept awake by a confusion of sounds apparently in the drawing-room below. I then got up and went downstairs, fully expecting to find the room disarranged, and I was very perplexed at seeing everything precisely as I had left it when retiring the previous evening. At the breakfast-table I asked casually if any one had been disturbed during the night, when my governess, occupying the room immediately over mine, said she had not been able to sleep for certain sounds which came apparently from my room. Up to this time I had never associated the disturbances with anything supernatural. I knew nothing of Spiritualism whatever.

From the time of which I am writing to the immediate present we have rarely been free from these visitations. All the first summer, and the spring and summer following, the whole household was terror-stricken. The noises increased in intensity and frequency; strange forms, animal and human, presented themselves; and lights appeared in perfectly dark rooms. One young lady had fits through seeing a hand and arm stretched towards some flowers upon the table.

About this time (during our first summer here) I had been out, and on coming in my companion walked towards a half-glass door, opening to the garden, and seeing her attention rivetted, I looked in the same direction—towards the greenhouse at the bottom of the garden. My attention was immediately arrested by a gaunt black figure standing against the open door of the greenhouse. We watched it for a long time, standing motionless; then it slowly advanced until about half way towards us, when it faded as a dissolving view passes from a magic lantern.

Just at this time a young lady was crossing a passage, and looking from the window to the garden saw a woman in a light dress crossing the lawn. She called her companion, and they both watched the figure disappear. The same evening two others, knowing nothing of what these had seen, met the same figure coming from my room, and even noticed that it had very large bare feet.

I was called from supper to a room in which eight were retiring. A light, egg-shaped, was visible under the piano; all saw it but myself. I requested them to ring if it came again. I had hardly reached the dining-room when the bell recalled me. I seized my Bible, and on entering the room, I too saw the light—a dead, non-radiating light, egg-shaped, or, as my pupils called it, an eye of fire. Seeing how frightened they were, and being wrought to a fit of desperation by the repeated disturbances, I flung my Bible at the light, saying: "There, you devil; come again if you dare!" and, strange to say, that night we were perfectly quiet.

A visitor saw a woman's figure, in everyday attire, sitting at the foot of her bed; and my mother, entering the same room, saw what—until she spoke to it—she imagined to be the servant. In this room are frequently seen large balls of bright light.

It would occupy too much space to enumerate the events as they actually occurred. I must confine myself to a few of the more prominent. No room is free from the phenomena; and most persons visiting hear or see some of them. One night I had two visitors, to whom I gave up my own room, going to share one at the top of the house with three young ladies. Being a very sultry night the window was half open. I was standing at it. One young lady had been in bed some hours, and was sleeping; the other two were almost close to me. Suddenly, a very peculiar noise, startlingly loud, came at the open window. The sleeping girl was roused, and jumped from her bed in terror. Another threw her arms round me, exclaiming: "Oh! What is that noise?" while the fourth occupant of the room heard no sound. It was at one time a common thing for an animal, about the size of a cat, but not like one, to rush out from behind the piano in the bedroom and whisk about the middle of the floor, and the girls have several times chased it.

The figure of a child has been seen by the drawing-room fire-place, and at the top of the stairs.

In February of 1882 I had a friend staying with me. The first morning I asked how he had slept, and heard that he had been unable to sleep the greater part of the night on account of noises in the room and passage. This led to my disclosing the experiences; and he gave me the name and address of a gentleman, Spiritualist, whom, he thought, might help me. This was the first idea I had of associating the phenomena with the spirit world.

The spring of 1882 was very troublesome. One evening a young lady rushed breathlessly into the dining-room saying she had been walking in the garden, and on hearing footsteps had looked round and seen a gentleman very close to her. The same evening two servants saw the same phenomenon.

In the autumn we were sitting at supper when a loud knock came on the table, as if struck underneath, and on the 20th October following I was sitting alone in the room in the afternoon when the same knock came again. In both cases the knock, if it had been real, must have split the table to pieces, and yet, although the table was laid, not an article was displaced or rattled. In the latter case only myself and one other were in the house.

In December last about eleven o'clock one evening, I was startled to see a huge, colorless face at the window. I could see no hair, and the expression was terrible. I shall never forget it.

This year, too, has been rather remarkable. One evening my pupils called me to their room to see that the greenhouse was illuminated. My governess and I went up. At first we could see nothing; then a small ball as of fire, bright, but not a flame, appeared, but whether in the greenhouse or on the ground close to it I could not determine. We all (six) watched it, and it slowly grew larger and larger until it was quite two feet in diameter, and then as slowly faded away. This is a frequent phenomenon. I know some will immediately ascribe it to reflection, but it is not so, all the windows being closely shuttered for the purpose of testing it, and the garden is not overlooked in any way; neither is there ingress except through the house.

Twice I have been awakened by shrill maddening peals of laughter, when all in the house have been soundly sleeping. On one occasion in December last, a young lady met a figure on the stairs from which she received a sharp blow on the face. The same figure emerged from a closet in the bedroom, and walked to the foot of the bed, which it shook violently and then disappeared.

Sometimes the noise is a crash as of glass breaking. These are a few only of the phenomena we are continually experiencing, and it is singular that, while no season of the year has been wholly free, the phenomena are always more frequent in the spring.

I am aware that by many this narrative will be received with contumely, and I shall be regarded as a mistaken visionary. I do not attempt to account for these manifestations. That I must leave, but I have related only facts which have actually occurred, and are still occurring.

MATERIALIZATION CONDITIONS.

The following letter of our valued contributor, "M. A. (Oxon.)," appeared recently in the Harbinger of Light. Setting aside the fact that everything from his pen is well worthy of attention, we think its subject so important that we give the letter in question in extenso—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "HARBINGER OF LIGHT."

SIR,—In writing a few words of greeting to my friends in the Antipodes, it is not very easy to select topics that may be of general interest, but I shall not be wrong if I say something of your Materialisation Séances, of which you have presented us with such an exhaustive report. There is no phase of the manifestation of spirit that is more astounding than this; none that demands more complete proof before it can be finally accepted. It seems to me that you have done much to place the evidence on unimpeachable grounds. I have had the advantage of seeing some of the private records of the circle in which Mr. Spriggs sat at Cardiff before he migrated to the Antipodes, and I can see that his development was carefully guarded, and that pains were taken to render it possible for results to be satisfactory. It is by no means so simple as it might appear to ensure that end. "LIGHT" has contained of late some correspondence and some notes of mine that bear closely on this point. I cannot summarise them, and can only refer your readers to them. But compendiously I may say that results worth having are not to be had save by strict attention not only to the medium, but also to the composition of the circle. Here is the fatal fault of public circles. Any chance loafer who can pay the fee finds his place, and ruins the chances of success. Any man who hates and detests the whole subject can pay his money and find his opportunity of damning it. He has no sort of belief in the whole thing, no knowledge of the very alphabet, yet he is to sit as judge upon the most elaborated manifestation of spirit-power. He, absolutely ignorant, is to pronounce an opinion on one of the most subtle manifestations of spirit. He starts from ignorance, and he pursues his way through rashness to absurdity. He pays his fees, sees something he cannot understand, clutches the spirit, grasps (of course) the medium, and goes away with the air of a man who has exploded a fraud. Yet what has he done? Simply and solely he "has written himself down an ass." For spiritual things are spiritually discerned, and grave problems of this kind cannot be solved by the rough and ready methods that spirit snatchers think proper to employ.

It is a cheering sign that investigators are becoming alive to the absurdity of current methods of investigation, and also to the necessity for attending to the circumstances under which investigation is held. It is not enough that the medium be so placed that he cannot cheat. "Be he chaste as ice, pure as snow," he is the victim of his surroundings; he is the wash-pot into which the psychical emanations of the circle are poured. If they be vitiated how can he remain pure? He is nervously sensitive to every influence with which he is brought into rapport. It is necessary then to see that all these are good; for "one dead fly maketh the ointment of the apothecary to stink." It is abundantly sure that nothing short of the most careful attention not only to the medium but to the circle, will ensure satisfactory results.

You have, it appears to me, secured this, and you have given us a record of your investigations that seem to me to be of high value. It would be impertinent to suggest to you experiments that may be impossible. None can judge of the conditions save those who are present. But supposing it possible for you to elaborate your experiments so as to get a clear view of the medium and psychic form at the same time, it would be of the highest scientific value if you could determine the relation between the two; for instance, by seeing how far one could subsist apart from the other; by weighing both simultaneously and determining the variations of weight, and especially by watching the gradual extinction of the materialised form, and seeing how, and after what time, it disappeared.

All this means a clear view of the medium. I earnestly hope that you will secure that. Do not believe that it cannot be done. It can; and until it is done, the philosophy of materialisation will be nil. At the present moment we know almost nothing of the modus operandi. We never shall know more till we see what is going on. Let us have that privilege, and we shall advance with giant strides. And it would be better, believe me, to get one satisfactory experiment in a month than an unsatisfactory one every day. I know that I ask for what is difficult. I ask it none the less. It is a sine quâ non to progress.

You know as much as I can tell you of our Spiritualism. It is written in the columns of "LIGHT." We have reached and passed a turning point, I will not call it a crisis; our facts have accumulated to an extent that renders it unnecessary to add to them. There is a distinct break in their presentation. Five, three, even two years ago, they were evolved far more rapidly than now. They are so far complete; we now want the mind that can tabulate, arrange, sift, and classify them. We want a philosophy. These are the facts—where is the mind to deal with them? Echo answers where! But the mind will be forthcoming. No fear of that.

I offer most respectfully my hearty greetings to my friends and co-workers, and am always,

Yours most cordially,

M. A. (Oxon.)

THE LANGHAM HALL LECTURES.

A full report of the lecture by the Rev. John Page Hopps at Langham Hall, on Tuesday evening last, will appear in our next issue. In the meantime we again very gladly urge upon our readers the claims of the C.A.S. for support in their spirited public action in undertaking to provide high class lectures of this description. Those who desire to shew sympathy with the object in view will, we think, find a fitting opportunity by contributing towards the expenses. The cost of the series of six lectures is estimated at £70. Friends who intend contributing to this fund are requested to communicate as early as possible with Mr. T. Blyton, 38, Great Russell-street, W.C. About half the requisite amount has, as yet, been subscribed.

"TRANSCORPOREAL ACTION OF THE SPIRIT."

By A. M. HOWITT WATTS.

No. II.

"It is only when the person is asleep, or entranced (or in reverie!) that the spirit is able to leave the body; and it is only with persons possessing medial powers that it is at all possible."—Dr. Eugene Crowell's "Spirit World and its Inhabitants." Chap. i. p. 20.

In the paper on "Transcorporeal Action" in "LIGHT," for April 21st, were given instances of the phantasms of living persons taken from printed records of the phenomenon from various accredited sources. The following instances are from private sources, and have not until now appeared in print, being the personal experiences of intimate friends of the writer, or her own experience. The names of the ladies concerned, the writer is not permitted to give.

The following narrative was written, September 15th, 1882, from the dictation of an old and intimate friend, whom we will call Mrs. C., and shews how

A Spirit returned from Chapel whilst the Body still remained there.

"When I was quite a young girl," said Mrs. C., "for a short period I resided with a family-connection named Dora. Shewas wealthy and of the Methodist persuasion, living a retired life, except for the visits of religiously-minded persons of her own belief; and herself much devoted to prayer. She was a very interesting woman, whom I, in my then crude state of knowledge of things spiritual, could not understand or do justice to. She had been a spirit-seer from childhood, and I am now convinced that when in the twilight—as was her wont—she having played passage after passage from memory of the grand old masters, fell into 'playing her thoughts,' as she termed it, she was playing by spirit-inspiration. Of the wonderful beauty and charm of these musical improvisations I cannot attempt to convey an idea. Dora was an invalid and not infrequently unable to attend public worship at the neighbouring chapel. Consequently one summer's Sunday afternoon I went there alone. Dora meanwhile sitting reading in her room at home, heard me, as she supposed, return at an unusually early hour. Not only did she hear, but she clearly saw me quietly pass the door and enter my chamber.

"After a while, service being over, I returned at the usual hour, and entered the room where Dora sat, in my bonnet and walking dress, shewing myself thus immediately upon my return.

"How long have you been back?" asked Dora, with a look of surprise, glancing at my bonnet.

"I am only this moment returned," I rejoined.

"But," insisted Dora, 'you have been back half an hour, or even more. I saw you pass the room door and enter your chamber.'

"No, dear Dora, that is not so. I have only just returned. I have not, as yet, been in my room."

"Dora looked greatly puzzled, even troubled in mind. Evidently she believed that thus having seen my double, she had received a 'death omen.' For weeks afterwards this apparition, in recollection, continued to trouble her.

"My own experiences in the matter," remarked Mrs. C., "were these. The afternoon was hot—I was drowsy and tired during the service.* I sat by myself in a large pew, curtained round; above the line of the curtain I alone saw the figure of the good preacher delivering his sermon. His voice and monotonous action tended to produce, possibly, a mesmeric sensation over me. I fell, consciously, into a state of reverie, and was quite aware that my mind wandered; my body remained in the pew, but my mind, my thoughts, involuntarily returned home. Dora, who possessed the seer's eye, beheld my returning mind, clothed, as the French Spiritists would phrase it, in its périsprit.

"I once again many years later experienced how

"A Spirit form of one in the flesh can knock at a door."

"It happened that once going on a visit to N.," continued Mrs. C., "where my step-mother resided, to whom I was strongly attached, on arriving I was met by my brother, who informed me that unexpectedly our mother's spare room was occupied by a visitor and that therefore at her request, I was that night to sleep at his house. Some way I was disappointed not at once being able to see our mother. I determined to rise early on the morrow and surprise her at the breakfast-table. I felt a yearning to see her. Her home was at some little distance and to reach it, there was a steep hill to be ascended. I was so impatient to arrive that I actually felt my will and mind rush on before me, my feet seemed to linger behind, as I toiled up the hill. At length I was at the door of my step-mother's house, and knocked. To my surprise she herself opened it, exclaiming 'Well, here you really are, this time! I heard your loud knock a quarter of an hour ago—but no one was there! for I, feeling certain you were come, ran to the door as now!'" Probably in this case, as in the case of apparitions of the dying, a mutual yearning gave rise to the development of so much psychic force as to produce a loud knocking.

Mrs. B. appears to her maid bringing with her a Spiritual Light.

In a series of papers in the Psychological Review, entitled "Thoughts regarding the Mystical Death," the writer introduced a lady, whom she called Mrs. B., and her maid Jacintha.

Mrs. B. for many years has been conscious of her thoughts, her mind, her soul, her "périsprit," as the French—her "nerve-spirit" as the German psychologists have termed it—going forth from herself, and making itself manifest to persons with whom she is en rapport. This, usually, has occurred without volition on her part. She enjoys good health; is, however, markedly that which we now accustom ourselves to term a "psychic." She herself is also well acquainted with the phenomenon of beholding the "phantasms" of living persons, and also of hearing the voices of living persons when at a distance from her; in short, she hears and sees manifestations of the spirits of living persons equally with manifestations of the spiritua. presence of those whom we call "the dead." Jacintha, her maid, is also a "psychic."

In the summer of 1882 Jacintha said to her mistress, who was preparing for an absence from home of some duration, "I do hope, madam, that master and yourself will not this time give me another terrible fright such as you gave me last autumn when you went abroad."

Mrs. B.: "How was that, Jacintha?"

Jacintha: "About midnight of the evening that you started for the Continent, I was suddenly awakened by a loud knocking at the front door. It was master's well-known knock. I heard, then, his footsteps on the stairs. He did not walk into the drawing-room, but came directly up and up—not entering his bedroom as I expected—but straight up to my little room at the top of the house. You followed. You carried a bright light in your hand, which enabled me to clearly see you both, and all the objects in my room. You both looked frightfully pale, tired, and wet. Bits of mud fell off master's feet as he walked. I cried out! I was dreadfully alarmed. I felt certain that some accident must have occurred. Not for a moment did I doubt that you were both killed, and that

* The Seeress of Prevorst was enabled by her nerve-spirit going forth from herself to make sounds of knocking at a distance. Instances of this are given by Dr. Kerner.

I now beheld your ghosts. You, ma'am, looked steadfastly at me, holding your light, and I asked, 'Is that you, ma'am?' and you replied, 'It is not I, it is my ghost.' This more than ever alarmed me. I have often, you know, in many ways seen you in the spirit, but never had I quite seen you in the same manner. I could not remain in my room. I got up, and in great trouble went down into the kitchen and made myself a cup of tea. I was regularly upset. I had not a shade of a doubt but that some trouble had come and that I had seen your ghosts. I did not dare mention to anyone what I had seen, and was most miserable, until a letter came from abroad saying you and master were all right."

Mrs. B.: "I imagine, Jacintha, that at that particular moment when you thus saw us in the spirit you saw our then condition of body and mind. That night at about midnight, we, having come off the steamboat at Calais, missed the carriage which should have taken us up from the pier to the hotel. It was very low water, and the distance was thus greater than usual between the boat and the inn. It was damp, dreary, and wretched. There had been much rain, and we, very much exhausted, had a dark, wet walk up to the hotel. We remarked at the time that never had we had a more disagreeable walk, and never so dreary an arrival at Calais. Being very tired, also having left you very unwell, as you may remember, my thoughts most probably returned home, and were directed to yourself, especially as I had left with an anxious feeling regarding you. The ghost of my thoughts, no doubt, visited you."

Jacintha then told her mistress that years previously she had, when first she entered the service of Mr. and Mrs. B., received in a similar manner a visit in the night from Mrs. B. which had greatly startled her. She had been, perhaps, a month in the family, and had heard her fellow-servants' mysterious hints regarding the "queer things" believed in by their master and mistress. "For they are," said the servants, "what people call Spiritualists." What "Spiritualists" were Jacintha did not exactly know, but supposed it had something to do with "ghosts." One night Jacintha, sleeping in a room with another maid, suddenly was fully awakened by beholding, as she supposed, her mistress in person standing in the room. Indeed she had first seemed to see Mrs. B. come straight through the bedroom-door as if she walked through it. She brought a light with her which made all things clear in the room. She wore her dressing-gown and her hair hung down and spread over her shoulders. She gazed fully at Jacintha, who was so astonished by the apparition that she started up in her bed. Mrs. B.'s phantasm then vanished. Jacintha thought to herself that if this was an example of "the queer things" done by "Spiritualists," she never could possibly remain in such a household. But as it appears she stayed on in the same service for many years.

BIRTH.

KREUGER.—May 11th, Mrs. Kreuger (née Everitt), wife of Mr. Gustav Kreuger, Lilian Villa, Holder's Hill, Hendon, of a daughter.

SEANCES WITH MR. CECIL HUSK.—The first of a series of members' private subscription seances at the rooms of the Central Association of Spiritualists with Mr. Cecil Husk was held on Thursday evening last week, when some very interesting physical manifestations were experienced. The phenomena were remarkable in many respects, and of such a character as to give much satisfaction to the members present. This series of seances will be held on consecutive Thursday evenings at 7.30 o'clock prompt, and members desirous of securing tickets of admission are requested to obtain them previous to the evening of the seance.—Thomas Blyton, secretary.

MRS. HARDINGE BRITTEN will lecture at Halifax, May 20th. Belper, May 27th. Liverpool, June 3rd and 17th.—Address The Limes, Humphrey-street, Cheetham Hill, Manchester.

PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA IN ANCIENT GREECE.

By A. J. CRANSTOWN.

An interesting story of a dream vision is related by Plutarch in his delightful letter, "Consolation to Appollonius," on the death of his son; a letter which sets out very fully the philosophical and religious grounds for bearing patiently, and overcoming the sorrow caused by the death of a dearly-loved friend. This beautiful and instructive epistle is adorned with many examples illustrative of his views, and with extracts from the classical poets on the subject, and is very worthy of study.

Plutarch did not offer this friendly and wise consolation to his friend until after a considerable time had elapsed from the death of his son, being well aware, as he declares in the beginning of the letter, that all attempts at consolation must at first—when the blow is fresh—fail; and that it is only Time, the great Comforter, who can succeed in reconciling a really sensitive heart to such great calamities, and make it perceive, as Carlyle says, "That sorrow was not given us for sorrow's sake, but always and infallibly as a lesson to us, from which we are to learn somewhat, and which, the somewhat once learned, ceases to be sorrow!"

The story is as follows:—"Of Euthynous, the Italian, there is this memorable story, that he died suddenly without anyone knowing the cause of his death; his father was Elisius, the Terinean, a man of the highest rank, both as to estate and virtue, being rich and honourable, and his son the heir to all his fortune, which was very great, and having thus died he conceived a strong suspicion that he had been poisoned. Not knowing how to arrive at the truth as to this, he went to the place set apart for the invocation of the dead (ψυχομαρτίον), and after having performed the rites and sacrifices enjoined by law, he went to sleep there. When all was silent he had a vision or apparition (ὄψις); his father appeared to him, to whom he related his misfortune, and earnestly requested that he might be assisted in discovering the truth as to his son's death, whereupon, his father replied that 'he had come with that intention, but that he (Elisius) should first receive from this person here what he had brought you, and thereby you will see the true cause of your affliction.' The form alluded to bore a strong resemblance to the deceased Euthynous, both in years and stature, and on being asked 'who he was,' replied, 'I am the genius (δαίμων) of your son,' and then shewed him a roll, which, on being unfolded, had these lines written on it.

"Men wander through life with minds led astray by illusion, Euthynous by decree of the Fates has found repose in death: His life, if it had been prolonged, would not have been beautiful either to himself or to you."

The foregoing is the story, which is interesting in many respects. This antique view of death as the Frer from approaching calamities is more consoling than that held by Dante, reflecting the Middle Age gloom of Hell and Purgatory, which pressed like a death pall upon the living; in the "Vita Nuova," he calls death "di dolor madre antica," "the ancient mother of grief;" and yet Dante too was right, for in spite of all verbal consolations, the death of those loved has ever been the mother of sorrows, a true "Mater dolorosa." Cicero, like Plutarch, wrote eloquently upon the folly of grieving at death, but when his own beloved daughter died, he was so thoroughly overmastered by grief, that he retired and shut himself up for a considerable time, invisible to any of his friends, so as not to be disturbed by vain attempts at consolation. It may be said of consolation in such cases, as Dean Swift said of philosophy, that she was "a splendid mare in the stable, but an arrant jade on a journey."

The above story proves that the custom of invoking the dead—Necromancy—either by obtaining actual objective appearances (materialisations), or by clairvoyance, or by subjective dream visions, was a recognised and common practice in the ancient world, and that a particular place was set apart for this rite, with a particular name as above mentioned, and which was probably a chamber in a temple, and that a regular appointed ritual with offerings was used for the success of the invocation. The religious element so introduced was an essential part of these ancient seances until in later times the whole thing got into the hands of paid impostors and jugglers. How different and how much better and more likely to have good results was this ancient practice than our modern mixed seances, where for the most part the sitters get simply what they deserve, the reflection of their own states of mind. It appears to have been the practice, in some cases, to give the invoker, previous to his going to sleep, a magical drink probably of an anæsthetic kind, by which it is supposed the soul becomes loosened from the bands of the flesh, and enabled to enter into spiritual communion with the inhabitants of the spirit spheres. The witches' salve undoubtedly, both in ancient times and in the Middle Ages, produced some analogous effect to these anæsthetics, as is shewn by the curious experiences of Gassendi with a witch. As to the writing on the scroll, many cases are recorded, similar to the above, in which clairvoyants have seen writing on scrolls, or in books, or in crystals; so that this ancient story is in this respect also parallelised in modern phenomena.

The Genius (daimon) of Euthynous, mentioned in the story as bearing a strong resemblance to Euthynous himself, was, I think, his own spirit or soul, and not a separate entity, or what is called a guardian angel; but simply his soul clothed with the spiritual* or fluidic body, as its vehicle, and which would naturally resemble the earthly body, at least for the purpose of recognition.

The Theosophists (most of whose writings I agree with and admire), drawing from the rather misty and dreamy philosophical or psychical speculations of the Hindus, Gnostics and Neoplatonists, (notably from the Vedanta and Sankhya schools, and their later outcome Buddhism,) divide and separate the thought principle in man into several different entities, each to have a separate destiny; but so far as the writer has yet been able to discover, no evidence has been adduced to prove that the thought principle is not a unity, indivisible into parts, and consequently only with one destiny before it. This theory of many kinds or portions of souls in the one man, seems to rest only in the sphere of allegation and dogma, without any evidence to sustain it. It is probably the combat and struggle which is always going on in the human soul between good and evil, which has given rise to this notion of a duality or indeed of a multiplicity of distinct thought entities. This soul combat can be explained, or at least attempted to be explained, much better by the Darwinian doctrine of evolution from the lower forms of life, the instincts and habits derived from which cling to our now human souls so closely, giving rise to a perpetual struggle, at least with most men, between the higher and the lower tendencies and aspirations, as naturally to give rise to this notion of duality or of multiplicity. If man be the microcosm of all preceding substances, inorganic and organic, and if he is placed on the "upward path" of Being; and slowly, painfully, and with infinite effort and dire sorrows, ascending the great ladder of life which extends from earth to Heaven, how could it be otherwise than that we must all have inherited the imperfections (relatively such) of our long line of "predecessors in title," and that a fierce and continued combat must arise in the soul in order to eliminate from it the tiger, the hyena, and the ape, or other of our charming progenitors. Tennyson, adopting this theory, well says:

"Rise, human soul! arise and fly
The reeling Fawn, the sensual fawn;
Move upwards working out the beast
And let the wolf and tiger die."

And Matthew Arnold, in his beautiful poem, "Empedocles on Etna," expresses the same view:—

"Born into life—man grows
Forth from his parent stem,
And blends their bloods, as those
Of theirs are blent in them;
So each new man strikes root into a far foretime."

May not this notion of duality, of opposing forces in the human soul, be merely part and parcel of that universal duality and polarity which exists everywhere in that minute portion of the infinite universe which is known to man; that necessary looking at all phenomena from contrasting and opposing points of view, in which they are viewed as opposite pairs—good and evil—light and darkness—God and Devil—Heaven and Hell—male and female—and so on in a never-ending series of opposite dualities?

The Pythagoreans (according to H. Ritter) held a view analogous to this, as the unity of the world was called by them harmony, but which harmony arises from opposing or contradictory notes or principles; and this unity, consisting of substance and element, or, as we would say, spirit and matter, is God, who governs all things, doing the best He can as far as is possible. They did not believe that God was at first perfect, but rather a progressive God; for, being the principle of all things, from Him must come the uneven, the imperfect, the negative; concluding, therefore, that the ground or cause of the imperfect must be itself imperfect. Their idea of God was the same as that of the Vedanta, and of Spinoza, a World-Soul, identical with the Kosmos, the universal life being the life of the World-Soul, that universal spirit which rules and works in all things; the "Mens agitat molem" of the Latin poet. Who can explain the great mystery, that the best and the beautiful are not at the beginning of things, but unfold themselves out of the less good and the less beautiful? It is probable, and greatly to be hoped, that this, to us, strange system of dual opposites, on which our world seems to have been constructed, and to be governed, including the duality of body and soul, spirit and matter, are only part and parcel of this phenomenal-planetary life, and that a time will come to all when they shall disappear, giving place to a world of true unity, harmony, and peace, a condition which has ever been the fond and longing dream of contemplative man, in every climate, and in every age.

This upward path of being—the "ὁδὸς ἡγεμόνων" of Parmenides, the path of empire or self-control, may be considered, as it occurs to me, to have six halting-places or stages; 1st. From beast to man, but man, preserving for long ages more or less of the nature of the beast, although the form has become human, but the soul not as yet humane but egotistic, cruel, with the "mark of the beast" still upon his forehead and in his heart. Humanity is not yet altogether out of this epoch—the stone age of man.

2nd. From savage man to man humane and civilised, more or less; in this stage religion, morality, science and art operate powerfully in modifying and changing the old original brute-man—the old Adam; but nevertheless much yet remains of the egoistic, grossly material, unspiritual man. This is the Kali yuga of the Hindus, marked most distinctly by the test of vivisection, justified almost universally by the civilised and educated men of science, for selfish human ends, contrary to all morality and sympathy with sentient life, on which all morality ultimately rests and which is stigmatised by these thought-leaders with contempt as "sentimentality." Truly it is sentimentality in its true sense—feeling—and that is a thing they apparently wish to get rid of as effectually as possible. Herbert describes this epoch,

"Unless above himself he can erect himself,
How poor a thing is man."

And Goethe puts into the mouth of the scientific pessimist, Mephistopheles, type of the gross materialistic Agnostic, these notable words, too applicable, alas! to man:—

"Der kleine Gott der Welt bleibt stets von gleichem Schlag, Und ist so wunderbar als wie am ersten Tag.
Ein wenig besser würd er leben,
Hätt' du ihm nicht den Schein des Himmelslichts gegeben;
Er neunt's Vernunft und bracht's allein,
Nur thierischer als jedes Thier zu sein."

"The little God of the world remains ever of the same stuff,
And is as wonderful as on the first day.
He would live a little happier
Hadst thou not given him the reflection of the lights of Heaven;
He calls it Reason, and uses it only
To make himself a worse brute than any other animal."

3rd. From natural and even comparatively civilised man to man as a being more and more increasingly receptive of the Divine spirit of the World-Soul, ever ready to flow into the open human soul by afflatus, influx, or inspiration, and thereby making man's will more and more united with God's will, until, in its highest state of earthly perfection it becomes one with that will: "Tat-toun-asi."

4th. Death—new birth—a spiritual being arises from the ashes of the earthly being, clothed with an imponderable but far stronger body, the "Soma angoeides," and endowed with an internal sense, the mysterious workings of which man has had even here sundry glimpses, through the veil of flesh.

5th. Personality greatly modified, perhaps swallowed up in sympathetic association with choirs of spirits, united together by original soul idiosyncrasy—each male spirit united with a female spirit.

Last stage. Nirvana, or by whatever other name the mystery may be called, but which is now incomprehensible to man in his present low condition.

The Preparation of Inquirers and the Graduation of the Phenomena— To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I cannot accept the opinion of Mr. Barkas on the above subject as at all satisfactory or even feasible. He observes that "Spiritualists generally are much too desirous to place the marvellous phenomena of which they have themselves been witnesses before their friends and the general public." But surely there is a natural and perhaps an irresistible impulse to do so, and to suppress this impulse would be unnatural, and as I think, unwise too. "I believed, and therefore have I spoken." This was the Apostle's statement of his own procedure, and surely it was as wise as it was natural. If you see "marvellous phenomena" how can you be silent? Mr. Barkas would have you practise strict reticence both before your "friends and the general public." Such reticence would be for any ingenuous mind as painful as it would be unnatural.

Besides, the evidence of the phenomena would thereby be impaired. That it should be described at once, when all the details and accompaniments are imprinted most freshly on the mind, and not blurred or confused by lapse of time, is the indispensable safeguard of the correctness of the narrative. That you should relate it at once to your friends or communicate it to the public is the principal element of security. Let the comment follow at once, and any plan or deception pointed out.

But Mr. Barkas would have one stifle the natural impulse, and wait some considerable time—say a year or two—until it has undergone a crucial investigation by some secret tribunal which is to issue its imprimatur. Then it may be safely announced to the public, and not before.

Nor can I admire his motive. We are enjoined to practise silence and withhold narratives, because the interest felt in such things is "feeble" in most minds, and because the things themselves would be thought so "antecedently improbable." This is a complete condemnation of the Apostles in immediately announcing the Resurrection. They ought to have waited till mankind had become more spiritual. This is surely unwise counsel. If the interest felt is feeble, how is it to become stronger but by presenting to the public well sustained recitals? Is life best cherished in a vacuum?

The next requirement is that "all who enter on the inquiry should first have some practical knowledge of the occult forces in mesmerism, biology, clairvoyance," &c. But how are "the occult forces" to be arrived at but by practical instances? Not surely to be guessed at on a priori grounds. Herbert Spencer rejects all Spiritualism, because on a priori grounds he judges the thing to be impossible.

Moreover Mr. Barkas requires a "moral, mental and spiritual adaptation" for such studies, in one word, genius—before we presume even to inquire. But here he confuses two different things. Mankind in general may accept and be elevated by a belief, though they cannot discuss it or enter into the depths of the argument—e.g., a child or a peasant may believe in a God, though neither can fathom the depths of the theistic argument. Yet religion was meant for all, and so is Spiritualism, if it be true. They may be sure of the thing, though they are not sure of the argument. Music, again, was meant for all, for all have ears, and those ears have musical susceptibilities, and all may be more or less refreshed or exalted by hearing it, though a small section only of these can become skilful executants, and not one in a million of first-rate executants can become a great composer. But that act does not militate against the universal cultivation of music.

The last remark is that "even observers ought to be gradually led into the arcana," beginning with the elementary phenomena. On this I would remark that Spiritualism cannot be taught in the same way as mathematics or any material science, where you advance by steps from the simplest to the most complex propositions. It depends on the inscrutable motions of "spirits." They will not be commanded. You must get them when you can. An inquirer must avail himself of such opportunities as present themselves. He cannot choose what séances he will attend. He must go where he is allowed access. Thus, in the same page as the letter in question, Mr. Damiani gives an account of a most remarkable séance with Mr. Husk, on which occasion he "introduced a lady to her first séance in England." Would Mr. Barkas have had this lady refuse Mr. Damiani's introduction on the ground that she wished to begin with the raps? Or would he reprove Mr. Damiani for rushing off into print with an account of this most successful séance, and not rather counsel him to withhold it for a year or two until it had first "undergone the crucial investigation"?

G. D. HAUGHTON.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—You have chosen a title under which to place this correspondence which seems to me exactly to indicate what all old Spiritualists will desire to carry out.

Frequently when I have recorded for the public some interesting account of spiritual phenomena I have been inundated with letters from perfect strangers wishing to sit en séance with us and observe for themselves; and some of my intimate friends have thought it hard, when I have convinced them of these phenomena having actually occurred, that I cannot at once let them come in and be more convinced by sight.

As well often would it be to introduce a bull into a china-shop! only with less result. These higher phenomena are obtained under such delicate conditions that to bring any one, unaccustomed to sit for them, into a circle would be to prevent their occurrence. Absolute harmony is essential and a prepared mind.

My advice has always been to would-be inquirers—take in "LIGHT," join the Central Association of Spiritualists, so as to become familiar with what is going on; read up the literature connected with the subject of which even many well-read people know nothing. The ignorance of what is going on at the very doors of inquirers is simply marvellous to a regular reader of "LIGHT."—Yours truly, MORELL THEOBALD.

April 30th, 1883.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Mr. Barkas does not say in what sense he uses the word "phenomena," whether in its general sense as applying to all spiritual phenomena, or in its restricted one as applying to the material or objective only. In either case I hold an opposite view to his, and, as I take it, you desire an expression of opinion on Spiritualism in its entirety without reference to any particular phase.

We have heard of one who "came to scoff but remained to pray," but if the graduating system had been applied in that case, the scoffer would not have been admitted, consequently there would have been no prayer.

Mr. Barkas will pardon me, but I venture to think his illustration is not a fortunate one when he says: "It is absolutely useless for persons without a moderate share of musical genius to study music, or persons without natural mechanical skill to study practical mechanics; both would prove failures; and so it is in reference to the investigation of spiritual phenomena; they are far beyond the capacity of a large proportion of people to appreciate or rationally to investigate." If none but those who have musical, mechanical, or other genius were to study anything, I am afraid some of us would cut a sorry figure and be denied many an hour's pleasure. People do not all desire to be Mozarts or Stephensons, yet it is quite allowable for them to acquire a little knowledge on these or any other subjects according to their aptitude, inclination, or leisure. Because I have not the capacity to become a great theologian that would scarcely be a reason why I should stay away from church.

Spiritualism is for the many, not the few: it came as "a little leaven to leaven the whole lump," and any attempt to restrict or stop the leavening must end in failure. Canute was the first who tried to stop the advancing tide, and Mrs. Malaprop, with her broom, was, I believe, the last, but neither succeeded.

The graduating idea does not apply to Spiritualism, but to Theosophism as represented by the Occultists and the Bounding Brothers of the Rocky Mountains, generally known as the Himalayan Brothers.

Curiously enough, on this very question of open or restricted investigation we have the experience of the Rev. C. Ware at Plymouth and latterly at Exeter, admirably stated by himself in your contemporary, the Medium. He says: "We do not claim that in these promiscuous gatherings we have the most favourable conditions for the development of mediumship—that is not the object we primarily have in view. Our public movement is a large open door, whereby all the people, irrespective of class or creed, shall obtain admission to the Temple of Truth. To those who cry out against promiscuous gatherings, I would say, that my idea of Spiritualism is not that half-a-dozen persons shall sit together, singing the same drowsy tunes every week, from January to December; but that it is a grand system of Spiritual education for all the people."

"The development of mediumship is not by any means the chief object of Spiritualism, much less is it the evolution of phenomena to be exhibited at so much per head. Nay, indeed. Its grand mission is the evolution of pure, noble, lovely souls; to make all the people spiritual; to develop the angel life—the Divine image—in every human being. Hence our idea of a 'circle' is, that it is a spiritual meeting, and, of course, the more people attending such meeting the better; the worst will get some good there; and, however large such a meeting, the true medium will occupy an impregnable position—like a lighthouse, to shed forth light and heavenly influence upon all."

"Spiritualism being for all, and being no respecter of persons, we understand the purpose of the spirit world to be to open a door for a universal admission of the people to a knowledge of the truth. The spirit world itself will regulate such admissions if we will let it work in its own way. We see these principles put into practical operation in a very striking manner in this city; we have had nothing to do from the beginning but to quietly remain at our post,—the authorities at headquarters have managed the work."

"The writer of this was first introduced to Spiritualism on April 18th, 1879; when, by means of a little table, in a company of Christian friends, conversation was held with intelligent beings unseen by mortal eye. The astounding fact then discovered, viz., that there was connection and communication between this earth and the world of spirits, completely revolutionised my whole intellectual and spiritual experience. It was to me nothing less than a new birth, and from that time to this, though it has cost me more suffering and conflict than I care even to recall, my one ideal of Spiritualism has been, that it is 'a gospel for every creature.'

As to the duty of Spiritualists in making Spiritualism known to those who know nothing of it, each can do it in his own way according as he is a communicative person or one who picks and chooses his hearers; but one thing is clear, and that is that it is the duty of every Spiritualist to make Spiritualism known at least to somebody and give them a light from his lamp to light them on their way to Heaven.—S.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

CAVENDISH ROOMS, 51 AND 53, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

Mr. E. W. Wallis, of Nottingham, was received at these rooms on Saturday evening last, with the cordiality and appreciation so justly due to his sincere and earnest character and powerful spiritual gifts.

He went straight to the heart of the audience by a preliminary recital of the pathetic story, in verse, of "Billy's Rose," the issue of which appropriately introduced his lecture "After Death—What?"

Death as a stage of life, as the point of separation of the spiritual personality from its erstwhile associated "chemical atoms," was described with that cheerful confidence which is the essential characteristic of the views of those who know the meaning of the "what" of the inquiry. A sustained existence which recognises no interruption, a direct sequence of cultivated or neglected opportunities so philosophically adapted to progress and that degree of happiness of which each is capable, that the mind is appeased, the sympathies enlarged, the affections satisfied—in a word, the whole nature healthfully stimulated to its best, that, briefly, is the meaning of the "what."

In the course of a vivid exhibition of these Divine truths the eloquent controls referred respectively to the efforts of those earnest souls who, as humanitarians, do so much to promote the well-being of the race, in spite of the inadequacy of their motive power, and the relative insufficiency of results which are limited to the seen possibilities, and deny the minor potentialities of being.

Less consideration was shewn for that ecclesiastic range of thought, so commonly regarded as scrupulously religious, which in fact, if not undeniably in terms, attaches less importance to morality of conduct than to belief; and the insecurity and danger of all who would pass forward to the misunderstood "what," in feeble reliance upon the merits of another, were effectually exposed.

Dead men do tell tales: they return to our midst, and the more they are sought, and intercourse with them is respectfully welcomed, the more accurate and valuable will be our conception of the form of life which is their present experience; and their testimony uniformly is that only by the straight gate of personal righteousness, with every faculty and function of our common human nature in diligent exercise, can we hope to realise promptly "after death," what are the conditions and the happy possibilities of continued life.

The subject selected for Sunday, the 20th inst., is "The Spirit Land." As we have been already informed by the controls of Mr. Morse how they propose to treat the facts, we can promise an absorbingly interesting evening. See advertisement.—S. B.

NORTH SHIELDS.

During the visit of Mrs. Britten to the north she very kindly favoured the public at North Shields with two lectures on "The New Dispensation" and "The Spirit World, its Locality and Occupations." The Oddfellows' Hall, a place capable of holding about 600 persons, was crowded to excess.

FERRY HILL.

The South Durham Spiritualists held their long-advertised gathering at the above place on Whit-Monday, and we are glad to say it was a successful one. A large number of Spiritualists and other friends gathered in a field about a mile from the village, and in the afternoon held a most successful open-air meeting, at which Mr. David Richmond, of Darlington, presided, and after relating some of his wonderful experiences in connection with the movement was followed by several short, but telling addresses by Messrs. Grey, Ouston, DeMain, Dunn, and Burton. After the meeting and sports were concluded the assembly retired to a school-house in the neighbourhood and partook of tea; after which some excellently-rendered songs and readings concluded the day's festivities.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. TURSDEN, (Bedford.)—Will receive attention.

J. EARP.—You ask for the return of your letter but give no address.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

(With which is incorporated the British National Association of Spiritualists. Established 1873.)
33, GREAT RUSSELL ST., BLOOMSBURY, LONDON, W.C.
(Entrance in WOBURN STREET.)

THIS ASSOCIATION was formed for the purpose of uniting Spiritualists of every variety of opinion in an organized body, with a view of promoting the investigation of the facts of Spiritualism, and of aiding students and inquirers in their researches by providing them with the best means of investigation.

The Association is governed by a President, Vice-Presidents, and a Council of thirty Members elected annually.

The Reference and Lending Libraries contain a large collection of the best works on Spiritualism and occult subjects. Spiritualist and other newspapers and periodicals from all parts of the world are regularly supplied for the Reading Room, to which Members have access daily.

The Secretary, or his representative, is in attendance to receive visitors, and answer enquiries; on Saturdays, from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m.; on other days from 2 p.m. to 9 p.m. On Sundays the Rooms are closed.

Spiritualists and others visiting the Metropolis are cordially invited to visit the Association and inspect the various objects of interest in the Reading Room and Library. Information is cheerfully afforded to enquirers on all questions affecting Spiritualism.

Members' Free, Seances are held on Wednesday evenings at 8 o'clock prompt, subject to certain regulations, which can be ascertained on application.

Discussion Meetings are held fortnightly during the winter months. Admission free to Members and Subscribers, who can introduce one or more friends to each meeting. Programmes can be obtained on application during the winter season.

Soirees, at which all friends are welcome, are held at intervals during the season. An admission fee is charged, including refreshments:

Per annum. £ s. d.
Country members, with privilege of voting at all General Meetings, and the right of using the Libraries when visiting London. 0 10 6
Town members, with privilege of voting at all General Meetings, the use of Reading Rooms and Reference Library, and the right of taking out one volume from the Lending Library. 1 1 0
Town members to be understood as those residing within the Metropolitan postal district.

Light refreshments are provided at moderate charges.

Prospectuses of the Association and forms of application for Membership can also be procured from the several allied Societies at home and abroad.

All communications and enquiries should be addressed to the Resident Secretary, Mr. THOS. BLYTON, 33, Great Russell-street, W.C. and Post Office Orders made payable to him at the Great Russell-street Post Office. Cheques to be crossed "London and General Bank, Limited."

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

The remarkable exposition of theosophic teaching which appeared in part in the columns of "LIGHT," is about to be published in a more complete form in a volume entitled "Esoteric Buddhism." Mr. Sinnett has added largely to what we are already acquainted with, and his volume is an authoritative exposition of occult philosophy as he has learned it from the fountain of esoteric knowledge. Whether that source of enlightenment be or be not accepted by Spiritualists as pure and unadulterated, it cannot but be a matter of deep interest to students of the Occult in all its various forms to learn what Mr. Sinnett has to teach. We can express an opinion on it after we have read it, but we are at least bound to "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest it."

The Daily News has published an uninteresting and somewhat flippant article on the "Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research." The writer modestly describes himself as "in ghosts not all unlearned": but nothing that appears in his article gives any evidence of such learning, nor, indeed, of such consciousness of its absence as would shew him to be in a fair way for receiving instruction. Mr. Edmund Gurney, writing to the Daily News to correct some of the errors into which the writer has fallen, points out, in a letter which was reproduced in "LIGHT," that "collective hallucination" is not the same thing as "collective illusion." What shred of evidence is there that a subjective hallucination can be conveyed exactly as conceived to the minds of a number of people? Such ex post facto explanations as Dr. Carpenter's and this are first gravely assumed, and then argued upon as if they had a real existence apart from the fancy of the disputant. And there lies the root of many a fallacy which becomes current. "You believe," says our critic, "in transferred impressions. Why, then, you must accept collective hallucination as a reasonable explanation of what you allege to have a real, objective existence!" And then this airy fancy takes its place as an explanation, and men think they dispose of facts by this baseless theory. We do believe, as the result of experiment, in the transference of impressions by the exercise of the mind. Even when the will is powerfully exercised the transference is blurred and imperfect. A definite conception, clearly kept in view, and urgently impressed upon another mind, is more or less imperfectly transferred.

Therefore, according to our critic, a passing idea, a mere subjective hallucination as to what is not existent at all, is transferred, in all its details, to the mind of every person present, and that without effort of will, and with envying clearness of definition.

This is a sample of the logic that does duty against our facts. And by-and-by some even less accurate and instructed writer will quote this "explanation," and say airily "Ah! yes; these stories have all been disposed of by very simple explanations—unconscious cerebration, collective hallucination, you know. Something of that sort!" So, though it is not very much worth while, let me protest that this explanation is merely foolish, and that there is not even any evidence of a collective illusion that can be applied to our facts, much less of a collective hallucination. And let me protest against a method of treatment of recorded facts which is far worse than this fabrication of baseless explanations which explain nothing. Mr. Gurney thus rebukes the writer in the Daily News for sheltering himself under a theory which he does not believe, and for carelessness, or worse, in quoting as evidence stories expressly introduced into our proceedings for a quite different purpose. "To those," he says, "whose chief aim for some time has been to establish the simpler facts of thought-transference, it is a fair (and now by no means a rare) ground of satisfaction to find the reality of that power, so lately wholly unrecognized by science, suggested as a plausible scientific explanation for various further classes of doubtful or discredited phenomena. I would ask, in conclusion, whether it is quite fair to describe, in a way which implies that we have treated them as credible and valuable cases, stories which we have expressly quoted to illustrate the manner in which evidence is apt to break down under strict examination."

The latter remonstrance, that, viz., of using as crucial cases, endorsed by the Society, those which have been expressly introduced to shew how evidence that is superficially good breaks down under such careful testing as the Society always applies, is one that it should concern the writer to notice. Either he read the Proceedings he was reviewing or he did not. In the latter case, his slipshod argument is easily accounted for. In the former case, the charge against him would be a heavier one than that of mere ignorance. But there is no reason to assume any deeper reason for his shallow lucubrations than that general ignorance of the subject, and apparent incapacity to treat it fairly, which besets most publicists when they come to deal with the occult in any form. That they should be uninstructed at the start is no discredit to them. But that they should write, being uninstructed, is at once unnecessary and indecent; and that they should go on writing, when they close eyes and ears to evidence, and misrepresent what they maul and maltreat, is a grave abuse of responsibility, and an open scandal. And this is not confined to ephemeral articles in the daily journals, which are, doubtless, written in haste, and may plead so far some excuse, but serious attempts to deal with psychical and occult subjects are frequently little better and no more worthy. Such articles as treat Spiritualism and kindred subjects in the new edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, now in course of publication, are an apt illustration of the truth of this statement. They are supposed to embody the latest wisdom, but, alas! let anyone even moderately familiar with the subjects on which they treat read them if he wishes to see how far that wisdom extends. And this is substantially the case with the vast mass of such criticism as issues with vapid regularity from the public Press in all its various forms. The trail of the serpent is over it all.

The Pall Mall Gazette is far more fair and its criticism is decidedly more intelligent. Its article on "The Ghost-hunters at work," if I except the title of it, is reasonable, and good as criticism goes. But why "Ghost-hunters"? The writer says that "it is one of the merits of the Society that it has shown how unnecessary so vulgar and hackneyed a thing as a ghost is to produce that sense of eeriness which is the principal attraction of supernatural phenomena." And then he tells his readers that "the most interesting and certainly the most novel portion of the proceedings is that which deals with thought-transference." So "Ghost-hunter" is clearly a misnomer. And surely it is not difficult to see that what the Society has already done,—an earnest of what it will one day, and that not far distant, contribute to the store of human knowledge about what most intimately concerns man—is something far other than the successful cultivation of "eeriness" or hunting of ghosts.

Any of my readers who care for truly blood-curdling ghost-stories will find them in Mrs. J. H. Riddell's "Weird Stories." Some of these are orthodox tales of a haunted house. Some are stories of dream and vision. But all are told with extremely graphic power, and suggest to the mind a foundation on fact. It is difficult to believe that the writer is not very familiar with the real stories, the authentic facts of which she has so skilfully worked up or imitated.

St. Margaret's, Westminster, contains a memorial window to Caxton, with an inscription by the Poet Laureate, founded on Caxton's motto, Fiat Lux :—

"Thy prayer was 'Light, more Light—while time shall last ;'
Thou sawest a glory growing on the night,
But not the shadows which that light would cast,
Till shadows vanish in the Light of Light."

The lines are appropriate and suggestive enough to Spiritualists to merit quotation.

DRUIDIC DOCTRINE.—Awen, in the language of ancient Gaul, as discovered by eminent modern French scholars, is the word expressing the primitive spirit. The true and pure mind rises towards Awen, from degree to degree, and when it has reached the stadium of spiritual humanity (homenalite) it cannot retrograde, it has developed into perfection the type of its primitive spirit; and has passed into the rank of divine man. Such is an outline of doctrine taught by our great Druidic fathers, the Gauls.—PEZZANTI.

"ROMAN PHILOSOPHIQUE."—This is the title of a volume forwarded to us by E.B., a medium in private life, through whose hand it was written. Under the form of a romance the story is told of a young and amiable wife effectively explaining the spiritual doctrine and the evidences of its truth to her sceptical and clever husband, whose mind has been warped by bad training. A sympathetic regard is excited for characters drawn by the spirit-author, and thus a subject which some treat in a didactic and dry manner is made attractive and interesting. The book is a sample of a good deal of literary work done by Spiritualists on the Continent.

SPIRITUALISM BASED ON THE SCIENTIFIC METHOD OF ARGUMENT.—In reasoning upwards from facts, Spiritualists follow the true scientific method of argument. If a number of intelligent witnesses testify that a communication was written in a deceased person's handwriting between closed book slates without personal contact, the information conveyed being unknown to the experimenters, but afterwards verified; and if this and various other phenomena such as apparitions, &c., have been seen by respectable living witnesses in every country, and if, added to this, similar phenomena (although misunderstood and even exaggerated) have taken place throughout the ages, in every tribe, nation, and race, and recorded in every historical work and sacred book, the whole forming a mountain load of evidence, what are we to infer? Why, that the basic facts are true.—The Echo (Ottago, N. Z.)

"TRANSCORPOREAL ACTION OF THE SPIRIT."

By A. M. HOWITT WATTS.

No. II.

"It is only when the person is asleep, or entranced (or in reverie!) that the spirit is able to leave the body; and it is only with persons possessing medial powers that it is at all possible."—Dr. Eugene Crowell's "Spirit World and its Inhabitants," Chap. i. p. 20.

Before introducing the experiences of another intimate friend whom we will call Mrs. A., the writer may perhaps, be permitted to give as a prelude to the far more remarkable narrations of her friend, experiences of the phenomenon in her own person, since they are in connection with Mrs. A. The following is from the diary of the writer, and shews how Through Sympathy one Friend visits another Friend.

April 1882.—"Upon returning from B. I was conscious in a very marked manner of that peculiar sensation very usual with me when I have quitted a friend or place peculiarly congenial. It is as though the body alone had returned, as if my real being were still with the beloved friend or at the beloved spot. Thus, whilst writing or reading I would become aware, as it were, of a second consciousness*—as to the body I was at home—as to the mind I was still with my friend Mrs. A. at B.

Within a couple of days of my return home I received a letter from Mrs. A., in which she wrote as follows :—

"Soon after you left us, L. (her maid)" came and told me that she had been quite frightened by running up against you. You were in the passage leading to the room in which you slept whilst here. You wore, she said, a Quakeress's cap." (I never, as to the body, wore such a cap; but I come of a Quaker race, and this was, I suppose, a symbol, in some manner, of my mental sympathies.) "She saw you in the same way, you will remember, years ago at E. We then thought that the apparition could not have been of yourself, but that it must have been the spirit of your Quaker grandmother, although it professed to be yourself. L. has beheld this appearance two or three times since you left, and during the daylight. I have not seen this particular appearance;" (meaning, I presume, with the cap) "but I saw you on the day you went away, and every day since."

Circumstances occurred some weeks later which made me desirous to communicate by telegraph with Mrs. A. As Mrs. A. is in delicate health, I feared that the unexpected arrival of the telegram naturally might alarm her. My thought centred itself upon Mrs. A. I pictured to myself how she would receive the telegram, and my thoughts represented her to my imagination as seated in her accustomed chair in her favourite place in the drawing-room. As far as imagination could transport me to B., I felt that I was there. I had no desire or will, however, to manifest my "phantasm." On the morrow I received a letter from Mrs. A., in which having referred to the telegram, she said that L. (her maid) going into the drawing-room to fetch something which was needed—for that day, being more than usually suffering, my friend was confined to her bed—once more L. saw my "double," and this with unusual clearness. This was in the evening, shortly after the arrival of the telegram, doubtless at the time when my thoughts were consciously fixed upon Mrs. A., as I imagined, seated in that room.

Mrs. A. has frequently visited her friends in the spirit-form. This occurred one evening at the house of the writer in the following manner. The account is from notes made on the day after the occurrence took place.

* Also, as in anticipation of change of place; the same second consciousness will occur when about to leave home—already as to this inner sense I shall be as the distant place whither I am bound. Even this has occurred on occasions when as yet no prospect of any journey appeared to exist.

"Paying a visit to Mrs. A. in the spring of the year 1875, I was requested by her on my return to convey to our mutual friend Mr. M., a volume of the now rare early Spiritual Magazines. On a certain evening, by appointment, Mr. M. came to us to receive his book. The book was given him, with a message from our mutual friend; then was laid aside on a table. About nine o'clock, as we sat conversing, suddenly I became very strongly conscious of the presence of Mrs. A. in the spirit. Had she in the body of flesh and blood entered the room I could not have felt a stronger sense of her individual presence. This feeling became so singularly marked that I mentioned it to my husband and to our friend. The latter observed that he also was strongly conscious of the lady's presence. Saying this as he sat on the sofa, we observed his eyes close, and he was sunk for several minutes into a trance-like state. During this time he held a conversation with the presence invisible, if not unfelt by ourselves. He made signs that the volume of the Spiritual Magazine should be given to him. Taking it, he carefully turned over the book, page by page, as if searching for some particular passage. It contained an article to which Mrs. A. had desired specially to draw his attention. After this, in a tone of regret he exclaimed, 'Now our friend must leave us.' These words uttered, he returned to external consciousness. He told us that he had seen Mrs. A., and had conversed with her. He could not recall what had been said. She was attired in a flowing white dress girdled with blue. On the morrow I wrote to Mrs. A. mentioning what had occurred. In reply, she being too ill herself to write, her faithful maid L. wrote as follows :—

"Your letter much interested my mistress, and me also. I had been reading to my mistress, when about nine o'clock I went down to supper. On my return she said, 'I have been to see Mrs. Watts. I have heard them talking, but cannot remember what was said.' That she could not remember the conversation she thinks owing to her weak condition."

I am permitted by this lady to give the following very remarkable narratives of her experiences in earlier years of "Transcorporeal Action of the Spirit." They were written down by the writer from the lips of Mrs. A. In order to make the following relation clear, I may be permitted to call my friend by the imaginary name of Rose.

How Little Rose Travelled in the Spirit to Edinburgh.

Mrs. A. first consciously left her body and travelled in the spirit when quite a child. She was living in a solitary place in the South of England; during this early period of her life she felt frequently lonely and sad. An aged lady, residing in Edinburgh, and well-known in the scientific and literary circles of that city, had shewn great affection for Rose and the child became tenderly attached to her. One evening, lying awake in bed, the child, feeling specially unhappy, was seized with a yearning of love towards her old friend in the North.

Little Rose had from early childhood seen and conversed with spirits and angels. Upon this occasion, her guardian angels being present, she was assured that one of them would take charge of her body whilst the others should conduct her spirit to Edinburgh, where she could then see and converse with her friend. In what manner they performed the journey, my friend was unable to recollect. Nothing, indeed, is clear in her remembrance until she actually saw herself in the presence of the old lady, who was seated at her writing-table, occupied in writing. Rose, in her spirit-form, rushed forward joyously to embrace her. The lady at once recognised the child, but, as if in sudden alarm, raised her hands, evidently believing that Rose was dead and that she now beheld her ghost! "But I am not dead!" cried the child's spirit, "I am alive, I am come to see you!" "But how have you come?" exclaimed the old lady in utter astonishment.

Rushing forward with outstretched arms to embrace her friend, Rose discovered, however, to her surprise, that her hands and arms passed through the lady. Matter to her was no longer solid. Alone to her senses as a spirit—was spirit substance.

She could perceive her friend, and the objects immediately surrounding her; for instance, the writing-table, the chair, the writing materials, all that came in immediate contact with her friend were visible to her. Beyond this there was a vagueness. She touched the blotting-paper which lay on the table, but her fingers passed through it.

Meanwhile she was instructed by her guardian angel to wash, as it were, her hands in the atmosphere surrounding the old lady, whereby she appeared to gain a certain power to recognise the substance of material things. To such a degree was the power attained by her that Rose tore off a corner of the blotting paper, telling her friend that she would carry that home with her.

Upon this she returned with her guardian. In what manner she returned it is not possible for her to recall. She alone remembers that the scrap of blotting-paper which she carried being a material substance, became throughout the journey an obstacle in her passage through matter. Its presence seemed to reveal the existence of trees and of natural objects. Upon reaching her own home she could not pass through the glass of the window of her room whilst she retained the scrap of paper in her hand. To enable her to pass through the window she was obliged to lay the piece of blotting-paper on the window-sill outside, where, on the morrow, she found it lying.* Rose sent it to her friend in Edinburgh, who, naturally, was much interested by receiving it. (I have understood that this lady, a Mrs. F., well-known in Edinburgh society, referred to this remarkable circumstance in conversation with the late Dr. Robert Chambers.)

Later in life, when residing in the neighbourhood of London, but before her marriage, a still more remarkable thing occurred to Mrs. A. She had been invited to a dinner-party; was preparing to dress for the evening, when suddenly she felt too unwell to bear the exertion either of dressing or going out. Her evening attire was laid ready for her in her room, but she could only recline on her bed, overcome with this sudden indisposition, having most probably entered a state of trance as she lay thus resting on her bed. When the hour of the dinner arrived, she seemed to herself to be already clothed in her evening dress, and descended the stairs and entered a carriage, which appeared to her to be awaiting her at the door. Thus did she—in the spirit-form—arrive at the house of her friends. To her all was perfectly distinct; it was to her as vivid as if she had been present in the body of flesh, and blood. The most marvellous portion of the story, however, is that she was visible to her host and hostess, as well as to some, if not all, of the guests assembled. She was taken in to dinner by a gentleman, with whom she conversed. She spoke with him regarding certain things known to himself alone. This was to him a great surprise. At dinner she partook of fish. After this, upon the plea of not feeling well, she withdrew from table; then entering the carriage—which appeared again to await her—returned home. During the whole of the time the body of Mrs. A. was reposing as if in a trance, upon her bed at home.

The above experience is of so extraordinary a character, from the fact of the spirit-form of a living person being visible to various individuals at the same, and for some considerable time, that the writer would have hesitated to give it publicity, except for the constantly recurring experiences of a kindred nature now being made known, and well-attested by numerous witnesses, together with the increasing number of psychical manifestations of an identical nature collected and tested by the Society for Psychical Research. This narrative, therefore, stands no longer in isolation. The phantasm of the draper's apprentice, seen in the Welsh town by the mistress of the shop and customers, whilst he himself was hurriedly eating his dinner in a distant house, anxious about his absence, lately recorded in the Fortnightly Review by Messrs. Myers and Gurney; the phantasm of the sleeper in America beheld approaching by the whole of his family as they sat in their chapel pew in England, recorded by Mr. Josiah Gilbert in the Spectator and quoted in "LIGHT" (No. 88); the phantasm of the lady and her infant beheld lying on a sofa in the room of her invalid mother when she and her infant were lying on a sofa in her own home at a distance (see "LIGHT," No. 115), together with the partially kindred "Narrative" of the late Mr. Heaphy, all support the experiences of my friend as here recorded.

* For instance of glass being an impediment to the spirit body vide "From Matter to Spirit," chapter "Daybreak," p. 184, where a dying child requests his father to have the windows removed, saying: "Don't you see that the glass prevents my getting away? You must see how I am trying to get out and cannot get away." Vide also for similar instances, Dr. Kerner's "Seeress of Prevorst"; also Dr. Eugene Crowell's "The Spirit World and its Inhabitants." The worst; it was useful to open the window when a person was dying, had thus, probably, like most superstitions, a foundation in truth.

THERAPEUTICS OF BRAIDISM, HYPNOTISM,* MESMERISM, &c.

By MONTAGUE D. MAKUNA, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.
(Lond.)

This is a subject to which scientific investigators in this country have given but little attention. It was remarked a few months back in a contemporary medical journal:—

"For the last five or six years, Paris has been saturated with animal magnetism and hypnotism, owing to the wonderful performances of a clever magnetiser on the one hand, and on the other to the writings, clinical lectures, and demonstrations of Professor Charcot, Dr. Dumontpallier, and others."

Boston, Philadelphia, and other great American centres have also been seats of extensive psychological researches into these phenomena. Surgeon General Hammond, of America, remarks: "It is very certain that all the truth of mesmerism as a healing agent is accepted by the medical profession. Thus the ability to produce artificial somnambulism in some patients is not questioned, nor the fact that during its existence surgical operations can be performed without causing pain to the subject. These are matters that admit of demonstration, and they have demonstrated." Dr. W. B. Carpenter, the most sceptic observer, remarks that there is no adequate ground for regarding this condition of nervous sleep (hypnotism) as otherwise than real. Dr. Maudsley remarks: "Hypnotism, or mesmerism, is a kind of artificially induced somnambulism. In this state, mental functions are abolished, and all the actions of the subject are afterwards determined by the suggestions of the operator. Under the influence of these suggestions, the subject may sing, recite poetry, and perform the most absurd and outrageous actions." There cannot be a doubt that this psychic force is capable of being developed by the will or nervous energy of an operator, and its existence is made manifest to us by its influence in the same manner as the attraction of gravitation, terrestrial magnetic force affecting the compass needle, influence of moon on the tides, and even the existence of some of the elementary bodies, as fluorine. Dr. Daniel Hack Tuke, who calls it artificial insanity in his paper, remarks, in his conclusions from experimental researches in the psychological phenomena in relation to mental pathology, that this directly suggestive mode of treatment might be adopted in some cases of insanity with success, the medical psychologist availing himself of Braidism to acquire sufficient control over the patient's mind to direct the current of his thoughts from morbid into healthy channels. His recommendation to introduce it in our Asylums for the treatment of the insane, coming from so high an authority, is not without precedence.

The Guardians of the city of Exeter had employed one Mr. Parker, to treat the insane paupers in the Lunatic Asylum with mesmerism, in the year 1855. The tortures and mental agony accompanying such a degrading influence were loudly complained of by helpless sufferers, and the public feeling being aroused against it, the Local Government Board and the Commissioners in Lunacy thoroughly investigated the question, and expressed their strong disapproval of subjecting the insane poor of their city to such a treatment. Although no official sanction has been given for its practice since then, complaints have been made by the inmates, and no notice has been taken of them. No doubt, when the subject is looked into, and the mesmeric influence on one's mind, robbing him of his will, and making him live in the pleasant dreamland, as millions of Spiritualists do, is examined, it would be found to exert a great and often lasting fascination over some; nevertheless, it is an influence incompatible with the healthy functions of the brain and nervous energy.

Mesmerism has also been recommended as a substitute for vivisection by a class of anti-vivisectionists, not understanding that during hypnotic sleep the functions of the circulatory and nervous systems are perverted, and that as a sequence, the physiological and pathological actions of the remedies to be ascertained, would be counteracted and governed by the will of the operator. It has been repeatedly proved that this induced condition of the mind, after repeated experiments, becomes an inherent association of a weak intellect, is recalled automatically, and leaves the subject a deluded victim of the induced condition for the remainder of his life. Its professors do claim, and might claim, for the rare gift they possess of stupefying others' will that it is a source of mental training for the insane, but there are scores of cases of weak intellect in whom it proved a cause of insanity. They differ in no respect from mesmeric and spiritualistic mediums, who gain thousands of adherents among the fascinated portion of the community, especially in America, and who make their followers live the lives of dreamland, to the detriment of their worldly interests. It is this latter class who associate it with materialistic influences, charlatanism, and other impositions to deceive the weak minds. It is through them that all scientific investigations have proved futile to a very great extent, and mesmerism has remained from the remotest ages an art of mysticism—a secret of the few. As its influence on the mind is demonstrated to be perverse, the faculties of reason and memory becoming dormant, and the will passive, and as the different communities of Spiritualists who are influenced by it in their daily intercourse of life are known to be possessed of erratic ideas, mesmerism cannot be considered a rational treatment of insanity, and it should have no place as a trainer of weak intellect.

Therapeutically considered, it could safely be made to fill a place as a remedial agent. It exerts its action principally on the grey matter and the sensory fibres of the nervous system. The response to its action from the motor tract is dependent on the strength of the will of the subject. It acts powerfully on the sympathetic system, and through it on the circulation, and other organic functions of the body. It is seen at best advantage when the subject is put off his guard, and the operator does not make "passes," but confines himself to mental suggestions only. By its influence on the higher functions of the brain, insanity, somnambulism, catalepsy, hysteria, hypnotism, ecstasy, vivid imagination, trance, dream, all these conditions more or less associated with incoherence, are induced. Some of these states are seen in seances, drawing-room experiments, and on the stage. The other nervous symptoms caused are nervous sleep, hyperaesthesia, parasthesia, or metasthesia, of the general sensibility and tactile perceptions, sensations of pressure, sensations of temperature, tactile perceptions and judgments, and the muscular sense—in fact, feeling and touch as classified by Dr. M. Foster. In simple language, different classes of feeling and touch are either excited by causing pain, depressed by causing paralysis, or perverted. These nervous impressions are accompanied with hyperaemia, anaemia, or congestion. Nervous sleep, accompanied with congestion or hyperaemia of the brain, is refreshing, and sometimes dreamy; but with anaemia, it is restless and waking sleep. During this sleep, accompanied with anaemia and anesthesia of the parts, operations have been performed without the administration of anesthetics. It can relieve neuralgic pain, as toothache, headache, sciatica, &c.; and according to the mental suggestions, and the will of the operator, and the relative conditions of the subject, various organic functions of the body can be heightened, controlled, or arrested.

Those who desire to study the subject, would do well to peruse the writings of James Braid, W. B. Carpenter, Maury, Laycock, Phillips, of Paris, D. H. Tuke, W. A. Hammond, G. M. Beard, Baron Du Potet, and others.

* This article has been issued to the medical profession in circular form by the author, and notwithstanding the meers cast at Spiritualism, it is worth placing on permanent record on account of the recognition it contains of the healing power of Mesmerism rightly used. Spiritualists would deprecate its abuse as much as Dr. Makuna does.

OBJECTIONS TO THE REALITY OF THOUGHT- TRANSFERENCE STATED AND ANSWERED.

[The following is a clipping from a contemporary wherein Professor Barrett briefly replies to some objections proffered by Professor Thorpe to the reality of Thought-transference in the course of a paper which that gentleman recently read before the Leeds Philosophical Society.]

Mr. W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., M.R.I.A., &c., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science for Ireland, who has devoted considerable attention to thought-reading, or thought-transference, as he prefers to call it, writes as follows:—

I am glad to see that my esteemed friend Professor Thorpe has read a paper on this subject before the Leeds Philosophical Society, and I am not surprised that in his experience so far he has not found anything which is not readily explicable either by a code or by muscle-reading. I do not know how long Professor Thorpe has devoted to the study of this subject, but I can promise him and any other candid inquirer that if they will devote as many months as I have devoted years to the critical examination of this subject, they will inevitably come to the conclusions stated in the report of the Committee on Thought-transference (of which I happen to be the hon. secretary), to be found in the first and second parts of the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (published by Trilbner). These conclusions Professor Thorpe correctly stated, viz.:—

(1) That much of what is popularly known as "thought-reading" is in reality due to the interpretation by the so-called "reader" of signs, consciously or unconsciously imparted by the touches, looks, or gestures of those present; and that this is to be taken as the prima facie explanation, whenever the thing thought of is, not some visible or audible object, but some action or movement to be performed.

(2) That there does exist a group of phenomena to which the word "thought-reading," or, as we prefer to call it, thought-transference, may be fairly applied; and which consist in the mental perception, by certain individuals, of a word, a drawing, or other object kept vividly before the mind of another person or persons, without any transmission of impression through the recognised channels of sense.

It needs very little discipline in this research to discover the ready methods by which collusion or muscular action can be made to simulate genuine thought-transference. The use of the Morse code we especially refer to in our report. Let us examine the objections advanced.

1. Collusion requires a confederate, unless Professor Thorpe is prepared to charge Professor Balfour Stewart, Professor Hopkinson, Mr. Henry Sidgwick, Mr. Edmund Gurney, Mr. F. W. H. Myers, and myself, each and all of us, as being confederates. I do not know how the facts we have independently obtained and published can be explained on this ground.

If Professor Thorpe will refer to the document from which he quoted he will see that in our second report none but the committee knew the word or card selected in the hundreds of experiments there recorded.

2. Unconscious muscular action requires contact either directly or mediately. Even if we used contact with the various sensitives we have tried, which we do not, it is difficult to imagine how my touching a child's shoulders can make her think of and utter aloud (not write down, be it observed) the number, word, or card I have selected.

3. Information unconsciously given by the movement of the lips, &c., is excluded by the equally successful results obtained and fully detailed in our reports, when this conceivable source of error was rendered absolutely impossible.

4. Accidental coincidence between the thing selected and the thing said is a more plausible explanation, but is one easily reducible to numerical determination. This we have done, and we give, again and again, the precise chances—many millions to one—against mere coincidence being the true explanation.

5. Finally, there remains something new to science, and this, we assert, our researches have now rendered the most probable starting-point for any future explanation.

Our opponents in the materialistic camp say this is absurd; we must not admit anything we cannot explain (these are the very words which Professor Ray Lankester is reported to have said in his trial with Mr. Bishop). I mention this in the hope of being corrected if wrongly informed; hence they set up their own experiments and explain them as if they were ours, whereas, they are wholly dissimilar. Even taking their favourite explanation—the unconscious discernment by one person of the unconscious movements made by another, this surely is about as unsubstantial an hypothesis as well could be invented. Upon those who deny the position our committee have taken, the burden of explaining our experiments most clearly rests; experiments, I may add, which are not only recorded with scrupulous conscientiousness, but were conducted with a vigilant care which years of experience in the pitfalls of psychical research have taught us to exert.

In conclusion, I would repeat, what I am quite sure Professor Thorpe and Mr. Sudgen (whose interesting experiments I am most anxious to see) would corroborate, that no results of any scientific value can be drawn from promiscuous platform performances. I would, therefore, ask Professor Thorpe (if he cannot give the needful time to these researches himself) to believe that the same principles, the same patience, and the same caution which have guided him in the admirable scientific researches for which he is distinguished have been kept before us in the no less difficult, and we think no less important, psychological investigations conducted by the Society for Psychical Research.

MISS FLORENCE MARRYAT ON SPIRITUALISM AND OTHER TOPICS.

The following expression of opinion on Spiritualism by this lady is taken from an account of an "interview" by the London correspondent of the Philadelphia Times, and afterwards reproduced in the Pall Mall Gazette.

To-day I had a talk with Miss Marryat in her own pretty little house in Regent Park-terrace. She is what you would call a fine figure of a woman, tall and stately. When she talks she is most vivacious, very witty, quick at repartee, liberal in opinion, decided as to judgment, earnest in her views and happy in her anecdotal illustrations. I asked her first about her literary work. "How many books have you written?" I began. "I was counting them up the other day; forty-four." "Which of a long work do you consider the best?" "Her Lord and Master" is, I suppose, the favourite, but a later one, "My Sister, the Actress," is my favourite. "You have predilections towards the stage, Miss Marryat?" "You had better say positive tendencies. I have been acting and singing for nearly two years. I sang 'Lady Jane' in 'Patience' for nearly a year." "Do you act—pardon me—because you like it or for the sordid return?" "Both. Acting gratifies my inclinations and the pay satisfies my necessities. I was playing until last night in a new piece at the Novelty, written by a nobleman, and played by gentle people. Last night there was no play." "Are you still writing?" "Yes, very regularly. I am now at work on a novel." "What is it about?" "I can't answer you by telling you its name. I really don't know what its name will be. When I take the trouble to name my books the publishers always take a greater amount of trouble to change it. However, the subject is of the Double." "The what, the Double?" "Precisely, being in two places; don't you know?" I cast my eye around trying to grasp some comprehension of her meaning, when I caught sight of a reading table with several copies of papers with such suggestive titles as "Light," "Life's Link," "Death," and I understood in a moment. "Oh, yes, I see; the subject is Spiritualism." "It is, indeed. It is my first effort in that direction." "Are you then a Spiritualist?" "Yes; one of the most earnest and faithful. I have been for nearly fifteen years. I see you look surprised that a practical woman like me should embrace what you perhaps regard as a superstitious belief. But, dear me, I have seen the most wonderful things in seances. Now, I don't mean to say that there isn't fraud and chicanery in it, but it is the fault of the mediums who practise it rather than the facts. They use it for ill instead of with honesty of purpose. The primary object of my book is to expose the bad and support what I deem to be good." "Do you always write with an aim beyond making your story interesting?" "Not always. I simply get the characters going and they tell the story themselves. Ouida does the same thing. By the way, here is a picture and letter from her in my scrap-book. She was a funny little woman, with strange ideas. You, perhaps, know that when she lived in England she was not received by anybody. It was quite her fault. She never went out and never allowed anybody to visit her at her house, except men, and she had the house full of them. She was really very queer. I met her at the publishers', and have corresponded with her very regularly ever since. George Eliot always wrote that way. Amelia Edwards never makes up a plot. I don't believe Ann Edwards does, either." "Are you regular in your habits of work?" "No, not very. I usually work in the morning from breakfast to luncheon time. I am a wofully early riser, and I work four or five hours a day. There are people who think they can always write best at night. That is not the case with me. I don't believe anybody can work as well in the night as in the daytime. After luncheon I don't want to write." "And how long does it take you to write a story of the ordinary three-volume size?" "It usually occupies about three months. Sometimes I can do it in less. Once, under pressure, I did a story in little less than seven weeks, but that was pushing it, you know. Of course during that time I worked steadily, denied myself balls and theatres, neither went out myself nor received any person. It was a good novel, too—" My Sister, the Actress."

Professor. Denton is meeting with much success in his lecturing tour in Queensland.

LECTURE NOTES.

On Tuesday evening, May 15th, the Rev. John Page Hopps delivered at Langham Hall the first of a series of lectures which, we understand, will, circumstances permitting, be continued during the current and approaching months. The Hon. Percy Wyndham, M.P., took the chair, and, in a short opening speech, he introduced the lecturer of the evening, at the same time emphasising in no uncertain manner the necessity which exists at the present day for disseminating a knowledge of psychological science. Mr. Hopps' subject, "A Scientific and Spiritual Basis of Belief in a Future Life," was treated in an able and forcible manner, and was evidently thoroughly appreciated by all who listened to it. In saying this, we judge, not so much from the outward demonstrations of applause, which were not at all infrequent, and hearty, as from the rapt and attentive manner of the audience, who appeared to follow very closely the arguments brought forward. We noticed many well-known Spiritualists present. There was also a good sprinkling of strangers.

So far, so good. The C.A.S. are doing excellent work in placing information of this kind within reach of the public, and we trust they will be able to extend this series of lectures to the number originally proposed. We understand, however, that up to the present time only three evenings have been fixed, the amount of the Lecture Fund only covering the estimated expenses of that number of lectures. It would, we think, be a great pity were this chance thrown away. The C.A.S. have everything in their favour for a most successful continuation of a course of lectures which are eminently calculated to attract public attention; they have secured the moral and practical support of well-known public men; and the first lecture has proved that a very thoughtful class of people are attracted by them. It is years since such an effort was possible, and we sincerely hope the friends of Spiritualism will not allow the spirited action of the C.A.S. to languish for lack of practical sympathy with the work they have taken in hand. The estimated cost of the six lectures is £70; about half that amount has been contributed to date. We understand that if this sum is forthcoming the arrangements for the last three lectures are practically settled, and will be announced forthwith. Otherwise, no further action will be taken beyond the three evenings already arranged for.

This is not an advocacy of proselytism. We do not think it wise, under any circumstances, to bring the subject before people who are unwilling or unready to consider it, and we believe this is the view taken by the Lecture Committee. But while exercising a wise discretion in this respect, care should be taken that legitimate inquiry is not choked off or neglected. As we have on several occasions indicated, there is in existence, at the present time, a very widely spread spirit of inquiry. We can trace it in many quarters; the lull of the past five or six years appears to be giving way to more activity of thought and interest. We do not hesitate to affirm that many persons are not only willing but are in a fit state of preparation to receive reliable information on subjects which to a largely increasing number are of profound interest.

Special attention is requested to the announcement on front advertisement page concerning the next lecture. This will be given on Tuesday evening, May 29th, at eight o'clock, by T. P. Barkas, Esq., F.G.S., his subject being "Personal Experiences in Psychology." Joseph Cowen, Esq., M.P., will take the chair. It is hoped there will be a full attendance.

Money for reserved seat tickets cannot be taken at the doors. Friends will oblige by obtaining them beforehand of Mr. T. Blyton, 33, Great Russell-street, or at the office of this paper. This request was very scantily complied with as regards the first lecture, but to prevent disappointment tickets were given to applicants on the evening with a request to forward the value in stamps to Mr. Blyton. We are informed that of the tickets so disposed of, very few of the recipients have fulfilled their part of the conditions!

PIONEERS OF SPIRITUAL REFORMATION.—From an advertisement in another column it will be noticed that the Psychological Press Association intend issuing another volume shortly, of which Mrs. Howett Watts is the author.

M.A. (OXON'S) NEW BOOK.—We are requested to state, for the information of subscribers, that "Spirit Teachings" will be ready for delivery during the second week in June. There has been a little unavoidable delay, but the book is now being rapidly completed.

THE CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.—We are pleased to learn that the Council of this Association have decided to adopt measures to facilitate the use of their fine collection of books by the general public under certain necessary restrictions. The two parts of the library are to be overhauled, and a large number of books transferred from the reference to the circulating section. A catalogue is being prepared, and when complete, will be printed and issued at a moderate cost. Other useful projects are, we hear, on the tapis; e.g., arrangements are in progress for a series of private seances for inquirers with mediums who can obtain the simpler phenomena in the light, &c., &c. All this is capital work, and will do more than anything else to vindicate the raison d'être of the C.A.S. We wish them every success.

A SCIENTIFIC AND SPIRITUAL BASIS OF BELIEF IN A FUTURE LIFE.

A Lecture delivered by the Rev. JOHN PAGE HOPPS, at Langham Hall, on Tuesday Evening, May 15th. The Honourable PERCY WYNDHAM, M.P., in the chair.

We have arrived at a grave crisis in relation to that which is the very life and soul of all religious faith and hope—belief in a Future Life—or as I prefer to state it, belief in life unbroken by the incident we call "death." To a painful extent, to an extent that is far from appearing on the surface, unbelief or doubt has crept into the minds of even naturally religious men; and the dear old confidences of other days are rapidly becoming the dim hopes or vanished beliefs of these.

The cause of this lies right before us: there is no mystery in it. One might say, that, for the first time in Christendom, the human mind is coming to the possession of itself. Hitherto, except in conspicuous instances of exceptional originality and daring, the human mind has been in bondage to authorities, to masterful mental tyrants or stifling spiritual fears. Heresy has always been deemed a sin against God, and, as a rule, a crime against the State. Freethought was once equivalent to Atheism, while Science and scientific training, except to a few, were unknown.

Now, on every hand, the process of emancipation goes rapidly on. Everywhere we are for freedom, for individuality, for reality, for Science. In Commerce we push Free Trade; in Politics we demand perfect Liberty; in the dissemination of opinions we glory in the absence of restraint; in Religion we have adopted, as the very watchword of our Protestantism, "the right of private judgment," while the marvellous spread of scientific knowledge has led to a totally new demand for evidence and demonstration as to the antecedent of all belief.

All these tendencies of our modern life have led one way. There has come an inevitable loosening of the hold of the mere asseverator, with his creeds, his traditions, or his texts. Once it sufficed that the priest declared, that the creed affirmed, that the Bible taught; but now, slowly and surely, all that is coming to an end with vast numbers, and these not the least thoughtful, earnest, and intelligent; and, with the strengthening of reliance upon knowledge, faith grows dim.

What then is needed? Clearly a basis for faith on something more solid than the piling up of verbal assurances. We want rational argument, direct evidence, or scientific explanations; and these we must have, or belief will die. It is a large demand; many will think it a hopeless one; but I have such faith in God and Nature, such faith in the glorious hidden possibilities of man and the realm of mystery that hems him in, that I believe all we need will come, and come just when we need. "I have many things to say unto you," said the wise brother Jesus, "but ye cannot bear them now." And so it is with our heavenly Father in His natural revelations to His children. The eye to see and the power to use are marvellously adjusted; and, through all the ages, run the two great streams of human power and Divine disclosure; not because God is arbitrary or changeable, but because, by a beautiful law of harmonious adjustment, the consciousness of need leads to the discovery of the supply. Hence it is no matter of doubt with me, it is a certainty, that just in proportion as we really need evidence and fact these will rise upon us like the stately orb of day, when dreams are over, and the work of life begins.

Having said thus much, I now desire to deprecate the inference that I am going to try to supply what is wanted. I am too conscious of the gravity of the need, and the immensity of the evidence required, to profess any such thing. I shall be content if I can indicate a road, and give one or two hints about what may be found in it. My one object will be to show that the very Science which seems to be destroying is destined to be the glorious up-builder of our faith. I shall try to at least throw a ray of light upon this great fact—that Science is carrying us in every direction into an unseen Universe, and that this unseen Universe is everywhere felt to be the sphere of causes, and the source and centre of all the essential elements and activities of Creation. And here it is important to remark that the inquiry into a Future Life or an unseen Universe is a strictly scientific one; and is, as one has said, "a proper branch of the physiology of the species." It is only the accident of its connection with the question of rewards and punishments, and with considerations relating to the being and providence of God, that has made it a religious question. Rightly regarded, then, the subject of a future existence is a purely scientific one, and might be and ought to be investigated as a part of the great inquiry into the physiological or psychological development of Man. If we are to live again after what we call death; or, better still, if we are to live on through and beyond it, the cause of the persistence or continuity of being must be perfectly natural, and must be at this very moment in ourselves; and this is entirely an object of experiment and research.

To Science then we turn, believing that Science can only destroy our hope by giving us knowledge, and that it will only make an end of our faith by giving us evidence. At the same time, it must be born in mind that our faculties are limited, and that Science is relative to these capacities.

But beyond this natural and inevitable limitation to scientific knowledge, another limitation is imposed upon us by the fact that hitherto Science has been pursued almost entirely in the realm of matter in its grosser forms; and that we are altogether new to the witness borne by it to the unseen Universe.

For this and many other reasons, I shall content myself with being elementary and suggestive, expecting to demonstrate nothing, but hoping to indicate much, knowing that, in addition to the difficulty created by our as yet very limited acquaintance with what we call Science, but what is really only the outer rind and surface of Science, I have also to contend against the fact that the large majority even of religious persons are only in the elementary stages of knowledge as to the philosophy of spirit:—as witness their infantile belief in the "resurrection at the last day" as the only way of restoring the dead to life, and the only way by which God will or can judge mankind. What can at present be said to people whose conception of a Future Life is the "rising again" of the exterminated body? or who, without reflection, and as by a coarse animal instinct, laugh to scorn the assertion that "a spirit" is a greater reality than a body? or who tell us they must give up belief in Immortality altogether if the texts of Scripture they rely upon are in a book that is not infallible? It does not matter how good, or devout, or otherwise cultivated these people are; their ideas concerning spirit and spirit-life show that in relation to this tremendous subject they are only children.

Now I want to help to alter that. I want to get myself and others accustomed to the thought that if people exist in another world they exist there as "people," not as fantastic, stately, solemn or dreamy angels:—that if a man exists beyond the change called death, he is still a man, unchanged except that he has put off his body, and glided behind the veil. For a Future Life can only mean one thing, if it is to be a reality, and not a mere sentiment and solemn self-delusion,—it can only mean the actual going-on of the human being in spite of the incident called "death." If it is not that, it is nothing: if it is not that, we are only indulging in vain fancies: if it is not that, we may be pleasant poets singing of a fairy land, but we are not actual pilgrims going to "a better country, that is a heavenly."

In our study of the unseen Universe from the standpoint of Science, and in appealing to Science for evidence, it must ever be born in mind that the difference between Matter and Spirit, whatever that difference may be, is not the difference between the known and the unknown, the conceivable and the inconceivable. To the unscientific mind, indeed, the difference between Matter and Spirit is that, but the really scientific mind knows perfectly well that it is absolutely ignorant as to the real nature and basis of Matter. The Science of the present day has abundantly demonstrated its own ignorance, and confessed it, as to what even an atom really is. Besides, even in relation to the world of sense, it is confessedly true that the ideal world, or world of Consciousness, is immeasurably more vital than what is usually called the world of Matter.

At this very moment, it is the mind that controls the body: the gross is even now moved by the ethereal. Apart from the mysterious unit of vital power and volition, the whole body is a mere mass of inert matter. Spirit, or whatever we call that "unit of vital power and volition," vivifies and employs it. And, even when certain schools of Science refuse to include Spirit among admissible realities, they have to admit that they confront absolutely insoluble problems in the phenomena of Life, Consciousness, and Thought: they also admit that Life, and Consciousness, and Thought, are more demonstrable than the existence of Matter itself.

Mr. Huxley once bluntly said, to frightened religionists, aghast at the progress of materialism, "After all, what do we know of this terrible 'matter,' except as a name for the unknown and hypothetical cause of states of our own consciousness." I invite careful attention to those last words,—that what we call matter is only a name for an unknown "cause of states of our own consciousness." That is revolutionary in relation to the old materialistic assertion that the difference between Matter and Spirit is the difference between the known and the unknown, the conceivable and the inconceivable. It now turns out that states of Mind are more real to us than states of Matter, and that what we really know is not the actual condition of what affects us, but only how we are affected.

It was Mr. Huxley, too, who said:—"Matter" and "Force" are, so far as we know, mere names for certain forms of consciousness. . . . Thus it is an indisputable truth that what we call the material world is only known to us under the forms of the ideal world: and, as Descartes tells us, our knowledge of the soul is more intimate and certain than our knowledge of the body." And that is the deliverance of Mr. Huxley, the terror of divines who do not comprehend him! But let me tell them that in this passage we have a gleam of the unseen Universe a thousand times more definite and hopeful than could be extracted from an avalanche of ordinary dogmatic or textual discourses on Heaven and Hell. It affirms that the inner world of Consciousness is the only one we know at first hand,—that the external world is only an inference from our sensations. But our sensations are purely mental: they are, in fact, states of Consciousness; and not one of them in any way resembles the object that excited it.

We are, then, at all events, as sure of the inner world of Mind as we are of the outer world of Matter: and both are inexplicable. We do not, however, in ordinary life, doubt the reality of Matter because we have not the slightest idea of what the central, essential basis of an atom really is; neither should we doubt the reality of Mind or Spirit because we cannot conceive of a substance unlike that which we are familiar with as Matter. Thought may be, and probably is, accompanied by some corresponding change or movement in the substance of the brain, but it does not follow that Thought is produced or secreted by that change or movement, any more than that musical ideas are produced by the fingering of the keys of an organ, though musical sounds may be. Changes and movements in the substance of the brain may be necessary for the manifestation of thought in a certain way, but it by no means follows that the thinker is necessarily dependent on such material conditions.

So obvious is this that even so cool a thinker, and so poor a "believer" as John Stuart Mill, saw and fully admitted it, and even went beyond it, in his Essays, in which he very forcibly said that "the relation of Thought to a material brain is no metaphysical necessity, but simply a constant co-existence within the limits of observation:" and he added, "the uniform co-existence of one fact with another does not make the one fact a part of the other, or the same with it." "Experience," he says, "furnishes us with no example of any series of states of consciousness" without "a material brain," "but it is as easy to imagine such a series of states without, as with, this accompaniment, and we know of no reason in the nature of things against the possibility of its being thus disjoined." He even says, "We may suppose that the same thoughts, emotions, volitions, and even sensations which we have here, may persist or recommence somewhere else under other conditions." This is all we ask, and this is perfectly scientific. Sensation, Thought, and Consciousness, are all in ourselves, and are absolutely unlike Matter in all their peculiarities. In our present physical condition, Sensation, Thought, and Consciousness, are excited by certain conditions or states of Matter: but it is perfectly intelligible that we might exist under totally different conditions, and, by having a body adapted to altogether different surroundings, have precisely the sensations and thoughts we have now,—or even in an intenser form.

It thus appears that in relation to a world of Thought and Consciousness we have got hold of three solid facts;—that this world of Thought and Consciousness is at least as real to us as the world of Matter; that it is in every way, in all its phenomena and results, utterly unlike the world of Matter; and that its existence amid other conditions of existing causes is perfectly reasonable and scientific. This is something gained,—almost enough to bring us within reach of that unseen Universe which is the world of Thought and Consciousness.

Matter affects us then, waves impinge on the senses; thought under physical limitations is accompanied by physical phenomena; that is all we can say. For the rest, it looks as though the great realities, and the master of the fleshly house, were behind the veil; it looks as though an emancipation and not a destruction might come with the separation of our mental powers from fleshly control.

One of the greatest services rendered by modern Science is its singularly vivid presentation of the fact that all our senses are extremely limited in their range,—a fact which is all important in our inquiry into the possibility of an unseen Universe. It is a common and very natural mistake, that we see all there is to see, and hear all there is to hear. We have all our lives been accustomed to the five tiny windows through which all sensations come, and we inevitably fancy that they are adequate: but a very decided effort ought to be made to overcome the delusion,—very natural, I repeat, but very misleading,—that we now see and hear and touch all that there is to be seen, heard, and touched. Our five senses are all we have, and they measure only our poor range: they do not measure the boundless reaches of being far, far beyond our ken. We can easily imagine that our senses might have been four instead of five,—that the sense of smell, for instance, might have had no existence. In that case, we should have had no conception of odour; and, though the subtle causes all existed around us as now, we should for ever have been oblivious of them. Why may it not be that the lack of some sixth sense is hiding from us some still more subtle reality? From everything that grows there are physical emanations, and, as our sense of smell is acute or dull, we perceive these as odours. Why may there not be from everything that thinks and lives mental and moral emanations? and why might there not be a sense that would detect and distinguish these? Nay, may not the rudiments of that sense be actually active in our unaccountable feelings and instincts of attractions and aversion? and why may we not conclude that it is this very sense which has made some sensitive "thought-readers" and "seers"? Here again, we are on the very threshold of spirit-life; and the great suggestion is forced upon us, that when we get beyond the hidings of the body we shall develop mental, moral, and spiritual senses that will enable us to see and know one another in our inmost selves, and as we really are, and all that new and heightened life would be perfectly natural.

The greatest of all illusions, then, is the common illusion that we see, hear, and touch, all that might be visible, audible, and tangible. The truth is that we are all living as on the outer rim of an unfathomable realm of existence, and that all our faculties are adjusted to that narrow range. Beyond that limit we feel and know that tremendous forces and a multitude of objects exist, of which we are able to perceive only a minute part.

When we look, from a little distance, at a bush of sweet brier, we see nothing between it and us, but we smell its fragrance; and if we reflect upon it we may be sure that all the distance between it and us must be pervaded by something which we call the odour. The probability is that if we could see that something, the million vibrating points of fragrance, like countless waves of coloured lights, would be even more delightful to the eye than is the odour to the nerves of smell. Or, watch a magnet at work. From a distance, or through some dense substance, it can attract a solid bar of iron. You can see nothing, but you are sure there is something between them: and if your eyes were keen enough you would probably see an aurora with lines of flashing flame answering to the lovely curves revealed when iron filings are dusted around the magnet. But all this is on the mere surface of our earthly globe, on which we creep like tiny creatures; and the thin veil of atmosphere folds us in, at once our preserver and our prison; and what there is in the infinite beyond we know not, only the more we know the more we see there is to know, and the more is the seen dwarfed in comparison with the unseen. What we call the solid globe itself is really a tremendous assemblage of atoms inconceivably small—so small that no eye can see, no instrument reveal them: and all these myriads of millions of atoms are not at rest, but in endless motion, so that the solid granite rocks themselves are tremulous with ceaseless vibration at the very heart of every atom of them. What we call the vacant air is filled with light, and sound, and subtlest flashing forces flooding every tiniest space with music and beauty and ever flowing energy.

It is of the greatest possible importance, then, to get a firm grasp of the fact that there are many grades of Matter. It is a gross popular error that Matter is something solid that you can see, and feel, and kick the foot against. Matter indeed is that, but it is many things besides, and extends, to begin with, all the way from granite to gas,—then to odours, and to Mr. Crooke's "radiant matter"—and no one knows whither.

It will help us immensely, if we accustom ourselves to feel the extreme limitations of all our faculties, just as we must feel our littleness when we contemplate the mighty worlds of space. Science by teaching us the relative littleness of our planet, by proving to us that we are only one among many brethren, has enlarged the area of Life, and immeasurably multiplied the possibilities of existence. It has made it almost necessary to believe that other worlds are inhabited, and it suggests that worlds in many respects very unlike our own have inhabitants also unlike ourselves, adapted to their world as we have been adapted to our world, through the working out, during countless ages, of the laws of development and the survival of the fittest. It is perfectly conceivable that the working out of these natural laws may in other planets have developed races of creatures with organs of respiration, digestion, and assimilation which are practically spiritual or ethereal. It is only a question of environment. What has been done here on this globe has been done in harmony with natural law, adapting Life to the world in which it is found: and it is in the highest degree scientific to infer that the same process has gone on elsewhere; in every case resulting in the evolution of Life adapted to each particular globe. If that be so, the way is more than half constructed by which we may pass on to the realisation of the splendid truth that even now the spirit-part of man is developing powers that will enable it to survive the dissolution of the merely physical organism, and quite naturally pass away, to exist in an inner unseen Universe adapted to it.

Illustrations of the homeliest kind will help us here.

Take sound, for instance. This is a phenomenon which is produced in us by a rhythmical and sufficiently rapid agitation of matter. This is the whole of it so far as the external cause of sound is concerned. But it is well known that there are material vibrations that the ear cannot catch or translate. This has been shown experimentally by means of the sensitive flame which can be made to dance and sing to sounds, or, rather, to waves of air so exquisite, that our poor dull sense cannot perceive them. Thus it is literally true that if a sensitive flame had consciousness like ours, it would hear what we cannot hear, and surpass us as much in relation to the sense of hearing as some of the lower animals surpass us in the wonderful sense of smell.

The mystery of what we call "sound" is in itself a wonderful and utterly incomprehensible thing. Mr. Tyndall justly remarks that "the human mind cannot fathom" "how it is that the motion of the nervous matter" in the ear or brain can excite "consciousness of sound": for there is nothing corresponding to sound in what produces it: and though a whole park of artillery were discharged, the only result would be a disturbance of the atmosphere, and not sound at all unless an ear and a mind were present to catch the waves of motion and translate them into sound.

It is easy, then, to conceive of a Universe of sound under entirely different conditions: and to this, modern Science bears witness, in revealing the fact that we occupy and comprehend but a small space in the vast sphere of things flooded by and tremulous with ethereal and atmospheric conditions wherein the possibilities of sound are illimitable.

What is true of sound is as true of sight. We live in a world that is made luminous to us under certain conditions, and our sense of sight is the measure of our knowledge of objects, for the most part: but what Mr. Tyndall said of vibrations which the auditory nerves cannot catch, we may also say of objects that vision cannot perceive. "A beam of light," says Mr. Tyndall, "is a train of innumerable waves excited in and propagated through an almost infinitely attenuated and elastic medium, which fills all space and which we name the ether."

What Mr. Tyndall elsewhere calls "the luminiferous ether" may only be what we know as atmosphere in a more subtle state, but it is so attenuated and elastic that it can convey the vibrations answering to light at a rate of about 200,000 miles a second. Compared with that, we, in our ordinary atmosphere, may be said to be living in thick mud. What a suggestion have we here as to an unseen Universe, ay! and as to exquisitely subtle beings living their refined and happy life in it!

The other senses lead, in like manner, into the Unseen. There is, for instance, a great deal that is very suggestive about the sense of touch, which is the indicator of our relations to external things; and a very poor and misleading indicator it is. We are absolutely certain that there are forms of Matter that are to us quite invisible and intangible, and that these substances can pass through others that appear to us to be absolutely impenetrable. The gases, for instance, are as truly Matter as the solid metals, and hydrogen is as much a substance as iron: and yet the one is solid to our touch, and the other is as nothing to that sense; and the gas can readily pass through the metal. It is only habit, and the limitation of our sense of touch, that lead us to think of Matter in a certain subtle condition as less real than the denser substances: and, as the life-principle is itself something intensely subtle, it is quite conceivable that it might be united to Matter in such a subtle condition that we, with our present gross sense of touch, would be utterly unable to come into contact with it; nay, it is even scientifically conceivable that this exquisite living substance might be the organised body of a conscious living man, and yet that, while it might itself be able to readily pass through the densest substances, it should be absolutely beyond apprehension by any of the dull crude senses at present at our command. Every object is to the hand what the hand is to it. A hand more sensitive would realise things in quite a different way. A hand is scientifically conceivable, that should be subtle enough to pass through granite, and exquisite enough to feel the difference between oxygen and ozone.

So again, with the sense of odour which is altogether in us, just as the sense of hearing is. There is nothing in what we call odour that is in any respect like odour. Odour does not exist, as such, till the vibrating particles that produce it reach and affect the nerves and brain of a conscious being.

It is true that it is the coarse body that receives the emanations or vibrations that excite the sense of odour; but it is not the coarse body that detects the meaning of them. It transmits them to some subtle vital centre, to some exquisite refined inner sense, and there the vibrations or emanations are translated into smell: and it is a question that may well be asked:—Why may not that subtle sense be as real and as independent as the subtle causes that affect it; and why may not the unity of such senses made a unity by the consciousness of individuality, outlast and outlive the gross body, and exist independently in that Universe of the Unseen to which they even now properly belong?

Always and everywhere, as though impelled by an intellectual, not to say a spiritual necessity, civilised and, to a very great extent, savage man has regarded the Unseen as the sphere of first causes and ultimate effects. When a man simply cringed before the spirit-people of that dread Unseen, or grovelled before the lords many and gods many of its awful regions, that happened which happens now, when the adoring soul lifts itself to the Great Father, or when the man of Science finds in surrounding space the subtle forces by which all things live and move and have their being. In each case, the unseen Universe was or is felt to contain the great secret of all being. The authors of that very remarkable book, "The Unseen Universe," speak thus far the latest word of modern Science when they say, "We are compelled to imagine that what we see has originated in the Unseen. And we must resort to the Unseen not only for the origin of the molecules of the visible Universe, but also for an explanation of the forces which animate these molecules. So that we are compelled to conclude that every motion of the visible Universe is caused by the Unseen, and that its energy is ultimately carried again into the Unseen." Is not this wonderfully suggestive? All the sources and energetic causes of life come from the Unseen, and the energy thus produced goes back again into the Unseen. What if, as the splendid result, the Intelligence, the Personality, that are here grown and developed pass into the Unseen with their glorious gains! The suggestion seems to be actually forced upon us, that man himself is only one of many wonderful products of the all diffused vital energy. He is too feeble, too limited, too modern, to be anything but a trifling part of a stupendous whole; and all the world of Matter as we know it is also too much like himself to be anything but one of the latest products of the mighty creative Power.

If, then, we have to look to the Unseen as the source and the ultimate receptacle of all energy, it certainly does seem a natural and inevitable inference that the unseen Universe is the home of Intelligence. It seems monstrous to assume that Intelligence should only exist in connection with Matter in its grossest forms, and that the world of first causes and ultimate effects, should be the world of eternal darkness, death, and utter, hopeless solitude. Is it a rational conclusion that Consciousness should only exist in connection with the dull brain of which we are cognizant?

Besides, it is here that the great laws of Evolution, Continuity of being, and the Conservation of force, come in with their wonderful suggestions as to the persistence of Life beyond the bounds and barriers of the Seen.

It is surely almost forced upon us to infer the continuity of Thought as well as of Matter. It seems utterly unnatural to suppose that the lower should persist, and the higher fall and perish—that Matter should be able to ebb into the Unseen and flow again into the Seen, and Mind alone rise and fall on one solitary shore—begin and end on this tiny spot of earth. The inference, the longer we ponder it, becomes the more inevitable, that Life and Thought, no less than Matter, though they may know vast changes and pass into higher or more subtle forms of being, are destined to find their home in the vast Unseen. If, in the far dim past, some wise intelligence could have seen man in his early rudimentary condition, he would have seen in many a rough physical formation of the animal the first stages of a process of development that has now led on to the agile, clever, artistic man—would have seen the Raphael in the brute, the Shakespeare in the beast; and all that purely on the physical side. How much rather, then, shall we see in the Raphael and the Shakespeare, ay! and in the myriads of poor struggling, hoping, longing souls that have fought the battle of life and passed on, the rudiments of souls destined for the growths of immortality?

Here, then, we find our scientific basis of belief in self-existence now and in an unseen Universe. I do not at all profess that it is more than a basis, but I do think it is more than a theory or a hypothesis, grounded as it is on solid, though, as yet, little comprehended facts and laws. Spirit-existence is a fact here and now. Life and Thought are orderly progressive products of natural law, and they belong to the sphere of Spirit. In considering the various grades of Matter and of Life, we come upon Thought or Consciousness in an orderly ascending scale. Force, Matter, and Instinct, though all equally wonderful and mysterious, are all below it. It is in Thought and Consciousness that we, for the first time, come to Personality, and to that marvellous unity of Life which binds into one supreme act of self-introspection or reasoning the complicated faculties of the human being. Here we have something altogether new, in the actual production of a conscious being—a unity of Life and Thought. By themselves, all the atoms that compose our physical being are dead: how then, are Consciousness and Thought got out of them? As it has been elsewhere said:—"Your atoms are individually without sensation and intelligence. Take these, then—your dead hydrogen atoms, your dead oxygen atoms, your dead carbon atoms, your dead nitrogen atoms, your dead phosphorus atoms, and all other atoms of which the brain is composed—and, if you can, imagine how, from these, sensation, thought, and emotion are to arise—how, from the physical tremors of uniting atoms, things so utterly incongruous can come." Consciousness and Thought, then, are not even a property of Life: they are something utterly fresh, and utterly unlike everything else known to us. How can we help regarding them, then, as a farther stage of being, or higher reach in the marvellous march of progressive Life?

In conscious man we seem to see Life itself attaining a new and most important gain. In the plants and the lower animals it exists only as the unseen force that differentiates them from inert or inorganic Matter; but in man we see it under a new and most wonderful development. In his case there is not only vital energy, enabling matter to live and grow, but vital energy, individualised and become, one might say, self-conscious. We see vital energy in a condition of self-possession and practical independence—a unity in multiplicity—in fact, grown to Personality. This I call a supreme fact in the development of Life, and a fact of a very solid kind, seeing that it is no other than the growth of man, in the scale of being from Protoplasm to Personality.

Here, then, we come to what we call spirit existence now. The spirit is that unity of Consciousness and Thought which vivifies and uses the various functions of the body—the unity of Consciousness and Thought which persists amid all the changes that happen to the body, and even amid its total renewals from time to time—the unity of Consciousness and Thought which, just because it has attained vital or spiritual Personality will, we are entitled to say, survive the dropping away of the physical structure, and find itself at home in the unseen Universe beyond. If this were not so, we should have to contemplate an orderly and splendid process of development broken upon its attainment, and ending nowhere: nay! we should have to contemplate the lower persisting and passing on, and the higher failing in the very hour of its consummation. We have to follow Matter into the ethereal regions of its more subtle modes of existence; and shall we not follow Mind also into those unseen regions, especially when we see that matter everywhere seems to be manipulated and directed by Mind?

Thus we may reasonably conclude that the ultimate production of conscious spirit-personality is only the highest stage, on this plane of being, of the well-known process of evolution; and it is perfectly in accordance with that process, and with the great law underlying it, to trace that spirit-personality into a higher and more appropriate sphere of existence, and to find in the unseen Universe both its first cause and its final home. Assuredly we have here all the conditions of a state of being inconceivably superior to any known to us here. Imagine the life-principle united to a spiritual body as subtle and exquisite as itself, and having its sphere of activity in a world perfectly adapted to its own sensitive, ethereal form of existence; surely you would there have everything that could give the most thrilling realisation of life, with all its possibilities of progress and delight. Here, "in the body pent," we know everything only through the dusky veil of the flesh, and that hides a thousand times more than it reveals; but what will it be to pass behind the veil with our growth of spirit-personality—to know everything immediately—to hear, to see, to touch, to know at first hand without the veil between, to have our spirit-self to ourselves, without the earthly tabernacle to imprison it? Shakespeare finely makes Lorenzo say of the harmony even now "in immortal souls," that we cannot hear it because "this muddy vesture of decay doth grossly close it in;" and, time out of mind, the finest, rarest, noblest men and women have thus discoursed of the inner self.

And now, but one thought more—to every one of us a thought full of consolation. All God's Universe is beautiful with the law of progress: and all things move on to the music of His own heavenly will. Death, therefore, is advancement. What may it not be to the weary and heavy-laden who have all their life long dragged a maimed or poisoned body along, who might have cried out with Paul, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from this death-like body?" What may it not be to millions of us who have always been forced to think of our weaknesses and our liability to exhaustion, who have been painfully conscious of our slowness of thought, our feebleness of will, our easily besetting sin? All these hindrances are probably physical, and will disappear when the kindly earth receives the body that will be needed never, never more. What may it not be to those of us who have sent our oldest friends on before—to those of us, the light of whose eyes has been taken beyond the veil? I will tell you what it may be. It may be the emancipation from all that dimmed the vision and oppressed the heart; it may be the discovery that heaven and earth are not far apart but near, and that the very beings we thought we had lost had all along been preparing our place for us, even as Jesus said it would be with Him; it may be—but why should I say it "may" be?—it will be, it is the passing out of our darkness into God's marvellous light.

The current issue of the Baptist Magazine contains a paper entitled "The Spiritualist Craze."

Mr. Morse makes a statement in the Banner of Light of May 5th to the effect that "the best works on Spiritualism are nearly all of Continental or American origin." (?)

The Echo (Otago, N. Z.) regularly devotes a certain portion of its columns to the discussion and advocacy of Spiritualism. Mr. J. Braithwait, the proprietor, is a Spiritualist, and writes, we understand, under the nom-de-plume of "Scio."

The Rev. J. D. Shaw, formerly a leading and influential clergyman in the American Methodist Church, but who has been "excommunicated" for "heresy," thus speaks of Spiritualism:—"Becoming acquainted with a good many people whom we found to be Spiritualists, we were surprised to find them intelligent, industrious, upright, and honest. A little further observation revealed the fact that upon the whole they are fully up to the moral and intellectual standard of any other class. They are more numerous than we had expected, going up, it seems, into the millions, and compassing the whole social scope of human society. They are fast accumulating a literature that, whether it be true or false, has one striking feature, and that is, it is original, vigorous, and progressive. Their periodicals are ably conducted by men of learning and experience in literary labours. They inculcate a very pure and exalted system of morals, and inspire a hope for the life beyond. There is one fact regarding Spiritualists that is a little singular, and will merit mention here. There are many more people believing in Spiritualism than there are openly professing it, while there are a great many more people professing Orthodoxy than there are actually believing in it. We will close this by saying that what we know of Spiritualists is good, and compels our favourable opinion." No wonder Mr. Shaw was excommunicated. We should have wondered had it been otherwise.

Mrs. HARDINGE BRITTON will lecture at Belfast, May 27th. Liverpool, June 3rd and 17th.—Address The Limes, Hunsphrey-street, Cheetham Hill, Manchester.

PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA IN ANCIENT GREECE.

By A. J. CRANSTOWN.

As to guardian angels, which some commentators suppose this "genius" of Euthynous belonged to, is it not more probable that the old guardian angel theory, attributed to Hesiod, though some think it of Etrurian origin, but which is more probably an Aryan fancy born in India or Upper Asia, was in reality suggested to early speculation by the occult action of the living spirit itself, in a higher state than its normal one, comparatively free from the bonds of flesh and the brain, and capable of giving warning of coming dangers, either by what Schopenhauer, in his excellent essay on dreams and similar phenomena, in the second volume of the "Parerga and Paralipomena," calls "theoremic dreams," or by waking visions in a clairvoyant state, or by impressions, or by the voice, or by other means stored up in the secret armoury of the mysterious spirit. In one of the cases recorded by the Baroness von Vay, in her "Studien aus der Geisterwelt," one of the Intelligences communicating said that the true guardian angel was man's own spirit. Plutarch himself evidently held this view, for he states in his interesting essay on "The Genius of Socrates," c. 22, that "in addition to the lower part of the soul, sunk in the body, a purer part remains hovering over the head, as a star, and called his daimon or genius, who leads him, and whom the wiser follow." Is it not clear that what is here called "the lower part of the soul" is nothing else but the lower instinctive appetites and habits inherited from our long line of animal progenitors, and that the "higher part" is the Divine spark or atom of the great World-soul, which that soul distributes, in greater or lesser quantity, according to the capacities for reception, to everything that lives; life in a higher and yet higher and more intensive state, a life of continual progress towards spiritualisation being apparently the earthly work of this World-soul, so far as we can at present dimly comprehend its mode of working in the universe?

It is a beautiful idea which has been fully discussed by the Hindu philosophers, particularly the Vedantists, that in substance all souls are one with the world-soul, as is expressed in the celebrated formula "Tat-tvam-asi"—"That art thou," applied to all life, as a manifestation of this Universal soul, a doctrine which has also been affirmed by St. Paul, who states that God is that Being in whom we all "live and move and have our being." Goethe in his suggestive poem "The World-Soul," (Welt-Seele), says:—

"Ihm ziemt's die Welt im Innern zu bewegen, Natur in sich, sich in Natur zu hegen."

That is—

To move and vivify the world from within is the act of God,
Nature being immanent in Him, and He in Nature.

This doctrine is the fountain out of which the mystics of every country and every time, Hindu, Persian, Mahometan, Grecian, Neoplatonist, and Christian, have drawn their interesting and in many respects profound ideas. The highest point of wisdom of the Neoplatonists was the acknowledgment of this mysterious unity of all things (not identity) with the world-soul, or God; this going up or ascension in God was identified by them with the chief crisis of the mysteries; but the mysterious act of union (ἕνωσις) as described by them seems simply to have been a state of ecstatic dreaming, at least to the writer it is otherwise incomprehensible. The great Christian mystic, who took the name of Dionysius Areopagita, in the fifth century, wrote to prove that Christianity was nothing but the Platonic mystic philosophy, and that its chief end was (θεωσις) deification or consciousness of oneness with God, and (ἑνωσις) union, effected by means of καθάρσις, purification, cleansing, at-one-ment, and φωτισμός, enlightenment.

Is it not probable that the foundation of all mysticism is this double consciousness which exists in the soul, this combat between good and evil, between our inherited low instincts and our higher aspirations—a combat which seems everywhere being fought out in the phenomenal world, and which goes far logically to justify, or at all events to account for, the duality of the Zoroastrian religion, and its offshoot Manichæism (which affected Christianity so powerfully), in which the good and evil principles, or Gods, Ormuzd and Ahriman, were twins and joint creators of our strange world. These religions nevertheless contain dim hints and prophecies of the final triumph of good, and the reconciliation of Ahriman with Ormuzd in unity. The great body of the Christian Churches have unfortunately for their influence in this age not only adopted the first part of this dual theory, in making evil (Satan—Devil) joint mover and director of this world with God, but have with their dogma of hell and everlasting punishment of individuals left out the second portion, the final absorption of all evil into good. This never-ending battle in the soul leads to two contradicting principles, both facts of human consciousness, and therefore equally true, though at present apparently in opposition; namely, that man is dependent upon an endless unconditioned and incomprehensible cause of all being, and secondly, that as man does exist, as an Ego or independent being, the final ground of the decisions of his will (himself) are in himself, and not in the absolute Being. Is it not the attempt to reconcile these apparent contradictions that has given rise to all mysticism and even to all altruistic religion?

The weak point with the Mystics, as, indeed, in all optimistic religion, is, that in them the feelings, the heart, and the affections, predominate over reason and ratiocination.

It is a consolation to think and hope that this state of combat and contradiction in consciousness is only temporary, part and parcel of our gross planetary life, and that sometime and somewhere it will disappear.

Tholuck, a German writer on mysticism, eloquently describes the mystic frame of mind as follows:—"Such a Mystic preserves in his consciousness his relationship with all beings,* from the Pleiades to a grain of sand swallowed up in the lifestream flowing through the universe, and that in his own heart is the purest source of God; and gazing with the spiritual eye into that abyss where the eternal flows into the temporal, and inflamed with a blessed love for this mysterious basis and ground of his being, he is absorbed in the eternal life, in endless freedom and bliss to be won through the task of this temporal life, limited freedom, and short bliss. His life becomes a water-mirror ever calm and undisturbed, so that the sun may be reflected therein, towards which he is ever o'ermastered by love and longing." Mysticism, in its best form, and when free from selfishness, which is the rock on which it is often shipwrecked, as witness the inordinate pride and savage cruelties of so many celebrated Hindu ascetics, of Elijah, the Jewish prophet and Mystic, and the many other Mystics of all religions, is, perhaps, the richest and most profound creation of the spiritual life; but for this it must rest on humility, which St. Bernard calls the "Mother of all the Virtues," and not on pride, which is but too often its basis. The Christian Mystics, however, contrast most favourably in this respect with the Orientals, always excepting the Buddhists, than whom none were more self-denying and sympathetic.

To return to this theory of guardian angels.

I may mention that Empedocles, a Mystic and Seer, long after Hesiod, also contributed to spread abroad the notion, as did also the poet Menander, still later, who tells us, "To each mortal at birth a daimon is provided to lead him aright—a good Mystagogue for life;" but it would seem that the better interpretation of this daimon, is, that it is the enlightened human spirit itself, in the higher abnormal psychical states. This subject is also mentioned in Plato's Republic; also in Porphyry's Commentary thereon in Stobæus Ecl. L. 11, 8: Horace also alludes to the subject in his II. Epistle 2, 187, as follows:—

* The same doctrine as that formulated in the Vedantic philosophy and contained in its "Great Word," Tat-tvam-asi—That art thou.

"Scit Genius, natale comes qui temperat astrum, Naturæ deus humanæ, mortalis in unum—
Quodque caput, vultu mutabilis, albus et ater."

Jamblichus also in "De Mysteriis Aegypti," ix. c. 6. Proclus also in Commentary to Alcibiades.

The Preparation of Inquirers and the Graduation of the Phenomena.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Your correspondents "G. D. Haughton" and "S.," express opinions adverse to those contained in my last communication in reference to "The preparation of inquirers and the graduation of phenomena." I fear their remarks have arisen from a misapprehension of the ideas I desired to convey, the expression of which, on re-perusal, I acknowledge is somewhat obscure. They infer that I desire to discountenance the presentation of records of phenomena to friends and the general public, while my design was to show that advanced physical phenomena should not be hastily and miscellaneous submitted to public and personal inspection. So far from condemning the published records of phenomena, I am of opinion that if they be carefully and accurately expressed and well authenticated, they furnish the most effective mode of breaking down the barriers of prejudice and preparing the minds of readers for the examination of the phenomena. A writer takes his chance of a sympathetic, capable, or prejudiced body of readers, and does his work at hazard; but the verbal relation of his facts should, as much as possible, be placed before judicial, tolerant, and open-minded listeners, not to jeering buffoons. There are thousands of persons to whom I should no more think of relating occult experiences than I should think of relating them to a stone wall or a rolling river.

A lecturer on occult phenomena is, practically, in the position of a writer; he must take such an audience as gathers to hear him, and hope that a proportion, at least, are adapted to hear and logically consider the facts he adduces.

There are, doubtless, here and there inexperienced persons who might, with advantage, be admitted to witness the higher phenomena; but they are the exception, and the lady who was introduced to a séance by Mr. Damiani was probably one of them.

Long experience, however, has shewn me that the great majority of mankind are unfitted for observing the higher developments without preliminary training in the observation of more elementary phenomena.—I am, &c.,

Newcastle-on-Tyne, May 18th, 1883.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—After two years' investigation into Spiritualism the suggestion I would respectfully make is that Spiritualism should be prepared for investigators. This may seem strange and opposed to what you recommend, but when I have briefly recorded some of my own experience I know the course I have suggested will prove to be the more practical. You say, "Our work and duty lie in so using the improved knowledge and opportunities at our command as to ensure another step forward in days to come." I quite agree with you.

My experiences at our home circle, to say nothing of the many addresses I have heard through public mediums, leave me no alternative but that of a full knowledge that those whom we have been accustomed to call dead are not dead, but have gone before; and that under certain conditions they can commune with us, the good ones to our eternal or spiritual advancement, and the bad ones to retard our progress. How have I discovered this? Not by anyone in the flesh preparing me for investigation; and, as yet, I am in ignorance of having been prepared by anyone in the spirit world. However, I am willing to imagine there has been a still small voice whispering in my ear "Persevere, persevere."

Difficulties innumerable which doubtless all investigators meet, have beset my path, and for a time the intolerable has been tolerated, but the time has arrived when I must ask myself, How long shall these things be? It is doubtless the outrageous conditions that have confronted many inquirers that have caused them to turn away in disgust. These conditions seem briefly to divide themselves into three heads, first, the incompetent teachers on the public platform; second, stupid and dissonant literature; and third, the attempting to prove too much in the private circle. The incompetent lecturer, in my opinion, has done more harm to the spread of Spiritualism than anything else, with the exception, perhaps, of the frauds which from time to time have come into public notoriety. Unfortunately, in Spiritualism, as in almost every other ism, there is the ignorant as well as the intelligent element, and the great difficulty of all lies in the total inability of the latter to control the former. Societies have been formed for the purpose of propagandism, and no sooner have working conditions seemed possible than cliques have been established in favour of this medium or that, and if they could not have their own way they have withdrawn themselves and left a few pioneers to make their way as best they could. I know a society which is split and may fall to pieces on the matter of medium worship, and it is a question with what I will call the moralists whether it is not better to have one competent speaker a month, or even three months, than, for the sake of having meetings every Sunday, to have the platform supplied with any so-called lecturer that may happen to turn up. Lest I wound the feelings of some self-sacrificing mediums whom I know to exist, and to be doing a good work, whom I have met, and whom I respect, I exempt them entirely from the foregoing observations. It is with the mercenary "Jack Straws" that I am dealing, who give addresses on Spiritualism for nothing, but who intimate before leaving the platform that they examine heads at so much a bump; will wonderfully describe the sufferer's complaint on receipt of a lock of hair, and prescribe for the modest sum of half-a-crown. Is this Spiritualism? To me candid Atheism would be more preferable. It is nothing less than spiritual prostitution. At one time I took in three weekly periodicals and read them; if I had continued to do so till now and taken notice of all I read, I might have been a good all-round Spiritualist. Possibly I might have believed the possibility of truth and untruth co-existing, and both being right. This I discovered; one would publish all above a certain height of the wonderful, and I am prepared to prove the editor admitted into its columns that which afterwards turned out to be untrue, but he never said subsequently "in such and such numbers" our readers will find that which we are sorry ever found a place in our columns, and it remains there to mislead generations to come. Is this Spiritualism? I might as well have remained an orthodox believer: I have read some contributions from the pens of men who, I should say, were doing their best to enlighten their readers, but I must confess I was as wise at the end as at the beginning. The practical did not occur to my mind.

I have listened many hours in wrapt attention to the spirits who have identified themselves, and the universally consistent declaration from them all is to this effect: "We were once as you are; we still live but in another sphere of existence; all is more real with us than with you; we are enjoying the reward of all our unselfishness when in your state; or had we known when in your state what we know now, our spiritual condition would have been better; we have found no hell but that of a reproaching conscience, and our Heaven is the satisfaction arising out of a well-spent life." This is practical, and I accept it.

Private circles carry more conviction, I think, than any other means when discreetly conducted, but many in their desire to convince have failed by promising what the spirits would do, forgetting that spirits are as much bound by conditions as we are. A fact unexpected is quite as convincing or should be, as one for which the mind is prepared beforehand. In my opinion the best way to prepare an inquirer is to say, "Come, and see; I do not promise anything absolutely; there may or may not be that which will arrest your attention, and I will place all that I know at your disposal by way of information."

In conclusion I would say, if we would advance Spiritualism we must in our own lives be Spiritualists, realising the fact that whatever sacrifice we may here make in the interest of the truth we shall enjoy the reward of hereafter, and that all sham philanthropy must be relegated to the sphere of deceit and ignominy.—Yours truly,

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM,
CAVENDISH ROOMS, 51 AND 53, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

"The Spirit-Land." When the controls of Mr. Morse, or—for that matter—any other authorities, describe, for our edification and encouragement, the character and surroundings of the Life beyond the Grave, it is possible to restrain a burning desire to escape from the region of pretence and subterfuge, which is our present abiding place, and to grasp immediately the inheritance of realities, only by a due appreciation of the concurrent truth that the preparation for so glorious a future is best achieved here. The principle of orderly evolution is everywhere in force. Work out a life of righteousness here, a life of moral, intellectual and spiritual growth, with all its associated duties towards kindred wayfarers—and its goal shall be appreciably beautiful, with characteristics distinctly responsive to our need. "The essential factor of all happiness," we were told on Sunday night last, "is due to consciousness of the cause."

Is there a spirit-land? Where is it? What are its special features? Has it any relation to this? Is a group of questions which so obviously cover the subject in its most prominent aspects, that we were all prepared to find these divisions selected by the philosophical and earnest controls of our lecturer as the bases of their discourse. We affirm ourselves to be of the inhabitants of Spirit-Land: need we categorically say that there is such a land? Its location, in regard to yourselves, may be judged when we explain that, floating around your world is a belt or zone of spiritual matter which constitutes the first point of arrest for your post-mortem experience. This spiritual matter, thrown off from the world of your present cognizance, becomes again the agent for a continuance of the process, and other zones are developed, and again others, with properties increasingly ethereal, each forming a training school for humanity, and leading eventually to a sublimity of happy conscious life, which may be said to be the first real stage of spiritual existence. But throughout, all is very real, and as there is no barrier "over there" to the acquisition of knowledge, progress is continuous and assured, for the spirit as for the worlds.

The gradual unfolding of the natural conditions at work in the formation of terrestrial worlds was described, and compared with the analogous operations in Spirit-Land, whose perceptible features of mountain and vale, flowery mead and leafy glade, rolling sparkling sea, and fleecy cloud, combine to make the relation of each with the series as palpable in externals, as do the life and character of the inhabitants establish a personal affinity.

The spirit-land exhibits no violent contrasts upon physical comparison with this earth, nor do its inhabitants differ from us in essential nature.

The beauties of our world are exalted, refined, spiritualised: the people ennobled, with hearts grown wiser, souls grander; but we shall again be grasped by the same loving hands; and in the presence of the beautiful and the true, awaiting us, shall discover that the spirit-land is a real Home for a real Humanity, where God is our host, and our kindred are personal friends.—S. B.

The Regulation of Public Circles.

At the time of the issue by the Central Association of Spiritualists of their circular on the conduct of public physical seances, I did not feel myself able to go the extreme length with some of those who desired to put an end to public mediumship altogether. I cordially concurred in the recommendations made respecting the prohibition of total darkness and of methods of secluding the medium: but, acquiescing in the necessity for these restrictions, I was not prepared to go further. Experience had shewn that grave scandal had been caused by what it was proposed to abolish, and that was fair cause for interference. Beyond that I thought that we ought to have free-trade in mediumship. Interference was justifiable only on the ground of gross abuse and grave scandal. To prohibit the exercise of mediumship in public, and as a remunerative employment, seemed to me both unwise, unjust, and practically impossible. It would deprive very many inquirers of their only means of inquiry. It would cast an unmerited slur on many honest persons, and deprive them of means of subsistence. And it would cause a sporadic development of ill-regulated mediumship in private families which I should contemplate with dread. So my voice was for regulation of circles and not for their prohibition. It seemed to me that the energies of leading and expert Spiritualists should be devoted to educating the inquirers, to a study and exposition of the difficulties and dangers that may beset the inquiry, rather than to a wholesale damming up of the channels of investigation, or even to a serious interference with them.

And here I would express a strong belief that the action of the Central Association in this matter has been of the utmost service to Spiritualism. The air now is clearer than it has been for long past, and a healthier state of opinion was at once created. There is another point which lies very near that on which I have been writing. Is it possible to insist on some preparation of intending inquirers; on some graduation of the phenomena which shall prevent a man being introduced per saltum to the most tremendous phenomena, or treated as a novice to the most recondite philosophy of Spiritualism? A man is sufficiently curious to want "to see something," if there be anything to see. His mind is in a state when some very simple and elementary proof of the action of unembodied intelligence, or even of an unexplained force, is all that he can stand, and he is taken to some public circle where he knows nobody, is shewn what may be a very portentous fact—the temporary clothing or re-clothing of spirit with matter, the materialisation of a human form—but which to him looks like a clumsy fraud, a palpable imposture, and he goes away repelled, angry, and disgusted at the trick of which he conceives himself to be the victim. If he could have seen, under perfect conditions of observation, any small object moved, without visible means, over even a small space, he would have been impressed. If he had seen a similar experiment fifty times he would probably have made up his mind, and would be ready to go on and build on that foundation. In process of time—more or less long—he would be ready to look in the face that crowning evidence of spirit-power which was unwisely obtruded on his unprepared mind.

The question of the possibility of securing such desirable results is part of the larger one, which concerns the introduction of the subject to those who are quite ignorant of it. Spiritualists, as a rule, are enthusiastic proselytisers. Their zeal is not always, or even generally, according to discretion. They are so possessed by a sense of the reality and importance of their facts that they find it hard to understand that these may be quite uninteresting to their neighbours. Or they chafe at the general imputation of credulity under which they labour, and are anxious to prove to the world that they are sane and sensible, by giving a reason for the faith that is in them. Or, possibly, they are animated by the missionary spirit, and would save the souls of the ignorant by enlightening their darkness. Hence, or for some other kindred reason, some of them good and sufficient, we have a deal of proselytising among Spiritualists. I shall probably be almost singular in opinion and practice when I say that my habit has invariably been not to attempt to proselytise at all. With an absolute conviction of the truth which is an integral part of my life, I hold a strong conviction that I cannot convey it, or any conception of it, except to the mind that has been spiritually prepared to receive it. I believe that the inner sense of want must precede the possibility of acceptance, or even any interest in the subject that is worth speaking of. Curiosity may be aroused, and, like the straw-fire, it will blaze up and go out. Antagonism of a very bitter kind may easily be excited in certain minds; but from within, and spontaneously, as the outcome of a felt want, any real interest must proceed.

Given that interest, I hold it to be a sacred duty to satisfy, so far as may be, all reasonable inquiry. In discharging that duty no pains and care are too great; no time can be better spent. Hence, though I believe I have not introduced the unwelcome subject to any man, I have spent much time, and such care as I could, in placing at the service of others any knowledge of which I am possessed. Spiritualism—to use a clumsy word in a sense that it will hardly bear—is not like other subjects. It cannot be demonstrated on the spot like a problem in geometry, or an experiment in physics. Its philosophy cannot be expounded from authoritative text books. Its objects and issues are so far-reaching that none can presume to lay them down or limit them. And alas! that mongrel compound of folly, fraud, credulity, enthusiasm, and a little fact, which is known to the world through the police reports and the flippant ineptitudes of the penny Press, is the only Spiritualism that the average mind can take in. One of the truths that are clearest to my mind is the absolute necessity for a prepared mind in the recipient before any proselytising efforts can be successful. With such opinions it is obvious that I expect nothing from the promiscuous introduction of persons to séances for materialisation, even if such were held under much more perfect conditions than they now are, or are ever likely to be. In almost every case no good can come of such introduction.

Is it possible then to restrain the exuberant zeal which sees in every likely and unlikely person a potential convert? Certainly not: nor would I attempt any such repression. The zeal must spend itself, or it will eat the proselytiser up. Is it possible to instruct inquirers before admitting them, as of old the neophyte was admitted to the mysteries only when prepared, after long probation, and having proved his fitness? Surely not: the age is past when the law of obedience obtained. The modern Briton is a law unto himself, and would soon express a vigorous opinion of any one who attempted to apply to him any other law in this respect. Is it possible to graduate phenomena in the way which I have before described as so desirable? Again, I think not. The five-shilling inquirer will have his five shillings' worth, although the poor medium be driven to extremities even of cheating to obtain it. I think we must have free-trade in mediumship, and interfere as little as may be.

MR. W. E. COLEMAN, of Presidio, San Francisco, is now contributing a valuable series of articles entitled "Krishna and Christ," to the Religio-Philosophical Journal.

DR. MOSCK.—In the American comic journal Puck of April 25th, Dr. Mosck has a cartoon specially devoted to himself, in which he is depicted as the "prayer-cure pounder" in the act of knocking down the "old timers" (who are evidently physicians of the regular school) with a pair of great fists, on which are printed "worth £50,000 a year." Round his head is a band on which is inscribed the words "holy healing power," and he stands over the prostrate body of the Rev. Ward Beecher, who has evidently received a black eye. Outside the ring a crowded audience looks on, and a board on which are the words "tournament of sensationalism" is significant of the readiness of the American public to patronise anyone starting a new movement, no matter how far removed it may be from common sense. Puck concludes a short notice of the cartoon with the observation that "the old and effete methods of Messrs. Beecher and Talmage must now give way before those of the new Spiritual guide, who has already made Brooklyn medical men green with envy by his marvellous instantaneous prayer-cures. As for the proprietors of the drug stores, they have, we believe, already decided to call a meeting to take steps to suppress the Rev. Dr. Mosck, LL.D. F.A.S."

THE REV. E. H. SUGDEN ON "THOUGHT-READING."—This gentleman, in the course of a scientific exposition of the phenomena of "Thought-reading" before the members of the Manchester Medical Society, and the professors and lecturers of Owen's College made the following remarks with reference to "thought-reading" without contact:—"In some persons, particularly the young, there did exist the power of divining the thoughts, to a large extent, of other individuals at a distance. He could give no reliable explanation of this faculty, but as a hypothesis ascribed it to the remnant of a power of interpreting unconscious gestures and actions which he thought might formerly have been possessed by the human race. That inference was strengthened by the fact that the power was stronger in children, and diminished as we grew older and became more highly educated, when the necessity for its existence vanished. If the power existed, before the human race began to talk and write, of communicating ideas and impressions without speech or contact—as many animals seemed to do at present—it would become weaker as talking and writing increased, and was now extinct except in the form of humanity which most closely approached the savage state—the child. (Laughter.) He had another explanation—that a strong brain, coming nearer to a weaker and comparatively unoccupied brain, might communicate by some singular channel its ideas to that weaker organ, the plasticity of which would render more easy the absorption of such transmitted 'Brain molecules.'"

MRS. HARDINGE BRITTON will lecture at Liverpool, June 3rd and 17th.—Address The Limes, Humphrey-street, Cheetham Hill, Manchester.

THE WHITE LADY.

By A. M. HOWITT WATTS.

Many years ago the writer visited the ancient Castle of Blankenberg, belonging to the Dukes of Brunswick, situated on the edge of the romantic district of the Harz mountains, with its legendary Brocken, the birth-place of the supernatural in Northern Germany. "This castle of the Duke stands perched aloft on its rock, with its round towers, extinguisher-shaped spires, and antiquated battlements and gables; as you looked from the windows you imagined yourself in a place described by Froissart. The garden lay below in various terraces. . . . deep at their feet lay the little grey, clustered town; and opposite to the windows, at some distance, ran a high ridge of a hill, out of which stood upright, a jagged wall of rocks called the Tenfels Mauer, or Devil's-Wall. Behind hung slopes of fine trees, descending into an immense park; right and left stretched vast, solitary, flanking woods, the haunt of the red-deer and the boar; out in front extended itself one of those great bare plains with naked white villages, and others of those savage eminences of naked rocks, the most peculiar features of this country. In the castle we were shewn the portrait of the White Lady, who haunts this and many other castles in Germany. Truly, there was something mysterious in her look."*

Through the course of forty years the impression made on the imagination of the writer by this weird, grim picture of the White Lady, with her enigmatical, hard countenance and tall gaunt figure, attired in antiquated costume of white and black, has not entirely passed away. The portrait was in complete accord with the legend attached, and with this scene of the White Lady's hauntings in this castle of the Brunswick family.

Reference to the White Lady of German-palace renown, made recently in "LIGHT," has induced the writer to collect some few instances of the manifestation of this, as it would appear, almost ubiquitous phantom. Many others await garnering by readers of out-of-the-way and all-but-forgotten books.

In vol. V. part II. p. 187, of a German periodical, which appeared from the year 1840 to 1852—not dissimilar to our English Spiritual Magazine in object and character—and edited very ably by Dr. Justinus Kerner, author of the celebrated narrative "The Seeress of Prevorst" and numerous other works, is a short article relating to Die Weisse Frau†

The White Lady Appears to a Sentinel.

"In the year 1850 the Kreuz Zeitung, of Berlin," says Dr. Kerner, "announced as follows:—'The correspondent from Magdeburg writes: It is related in many circles that an appearance of the White Lady has been seen in the Royal Castle. (Where is not clear—at Magdeburg or Berlin?) I am able, from a reliable source, to inform your readers that, on the night of the 19th of April, a soldier of the Emperor Alexander-Grenadier-regiment, who, during the night, was posted in the Swiss Hall of the Royal Castle, maintains that during this time he has seen such an appearance. According to his account, which was immediately placed officially on record, a white female figure suddenly appeared, walking through the hall. He called three times to her, and received no reply. On approaching her with his extended bayonet it passed straight through the air."‡ On the 22nd of the following May occurred the attempt at assassination of the King of Prussia by Sefeloge. The excitement occasioned in the public mind by this alleged appearance of the White Lady, and the occurrence which so speedily followed upon it, occasioned the publication in Berlin of a pamphlet entitled, "The White Lady. An Historical Inquiry into the Legend, together with Observations of these Appearances since the Year 1486 until the Present Time," by Julius von Minutoli, 1850.

† The copy of Magikon, from which I translate, belonged originally to the late Colonel F. Bernard, who was long resident in Germany, acquainted with Dr. Kerner and various other earnest students of psychology, and is enriched by valuable autograph notes of the Colonel.

The real purpose of this brochure would appear, from internal evidence, to be to calm the excited mind of the public through the calm, lofty, and somewhat sceptical reasonings of the agnostic mind of 1850.

We gather from the remarks of Dr. Kerner that the first portion of this pamphlet is devoted to an inquiry regarding the probable historical personage whose phantom presence is manifested under the form of the White Lady of Bayreuth, and of Berlin. The question is discussed with considerable detail as to whether this apparition can in any way be identified with a certain Kunigunde, Countess of Orlamunde—of very ancient times—or whether with a certain Bertha von Rosenberg, whose apparition is recounted to have manifested itself also in various castles of the Rosenberg family, especially in Bohemia. The crime of infanticide, by some writers, has been laid to the charge of the Countess of Orlamunde, and was supposed fully to explain the restlessness of her spirit. This charge, the author of the pamphlet, however, on historical evidence, believes he has thoroughly disproved.

The second part relates exclusively to narratives of the apparition. It displays a decided tendency to discredit the accounts, and to regard the whole as a legend of the "raw-head and bloody-bone" category, a hint of this intention being covertly given on the title-page by a motto in Greek.

Dr. Kerner from his standpoint as a psychologist and a believer in the existence of hauntings and of earth-bound spirits, draws from the narrations other inference.

Space precludes more than the introduction here of the following extracts relating to

Appearance of the White Lady during the Wars of the First Napoleon.

"When, in preparation for the opening of the campaign of 1806, the French army, under Bernadotte, permitted itself an infringement of territory by passing through the principedom of Ansbach and Bayreuth, the White Lady began, in the Castle of Bayreuth, to manifest herself very uneasily and violently. This increased in so marked a manner in 1806, when Napoleon came to Bamberg by way of Mainz and Würzburg, and from thence, on October 8th, followed the army towards Jena by Cronach and Schleiz, that various French generals quartered in the castle were insulted and affrighted. During the through march of the French army in 1809, the division's-commander of the reserve of the heavy cavalry of the 8th Army Corps, General d'Espagne, was located in the new castle of Bayreuth.

"Towards midnight the ordinance-officer was driven by the sound of a loud cry to enter the chamber of the General. He there discovered his Excellency in the middle of the room beneath an overthrown bedstead. M. d'Espagne was found to be in the most excited condition, and after he had either taken a cooling draught or been bled (!) and had fully returned to his senses, declared that the black-White Lady—whose dress he minutely described in a manner that completely tallied with that of her portrait, had appeared and threatened to throttle him; at length she had pushed his bedstead into the centre of the room, and overthrown it on the floor with himself in the bed. The General, in much excitement, quitted the castle in the middle of the night and took up his quarters with the volunteers. He regarded this appearance as a message sent to him of approaching death; which, indeed, arrived for him in the battle of Aspern on 21st of May, 1809. By command of General d'Espagne, under the oversight of French officers, a search was made beneath the wood-work of the floors, and behind the paperings of the walls of the room, to discover whether there existed concealed passages by means of which the entrance had been obtained, and the apparent vision had been produced. The rumour of this fearful occurrence was noised, far and wide, through the French army.

"Twice was Napoleon Buonaparte in Bayreuth. The first time, May 14th, 1812, upon his march towards Russia, he dwelt in the New Castle. A courier had been sent previously, express, from Aschaffenburg, with a command that the room prepared for the Emperor should on no account be that in which the White Lady was accustomed to appear; also, that on no plea whatsoever should any one be permitted to enter the apartments prepared for the Emperor. Upon his arrival Napoleon enquired from Count Münster whether these commands had been obeyed. On the following day, before his departure, the Emperor was observed to be unusually restless and depressed. He exclaimed repeatedly, "Ce maudit Château;" and notified to his attendant that he would not again visit that place. He inquired with exactness regarding the costume worn by the White Lady in her portrait; but objected with impetuosity to the picture being brought for him to inspect. The attendants of Napoleon whispered to each other that the Emperor had passed a restless night, and had probably been disturbed by the apparition.

"Count Münster, who has given this account, also related that a few hours before the arrival of Napoleon, whilst making a tour of inspection through the apartments prepared for the Emperor, he was unpleasantly startled by the presence of a lady in the Palm-Gallery. Whilst expressing displeasure to the maitre d' hôtel that the commands of the Emperor had been thus infringed, and glancing again towards the lady, he recognised in her the White Lady—and she had vanished. We are informed that the White Lady has not since 1822 been seen in the Castle of Bayreuth after which appearance the Castellian of the castle died." He was said to have been of Prussian tendencies.

Kerner, writing in 1851, says: "Also in the Palace of Stuttgart has the White Lady recently been seen and this in connection with the death of a member of the reigning family" (of Würtemberg). "The deceased Queen Caroline of Bavaria," continues Dr. Kerner, "said to me the year before her death, 'I could relate to you many things which occurred, especially whilst we remained in the Castle of Bayreuth, which, spite of all investigation, could never be explained in a natural manner—but one is so laughed at.' 'You,' she continued, 'have not feared being laughed at.'"

Queen Caroline of Bavaria was step-mother to King Ludwig, the Princess Caroline of Baden, who, on the elevation of her husband, Maximilian Joseph, to the title of King in 1806, became the first Queen of Bavaria.

Queen Theresa, Queen of Ludwig I., the celebrated Poet-king and great Art-patron, died in 1854, of cholera. The White Lady's appearance preceded her Majesty's fatal attack. Colonel Bernard, in a pencil note referring to this event says: "In September, 1855, I asked Dr. Kerner if the appearance of the White Lady at the Castle of Aschaffenburg, in September or October, 1854, and mentioned in the Times at the time, were a fact. He answered me that Prince Adalbert, youngest brother of the present King (the late King Max) assured Dr. Kerner personally—he corresponded with him—that he (the Prince) was present at the time, and saw the White Lady. Three weeks afterwards his mother, the Dowager Queen, died."

To the student of psychology the question suggests itself whether the White Lady, whose manifestation appears thus ubiquitous in the royal palaces and castles of Germany, is alone one individual spirit connected, in some mysterious manner, with many families of reigning princes; or whether the appearance is that of a certain grade—or as Swedenborg would express it "Spiritual Society"—also mysteriously united with those families, manifesting always in one particular form and manner in the various localities, under kindred conditions. The function throughout of the White Lady—whether she be a unity or a multitude in unity—would appear, however, to be twofold, and fixed, namely to forewarn of departure from this mundane sphere or to dislodge intrusive power inimical to the interests of the illustrious family over whose fate the White Lady holds watch and ward. Thus she would appear to unite the office of revealer of irrevocable fate, and of preserver from avertable evil. Since the above was translated further information regarding the White Lady has come to the writer, which may be communicated to "LIGHT" on a future occasion.

PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA IN ANCIENT GREECE.

By A. J. CRANSTOWN.

But perhaps the fullest account of ancient opinion concerning the daimon or Genius is given by Apuleius in his essay on the "God of Sokrates." In it he says: "Now the human soul even when it is still situate in the body, is called a daimon. If, then, this is the case, a longing of the soul that is of good tendency is a good daimon. You may call this daimon in our language by the name of 'Genius'; because this God, who is in the mind of every one, though immortal, is nevertheless, after a certain manner, generated with man; so that those prayers in which we implore the Genius seem to me to testify this connection and union, since they comprehend the body and the mind, through the communion and conjunction of which we exist. There is also another species of daimons, according to a second signification, and this is the human soul, after it has performed its duties in the present life and quitted the body: this is called in Latin the 'Lemur.'" The whole essay is very remarkable; and it appears that Olympiodorus, in a scholia on the First Alcibiades of Plato, says distinctly that the daimon allotted to man "is conscience, which is the supreme flower of the soul, is guiltless in us, is an inflexible judge, and a witness to Minos and Rhadamanthus of the transactions of the present life."

Menander also, it appears, held the same view, that Conscience is the daimon, for one of his fragments says, "To every mortal, conscience is a God."

I have taken the above references from Schopenhauer.

Paracelsus has a very curious passage on this subject, "Damit aber das Fatum wohl erkannt werde, ist es dass jeglicher Mensch einen Geist hat, der ausserhalb ihm wohnt, und setzt seinen Stuhl in die obere Sterne. Derselbe gebraucht die Blossen seines Meisters: derselbe ist der, der da die praesagia demselben vorzieht und nachzieht: denn sie bleiben nach diesem. Diese Geister heissen Fatum" (Vol. II. p. 36). That is: "In order, however, that Fate may be correctly understood, we should know that every human being has a spirit which dwells outside of him, and has his seat in the upper stars (copying Plutarch and Plotinus as above quoted). This spirit makes use of the inclinations or impressions of his master: and he it is who impresses him with presentiments and fulfils them; for they (the presentiments) come to pass by means of this spirit. These spirits are called Fate."

The Roman Church adopted this guardian angel theory, together with many other ideas, doctrines, rites, and ceremonies, from the more ancient religions, and it seems to be now-a-days very generally received as true by Spiritualists. But if man, indeed, has such guardians, appointed to take care of him and conduct him in the right path that leads to peace, it would seem from human history that these guardians have not been very successful in their guardianship, and, on the whole, may be said to have rather failed than otherwise. It would not, indeed, be an easy task to guard man from himself and his lower nature, and his gross and cruel appetites. But what vanity it is for man to arrogate to himself alone, among all the inhabitants of this broad earth, the right to have guardian angels to protect him; surely, what are called the lower animals are in much greater need of such protectors, to shield them from the atrocious cruelty and heartlessness of the human race (let us hope in its ignorance, thoughtlessness, and subjection to custom), whose hands have ever been red, and whose hearts have been dyed with the agonised blood of so many of these helpless and innocent creatures, from the early times when they were sacrificed in hecatombs to appease the wrath of man's demon gods,* and in modern times unnecessarily tortured, and then mercilessly and painfully slaughtered for food, supposed, in consequence of the ignorance and prejudices both of the laity and of the greater number of the medical profession of the true laws of the chemistry of dietetics and of physiology, to be necessary or useful for human food. If this were true, what a satire it would be upon the Creator of the sentient world!

Not to speak of the cruelties everywhere practised, particularly in Christian countries, by men and even women, simply for their own idle amusement and sport; and last but not least, the intolerable agonies inflicted by vivisectioners in (it is to be hoped) the vain attempt, by such unjust and immoral means, to save man from the consequences of his own vices and ignorance, instead of weaning him from the vices themselves. We must hope and pray that a time may soon arrive, when, upon the living heart every torturer of the innocent lower animals, whether they be such torturers, directly or indirectly, may be inscribed the Vedantic "word," Tat-toam-asi,—That art thou.

We should recollect that in the turning round of the mighty wheel of necessity and of causation, each torturer may, in his or her turn, become the victim, and feel that "Tat-toam-asi" is true.

Truly man, who vainly imagines himself thus entitled to the special care of the great World-soul, has been himself but too often the most cruel and ferocious being on earth. It would seem that the true and only efficient guardians and preceptors of mankind are those set in motion directly by the World-soul itself, immanent in all things, namely, pleasure and pain; no doubt they, if sufficient time—"time the soul of Uranos"—be allowed them, will at last succeed in adapting man to his environment, and in improving that environment and leading him up to a higher condition, socially and individually, than he has ever yet attained, and this, by gradually making him more and more conscious of the in-dwelling of the Spirit in his own soul and in all that lives, and more sympathetic with universal innocent life, whereby alone he can obtain true pleasure and peace.

But although not seeing any evidence for guardian angels, the writer by no means denies that evidence has been produced for the action of intelligences and forces not of the visible world, and which are, in some cases, the spirits of deceased human beings; although a great deal of what is attributed at séances and elsewhere to the latter is probably due to the abnormal action of living human spirits; indeed the writer, in his own experience, has had some evidence satisfactory to himself of the fact of communion with the spirits of deceased persons as well as of symbolic dreams, impressions, and presentiments for his guidance on several occasions in life, but the question still remains, what is the source of such dreams, &c.?

* As, for example, when thousands of innocent creatures were slaughtered at the consecration of the Jewish Temple in Jerusalem, to appease and conciliate the Jewish tutelary god, Jahveh; this bloody and disgusting scene is described, I think, by Josephus.

OCCULT PHILOSOPHY.

By the kindness of the author, who is now in London, I am enabled to give the readers of "LIGHT" some conception of the scope of the forthcoming work on Occult Philosophy, "Esoteric Buddhism." A perusal of the letters which appeared in "LIGHT," will have prepared my readers for its contents.

Chapter I. Who are the teachers, and what is their message? The seclusion of Eastern knowledge.—Occult training.

Chapter II. The constitution of man:—the seven principles of which he is composed.

Chapter III. The planetary chain, through which man is gradually evolved and developed.

Chapter IV. The planetary periods. Rounds and races. Objective and subjective lives—Former races on earth—Periodic cataclysms—Atlantis.

Chapter V. Devachan: spiritual destinies of the Ego—Karma—Divisions of the principles at death—Progress of the higher dual—Subjective progress—Earthly connection with Devachan.

Chapter VI. Kama loca. The astral shell, its habitat and nature; its surviving impulses—Elementals—Accidents and suicides—Lost personalities.

Chapter VII. The human life wave. Progress of the main wave—Twilight and dawn of evolution—Our neighbouring planets—Intervals of re-incarnation.

Chapter VIII. The progress of humanity. The choice of good and evil: the second half of evolution: the decisive turning point—The survival of the fittest—Spirituality and intellect—Development of principles in order—Human evolution reviewed.

Chapter IX. Buddha. The seven Buddhas of the great races—Adeptship in Buddha's time.

Chapter X. Nirvana. Its remoteness—Preceding gradations—Partial Nirvana—The threshold of Nirvana—Para-nirvana—Nirvana attained by adepts—Conditions of its attainment—Spirituality—Religion—The pursuit of truth.

Chapter XI. The Universe. The solar system—the universal pralaya—The recommencement of evolution—Creation—The Great First Cause—The eternal cycle.

Chapter XII. The correspondences of the doctrine. Transmigration—The soul and the spirit—Personality and individuality.

I learn that the volume will be published simultaneously in this country and in America, about the beginning of next month.

THE Walsall Free Press of the 19th ult., contains a long report of a lecture by Mr. J. J. Morse on "What is Blasphemy?" The address was a singularly sound and forcible one, and contains many home thrusts against intolerance and bigotry.

"THE RUSSELL BILL."—In utter ignorance of the extent to which the new philosophy of Spiritualism is accepted and believed in by the people of Ohio, a bill was passed by the late Republican Legislature of the State which will add at least 10,000 votes to the Democratic majority in October. It is known as "The Russell law," and provides that in cities "of the first grade of the first class" throughout the State, a licence of 300dols. must be paid by "astrologists, fortune-tellers, mediums, seers, &c.," (1) who propose to continue their vocations. This is to degrade Spiritualism to the level of fraud, and to insult the enlightened millions throughout the country who would not exchange the consolations they derive from it, or the hopes with which it blesses them, for all the world beside. Spiritualism is not a superstition based upon a fable or a myth, but a philosophy of fact, born of knowledge and experience, and resting upon the evidence of the senses. . . . Our object in this article is not to vindicate Spiritualism—that is not our business—but as a Democrat to protest against an alarming legislative invasion of the rights of citizens as guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. The Russell law in question is a direct blow in the face to religious liberty, and to freedom of conscience, opinion and investigation. Bigotry, as it is encountered in social life, should be borne with as patiently as possible; but when it is attempted to give it the form and force of law, the alarm should be sounded, and the wrong stamped out with scorn and indignation.—The Examiner (Bellfontaine, Ohio).

LECTURE NOTES.

On Tuesday evening, May 29th, Mr. T. P. Barkas, F.G.S., delivered the second lecture of the Langham Hall series, his subject being, "Personal Experience in Psychology." Mr. J. Cowen, M.P., occupied the chair during the first part of the evening, but having to leave early, his place was afterwards very kindly filled by Mr. G. J. Holyoake. The audience was larger than on the occasion of the first meeting, and the interest evinced in the subjects dealt with was, if anything, more marked. At the close of an extremely able and interesting lecture (a full report of which we shall give in our next issue) Mr. Barkas announced his willingness to be cross-examined on the statements he had made in the course of his address. Thereupon for the space of about an hour, question after question poured in upon him, some, of course, irrelevant, but the majority shewing how closely the audience had followed him in his arguments. The questions indicated, moreover, in a very marked way the considerable amount of interest which exists on all sides in psychological subjects. Mr. Barkas and the Executive of the C.A.S. are to be congratulated on the genuine success which attended Tuesday evening's lecture.

Notwithstanding, however, this unqualified success, we exceedingly regret to learn that the amount of the Special Lecture Fund at the present time will not justify the Council of the C.A.S. in continuing the lectures beyond the three evenings already arranged for, unless very substantial additional assistance is forthcoming during the next few days. As we announced last week, arrangements as to lecturers, &c., for the full course of six lectures, are practically complete. All that is now requisite is the practical sympathy of those who appreciate the efforts that have been made.

"M.A. (OXON.)," in sending a subscription to the Lecture Fund, writes:—"A perusal of Mr. Page Hopps' address impresses me with a conviction that an effort which produces such excellent results ought to be sustained."

RESURRECTION.

Each night we seek a temporary death,
And are unhappy if it fails to come;
And morning dawns with life in every breath,
And the tongue speaks that for a while was dumb;
And when the longer death, which none escape,
Conquers our seventy years, or less or more,
It is but sleep that takes another shape,
And we shall surely waken as before.—Adapted.

REVIEWS.

"RETROSPECT OF A LONG LIFE—FROM 1815 TO 1883." By S. C. Hall, F.S.A., Barrister-at-Law, and Man of Letters by Profession.

Among the few men of literary eminence who, in the earlier days of the Spiritualistic movement, condescended seriously to investigate its phenomena, and had the courage to avow conviction of their genuine character, Mr. S. C. Hall has been one of the most candid and courageous.† His experiences of the phenomena, more especially in connection with the mediumship of Mr. D. D. Home, have been varied and extraordinary, and the cause has been greatly indebted to him for the very interesting accounts with which he has, from time to time, favoured the public in regard to them. His work in this direction has put the crown upon the valuable labours in many directions of a long and arduous literary life, the reminiscences of which are given in these volumes.

The causes of art and of literature in especial connection with art; of philanthropy and social progress; of temperance and religion, have all been very sensibly furthered by the labours of Mr. Hall. In his efforts—associated with his distinguished wife—in the investigation and promulgation of Spiritualism, he has been instrumental in furthering also, in no small degree, science.

Mr. Hall's "Retrospect" divides itself into three classes. Reminiscences of distinguished persons with whom he has been brought into intimate relationships and friendships; reminiscences of distinguished persons whom he has seen under circumstances more or less interesting and important; and thirdly, reminiscences of old states and condition of things now long passed away.

Mr. Hall says in his introduction, that in "composing the following chapters, he shall bear in mind that he is writing principally for the grandchildren of the men and women who flourished when he began life"—thus indeed it may paradoxically be said of this interesting book, that its antiquity is its novelty. "I was born," he says, "in the year 1800; thus, when joy-bells rang for the victory at Trafalgar, I was a child of five years old; when glad tidings came of the crowning triumph of Waterloo, a boy of fifteen; and when George III. died, I was a young man. I have reported in the old House of Commons such 'giants' as Canning and Brougham. George Stephenson opened his first line of railway some years after I became associated with the Press; and the Reform Bill of 1832 found me on the threshold of what is commonly considered middle age. Old Time and I have been so long acquainted that it does not seem presumptuous to hope there may be matter of interest in details concerning work I have seen him do."

† In two vols. Richard Bentley and Son, 1883.

Reference must here be made to a valuable letter printed for private circulation in 1871 and 1876, by Mr. Hall, on the "Uses of Spiritualism." It was extremely helpful to the cause.

Possessing an observant eye, a feeling heart, a retentive memory and great power of verbal expression, he has not failed in the following chapters to depict many curious men and past-away manners; the impression happily left upon the mind of the reader being a consolatory one; namely, that spite of the chaotic confusion and restless upheaval of mind of this transitional period, the present century has already brought forth a marvellous amelioration of human and animal suffering and a growth incalculable of the arts which tend not alone to the embellishment, but also to the comfort, the safety, and the social unity of our common every-day existence; to the universal spread of solid education and of general mental enlightenment.

Lucifer matches, lighting by gas, by the electric-light; railways, omnibuses and cabs—not to speak of bicycles; the Metropolitan and Rural police-force; improvement of discipline in prisons and asylums; in the army and navy; the penny-postage, electric-telegraph, telephone, chloroform, &c.—have been born into the world since our author was born. He has beheld the passing away of tinder-boxes, "link-boys," of the ancient "watchman," of sedan-chairs, of pillions, and of patters, of mail-coaches (pretty nearly), of the pillory, of the stocks, of flogging at the cart-tail, of hanging in chains, of the press-gang, of duelling, of factory slaves, &c. The changes in the fashions of dress, recorded by Mr. S. C. Hall, are in their degree not less remarkable.

These "Records" treat more especially, as already observed, of

The distinguished Persons known by Mr. Hall.

They, indeed, form a sort of "National Portrait Gallery" of the celebrities of the nineteenth century, where are gathered together sketches in pen and ink of the authors, artists, actors, scholars, statesmen, singers, lawyers, philanthropists, preachers, and last, but to the readers of "LIGHT" certainly not least, of some of the chief movers in the cause of Spiritualism, during its rise in England. Sketches will be found amongst others of Lords Eldon, Brougham, Denham, Earl Grey, Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, of Daniel O'Connell, Wilberforce, of Mrs. Hannah More, Miss Edgeworth, Mrs. Hemans, of Coleridge, Wordsworth, Tom Moore, Theodore Hook, Hood, Miss Mitford, Miss Landon, Lady Blessington, Count D'Orsay, Walter Savage Landor, Charles Lamb, Dickens, Carlyle, Longfellow, the Howitts, Dr. Robert Chambers. Amongst the artists and actors, of Flaxman, Wilkie, Linnell, MacIise, Mr. and Mrs. E. M. Ward, the Keans (Edmund and Charles), Charles Mathews (elder and younger), Macready, Keeley, Helen Faucit, &c. Various distinguished foreign literary and artistic celebrities were also of Mr. Hall's acquaintance.

In the present notice we can only glance at the autobiographical portion of the volumes, more especially in connection with Spiritualism.

The Career of Mr. S. C. Hall.

Mr. S. C. Hall was born in 1800 at Topsham, in Devon. Between the years 1815 and 1820 his father, Colonel Hall, was engaged in working copper-mines in the South of Ireland. Thus in his boyhood commenced his knowledge of, and sympathy with, the Irish. This sympathy continuing through life, enabled Mr. Hall, in conjunction with his wife—a lady born in Dublin—to publish those works which have connected his name with that interesting and ill-fated island.

In the year 1822 we find Mr. Hall already settled in London, acting as a kind of literary secretary to the famous Italian poet, Ugo Foscolo, who was regarded by the English Liberals of that day as a martyr in the cause of freedom. Our readers may remember that in 1871 the remains of Ugo Foscolo, who died in London, were borne back to Italy, and with great pomp laid in the cathedral of Santa Croce at Florence, between the tomb of Alfieri and the monument to Dante. The influence of this wild and passionate Italian man of genius, unrestrained by principle, might readily have had a baleful influence over the mind of a youth less well-balanced than was that of Mr. S. C. Hall. In 1823 he came within the permanent influence of a nature as calm and benign as the other had been noxious, although transient—namely, that of the very charming and intellectual young lady, Anna Maria Fielding, who, in the following year, became his wife.

Mrs. Hall wrote ten novels which were highly popular at the time of their appearance, and her shorter tales and sketches were very numerous. A tender, graceful spirit, full of benevolence and practical wisdom, characterised all that proceeded from the pen of this lady. She assisted her husband in the production of several works which bear their conjoined names.

From 1823 to 1840 Mr. Hall was more or less connected with the newspaper Press, firstly as a reporter, later as sub-editor and editor of various well-known newspapers and monthly periodicals, some dead, some still extant. In 1839, commenced his connection with which continued until 1871. "Nothing," says Mr. Hall, "could have been less encouraging than its prospects at starting: there were few or no writers on Art, while the condition of British Art was not only discouraging but disheartening." The Art Journal, however, after a few years, became a great success. Her Majesty and the Prince Consort awarded to Mr. Hall the privilege of engraving and publishing 150 selected pictures from their private collection. He already had been permitted to engrave for the Art Journal the pictures of the celebrated Vernon collection before they were presented to the nation. The report of the First Great International Exhibition, in 1851, also increased its circulation immensely. Mr. Hall, in 1880, bade farewell to his public, his artists, and his friends. In taking leave of the editorship of the Art Journal, he "felt that the promise which he had made at the commencement of his labours he had been enabled to fulfil to the letter—that he had found British art depressed, and left it prosperous; that he had been enabled to convince the public how safe and wise it was to obtain works by British artists." One very marked feature of the Art Journal was to "associate the Industrial Arts with the Fine Arts proper: to shew the commercial value of the Fine Arts, that beauty is cheaper than deformity, that it is sound policy, as well as true patriotism, to resort to native artists for aid in all the productions of the workshop—in every branch of art-manufacture. The proposal was new and startling—to illustrate the product of the manufacturers as works in literature had long been illustrated." There is not, we understand, a single manufacturer of note in the United Kingdom who has not been represented in the columns of the Art Journal; while of the International Exhibitions taking place in all parts of the world, fifteen were reported and profusely illustrated.

Besides his labour in the Art Journal, during the course of forty years, Mr. and Mrs. Hall, in conjunction, edited and wrote the astonishing number of some five hundred volumes. Amongst these we presume would be counted the volumes of the "Amulet," and the "Juvenile Forget-me-Not," not the least tasteful, both in their literature and embellishments, of the once so popular "gift-books," called "Annals." Amongst the "five hundred," would also be found several volumes beautifully illustrated by well-known British artists, "The Book of Gems of British Poets," "Book of British Ballads," "Book of the Thames," "Pilgrimages to English Shrines," "Midsummer's Eve," a fairy-tale by Mrs. S. C. Hall, together with several books devoted to the subject of Ireland and the Irish. In later years, also, appeared from the pen of Mr. Hall several smaller volumes devoted to the advocacy of temperance, also embellished with artistic illustrations. Mr. Hall was editor for some short time of Social Notes, a periodical established to spread a knowledge of various philanthropic movements and in all directions to advocate social reform. About this time Mr. Hall published "Rhymes in Council; Aphorisms Versified," a series of one hundred and eighty-five small poems, each containing a rhymed maxim, and dedicated, by permission, to the grandchildren of the Queen.

With reference to this little book, he speaks of having striven, in humble but fervent and prayerful hope, to inculcate rectitude, goodness, love, sympathy, gentle and generous thinking, humanity, patience, virtue, and piety—"faith, hope, and charity," in fact. And this, indeed, may truly be said to have characterised throughout their long career the labours of both Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall.

We will now turn, in conclusion, to the portions of these "Records" devoted to the subject of "Spiritualism."

Mr. Hall thus refers to his

First Knowledge of Spiritual Phenomena.

"It was in the house of William and Mary Howitt, at Highgate, that I became assured there was more than I had hitherto 'dreamt' of in the mysteries of Spiritualism, and was convinced of their truth. It was there Mrs. Hall and I first heard and saw things that could be accounted for in no other way than by admitting the presence of those we had known 'in the flesh,' and that we had, aforesaid, believed were existing after death in some other state; in a word, whose souls had not ceased to exist when their bodies died. It was there I first heard what I could by no possibility have heard, unless the spirit of one I had dearly loved, respected and honoured, was in actual communion with me. We were convinced; and the conviction arrived at five-and-twenty years ago, never left us or lessened from that day to this."

Mr. Hall, in another part of his book, writes as follows:—

"From what I have said concerning so-called 'Spiritualism,' in recalling memories of Lord Lytton, Serjeant Cox, Robert Chambers, William Howitt, and others, the reader will have no doubt that I am a believer in the reality of the phenomena known as Spiritualism. So was Mrs. Hall; as thoroughly and entirely as I am. I do not intend to give any details as to the evidence on which belief in Spiritualism is sustained. . . . Moreover, it would be distasteful to many of those who I expect will be my readers. Again. It is not enough for me to say I have had palpable, convincing, and conclusive evidence that those we call the 'dead' are 'living,' and can and do communicate with us—those who are yet living. I have had such evidence, not once, but many hundred times, in various places and countries, in the presence of persons who had never before met, and were totally unknown each to the other, under circumstances that rendered collusion out of the question, and fraud an impossibility—such intercourse with 'spirits' continuing to be repeated year after year, for more than twenty years. 'We speak what we do know, and testify what we have seen;' and if we are answered by him who will 'answer a matter before he hearth it,' I can but say as the wise king said, 'It is folly and shame unto him.'"

On the 30th of January, 1881, at Devon Lodge, East Molesey, after a painless and short illness, the gifted and amiable wife of our author breathed her last. This great bereavement may be said to have placed the seal upon the spiritual faith and hope of her husband, and fully shewed to himself and his friends the blessing which he had indeed received in his acceptance of the proofs of spiritual manifestations in the years gone by. Writing of this event, he exclaims:—

"It is a blessed faith! that brings closer and nearer those whom death has not, even for a time, separated from us; that makes 'certain sure' the actual presence of those we love; sharing our daily walks, our hourly talks; watching us with hopeful love; participating in all our anxieties, in all our joys; guiding us, helping us, averting from us evil and the influence of evil; bringing around and about us the holy and the good; giving us a foretaste of that 'overpowering of delight' of which the poet speaks; bringing palpably to our hearts and minds 'the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen,' and prompting to continual prayer, that when our Lord cometh He may find our lamps bright and burning in the household of faith!"

"Why shrink from Death? Come when he will or may,
The night he brings will bring the risen day.
My shield of faith no cloud of death can dim;
Death cannot conquer me—I conquer him!"

THE MESSAGE OF PSYCHIC SCIENCE TO MOTHERS AND NURSES.
By Mary Poole. London: Trübner and Co.

This is a rather discursive work in which a laudable attempt is made to apply the facts of psychological science to the duties of every-day life. Anyone who succeeds in that respect is worthy of attention. As indicating the scope of the book we may mention the chapters on "The Forces of Nature," "On Mental Hygiene in Sickness," "Thought Reading" and "Homœopathy."

THE West Pelton Spiritual Association having been promised a sixty-three years' lease of a piece of ground, are about to build a hall for themselves, in which to carry on their Lyceum work and hold their meetings. They have issued an appeal for funds.

"GIVE the faculty of vision to the blind and they see the sun and the clouds and the moon and the stars, of whose existence they had known nothing except by hearsay; give a new faculty to the human race, and we might discover we are surrounded by 'principalities' and 'powers,' some of them loyal to God and bright with a Divine glory, some of them in revolt against Him, and scarred with the lightning of the Divine anger." Lecture 22nd on "Principalities and Powers."—Extract from one of Dr. R. W. Dale's Lectures on the Ephesians.

"THE NOBLE ARMY OF HERETICS."—Charges of heresy have been preferred against the Rev. Heber Newton, whose progressive sermons have created so much interest in New York City and elsewhere. All the members of his church—with a single exception—still firmly adhere to him. One of them says: "Only one member has withdrawn from the church because of displeasure over the sermons on the Bible. On the other hand, we have had many accessions and the church was never more prosperous." Mr. Heber Newton is in good company. Jesus, Paul, Luther, and all the world's teachers, sages and prophets, have been heretics to the crystallised thought of their day. The heresy of to-day is the popular faith of to-morrow.

PLOTINUS ON MEMORY AND DOUBLE CONSCIOUSNESS IN THE AFTER LIFE. RE-INCARNATION.

I have copied the following from Taylor's translation of the treatise of Plotinus entitled, "Discussion of Doubts Relative to the Soul":—

The connection of these speculations with the doctrines now being put forward through the Theosophical Society, as also with much that is to be found in the book called "The Perfect Way," will be apparent to all who have followed recent discussion upon the points in question.

That either of the modern authorities referred to would accept the statements of the great Platonist in their integrity is, perhaps, not likely. The doctrine of the World Soul (which must not be confounded with Supreme Deity) has as yet hardly emerged in the later teachings; whereas it is an essential part of all Platonic theosophy. In fact, the latter may be said to concern itself rather with the involution of Divine and subordinate principles than with their evolution. But I have chosen the following passages as ripe for citation on account of their bearing upon questions with which our psychology is more conversant, and for the light they throw upon a point very strongly contested—I mean what has been called the "shell's" subsistence or life.

"With respect to memory, it must be considered whether souls, on departing from these places, recollect [what happened to them on the earth], or whether this is the case with some souls, but not with others; and likewise, whether they have a recollection of all things, or of certain things only. And in a similar manner it deserves to be investigated whether they always remember, or for a certain time near to their departure from hence. If, however, we intend to investigate these things rightly, what that is which remembers must be first assumed. I do not mean that we must first inquire what memory is, but what that is in which it is naturally adapted to subsist. [Plotinus here goes on to shew that memory, as of that which is past, cannot be predicated of any principle which is superior to time, as Deity, being, or intellect.] . . .

"To what soul, however, does memory pertain? Does it belong to that more divine soul according to which we subsist [Anima Divina of 'The Perfect Way'; sixth principle of the Theosophists] or to the other which we derive from the universe? [The sensitive soul is here meant; 'Principle' would be the better term.] May we not say that memory pertains to each of these; but that one kind of memory is peculiar, and another common, and that when they are conjoined, all the species of memory subsist at once; but that when they are separated, if both should exist and remain, each soul will preserve, for a long time, the remembrance of things pertaining to itself, but for a short time the recollection of things foreign to its nature? The image, therefore, of Hercules is in Hades. For it appears to me requisite to think that this image has a recollection of everything that has been transacted in life, for to this image life especially pertained. Other souls, however, being both these together have nothing more to say than what pertains to this life, and in consequence of being composite of soul and body, know the concerns of the present state of existence, or besides this, something belonging to justice. But we have not yet shewn what Hercules himself, who is without the image, will say. What, therefore, will the other soul say that is liberated and alone? for the soul, indeed, which is attracted by body, will recollect everything which the man did or suffered [in the present life]. In the course of time, however, after death the recollection of other things also from former lives will arise, so that some of these will be dismissed and despised. For the soul being in a greater degree purified from the body will recollect those things, the remembrance of which she had lost in the present life. But when she becomes situated in another body, she will then, indeed, departing [from an intellectual] speak of the concerns of an external life. She will, likewise, speak of the things which she has just left, and also of many things pertaining to a superior life. But, as many adventitious circumstances will arise in the course of time, she will always be oppressed with oblivion. What, however, will the soul which becomes alone [liberated] remember?"

Then follows a discussion of the phantastic power, to which it is decided that memory pertains. And then an objection, which Mr. Roden Noel has made very familiar to the readers of "LIGHT," is mooted. "If, however, memory pertains to the phantastic power, but each soul is said to remember, there will be two powers of the phantasy; the two souls, therefore, being separate each will possess a phantastic power. But since they are with us in the same thing, how will they be two, and in which of them will memory be ingenerated? For if in both, there will always be two-fold imaginations. For it must not be said, that the remembrance of intelligibles pertains to the one, that of sensibles to the other; since thus there will in every respect be two animals, having nothing in connection with each other. If, therefore, there is memory in both, what will be the difference? In the next place, what should hinder us from knowing this? Shall we say that we are then ignorant of the difference, when the one power is in symphony with the other; the phantastic powers not being separate, but that which is the more excellent of the two prevailing, one phantasm is produced, since the one follows the other like a shadow, and is subservient to it like a less to a greater light. When, however, there is a contest and dissonance between the two, then the one shines forth through itself; but it is concealed in the other, because in short that there are two souls is concealed from us. For both coalesce in one, and the one is diffused but not the other. The one, therefore, sees all things, and possesses some things indeed, but dismisses others, as pertaining to the other power. Just as when we have sometimes conversed with persons of a viler character, and afterwards betake ourselves to those who are more worthy, we remember but little of our conversation with the former, but much of it with the latter.

"What, however, ought we to say concerning the remembrance of friends, and children, and wives; and also of our country, and other things which it is not absurd to recollect? Shall we say that the image of the soul will remember each of these accompanied with passion, but that the superior soul will recollect these impassively? For passion, perhaps, was from the first in this image. And such of the passions as are of an elegant nature are in the worthy (i.e., the superior) soul, so far as it communicates with the other. It is fit, however, that the inferior soul should also desire the recollection of the energies of the other soul, and especially when it has likewise become itself elegant and worthy. But this inferior soul may from the first become better, in consequence of being disciplined by the more excellent soul, the latter, however, will gladly resign to oblivion the concerns of the former. For it may happen, that the latter soul being worthy, the former, which is of an inferior nature, may be forcibly restrained by the superior soul. And in proportion as this more excellent soul hastens to the intelligible, it will forget the concerns of this world, unless the whole of its life here has been such as to preserve the remembrance alone of things of the most exalted nature. For here, also, it is beautiful to abandon human pursuits; a forgetfulness, therefore, of such pursuits is necessary to another life. Hence, he who says that the worthy soul is oblivious, will in such a way as we have mentioned speak rightly. For it will fly from the many, and will collect multitude into one, dismissing that which is infinite [dispersed]. For thus it will not associate with multitude, but expelling it will live by itself; since here, also, when it wishes to be in the intelligible world, while an inhabitant of earth, it dismisses all other concerns. Hence, when it is there, it remembers but few things of a terrestrial nature; but it remembers more of them when it is in the heavens. And Hercules, indeed [when in Hades] may speak of his own fortitude; but in the intelligible world he will consider these things as trifling, being transferred into a more sacred place, and strenuously engaging even above himself in those contests in which the wise wish to engage."

Of the inferior, or irrational, soul, it is said in a note by Taylor that it is "an immaterial body, or, in other words, vitalised extension, such as the mathematical bodies which we frame in the phantasy or imagination, and the celestial bodies are of this kind." But using the term "matter" in the phenomenal sense, I conceive that every form manifest as extension may be considered material. Doubtless, to a more interior perception, every imagination, or creation of the phantasy, will be objective, and may to another order of life be just as material, solid, and "real" as our physical world to us.

THE PRESS AND SPIRITUALISM.

The following appears in the last number forwarded to us of the Moniteur Spirite et Magnétique (Brussels). It applies so generally to the newspaper Press in its attitude towards Spiritualism that we transfer it to the pages of "LIGHT." A Belgian journal of large circulation, that is, the Etoile Belge, persistently falsifies, it seems, and ridicules Spiritualism, and refuses insertion to letters in correction. Its last item of misrepresentation was, that there are only a few hundreds of Spiritualists in Belgium; in face of the fact that a large meeting has just been held in Brussels, and received reports from above thirty delegates from societies of Spiritualists in various parts of the country, who represented thousands. After commenting upon this the Moniteur proceeds to give the following outline of the position of Spiritualism:—

"Modern Spiritualism owes its vitality to two principles. * If these could be shewn to be erroneous it would die out. These principles are its facts and its doctrine. They will not be shewn to be erroneous by misrepresentation nor by ridicule levelled at the follies of novices and enthusiasts. Writers worthy of respect do not misrepresent facts that happen to be outside the circle of their actual knowledge nor do they ridicule serious doctrine declaredly deduced from facts. The sceptical Liberté of Paris has said that Spiritualism holds its ground through the morality of its doctrine, which meets the highest aspirations of humanity; and it grants that a people reared under it,* if such were possible, would form a model of social order.

"The facts of modern Spiritualism developed themselves at an epoch of positivist reaction against antiquated superstition. By many these strange facts were regarded as a new delusion imported from the New World. To ordinary men of science they were incredible, because not in accordance with laws with which they were familiar. The learned bodies disdained them, as has been their habit with every new order of facts.

"But there were some who investigated: among them was a practised thinker, and observant philosopher, an ex-professor, Allan Kardec. He studied them patiently and described them, with the logical deductions from them, in his 'Livres des Esprits.'"

"A quarter of a century has passed since then, during which time many men of science in both hemispheres have studied and published books about them. Some inferred from the facts an intelligent cause; some, the action of a neuric or psychic force; some, an automatic action of the nerve centres; some have pointed in the direction of the Satan of the Churches; some, who could not be shaken off the ground of materialism, leave the explanation of the facts to future materialists. But for our Etoile none of these will do; it pleases him to think he may disperse facts and inference alike by a discordant ringing of changes upon the words credulity, illusion, tricksters, dupes, and so on.

"But the facts are there, and are still being demonstrated, and related in a hundred publications in the languages of all civilised nations; and they force every experimental investigator into the conclusion that it is possible to communicate with beings of the other world. This is the fundamental basis of Spiritualism.

"But when we would go beyond this, we find ourselves as if embarked on a sea studded with sunken rocks and shoals, where we risk shipwreck unless we take reason for our beacon, and instructed study for our pilot.

"Much has been said and written about the progress of Spiritualism being retarded by conjuring charlatans and fraudulent mediums, but it is not retarded so much by these as by ill-instructed Spiritualists themselves, by those who have yet to learn that spirits take with them their falsities and follies, and perhaps vices, as well as their truths and virtues. The great value of these communications is to prove to us the survival of our being. Of this demonstrated fact the moral and religious consequences are immense. All inquiry and research in the question beyond this should be subject to the criticism of our reason. How grievous it is to see Spiritualists receiving as oracles, absurdities linked perhaps with some great name! What a fund, this, for discrediting pleasant to sceptics.

"A grave question is arising; a vital one to those who come after us. At the great renovation by Christianity a solitary doctrine came to replace idolatry. The renovators of our epoch offer two doctrines with their several systems of social reorganisation—materialism and Spiritualism. Which of these assures the highest morality—peace, fraternal love, harmony? The present cannot endure, for the dogmatic faiths under which the nations have been ruled are expiring under the blows of science.

"A Press which claims to lead the van of thought, to be our best possible instructor, but which meets this question, when not by silence, by misrepresentation and ridicule, degrades its office. H. D. T."

NOTE.—It must no longer be said that the Etoile Belge refuses to insert letters in correction, for a late issue of it, just to hand, contains a capital letter of correction by M. Bosman, giving what he calls the A B C of Spiritualism, concluding with directions for forming a circle similar to those sold for distribution at the "LIGHT" office.

PAPAL BULLS OF EXCOMMUNICATION.

The document which was printed in "LIGHT" for May 26th appears to have caused a considerable amount of discussion, its authenticity being questioned by Catholics in different localities. One friend tells us that it is "a garbled version of what is called the Minor Curse," and another who took the trouble to shew it to a priest was informed by the latter that "it was a libel on the Holy Father to say he issued the Bull: he never did so."

The "Bull" as printed by us was taken from the Theosophist for April, and was acknowledged in that paper as a literal translation of the document as it appeared in the Santander journals. As, however, it has been called in question, we have taken steps to secure, if possible, original information, and we shall in due course lay the result of our inquiries before the readers of "LIGHT." Meanwhile, if any of our correspondents can furnish us with reliable information as to the text of bulls of excommunication, we shall be pleased to hear from them. We must confess that the only "bull" which we have read, viz., that launched by Paul III. (we believe) against Queen Elizabeth, is very differently worded, and is a very mild document compared to that with which we are now dealing. As far as we can learn, a "bull" need not necessarily come direct from the Pope, but such instruments may be issued by bishops, and even by the inferior clergy. If this is the case, the explanation will probably be that the Santander Bull was the product of some narrow-minded and bigoted Catholic, more worthy of the Dark Ages than the nineteenth century, and in no way representative of modern Catholic thought.

Here we must leave this matter for the present. When further information comes to hand we shall most certainly make any necessary corrections or explanations, our first desire being, of course, to do justice to all.

In the meantime the following article by Signor Damiani (and which was in type previous to the receipt of the letters of denial above referred to) shews that measures of some kind are being taken to curtail freedom of thought in Spain, and at the last moment we receive a postscript announcing the fact of another excommunication having taken place. Where there is so much smoke there must be some fire.—[Ed. "LIGHT."]

Another Excommunication against the Spanish Spiritualists.

The appalling excommunication launched by the Bishop of Santander, has found an echo at Huesca in Aragon, the Bishop of whose diocese has delivered his curses against Spiritualism and the Spiritualists in the following fashion:—

"To our most beloved diocesans health and peace in our Lord Jesus Christ.

"For a long time there has been announced in this capital the starting of an organ to advocate the absurd and worn out ('fastado') error of Spiritualism. To-day we see, unfortunately, the confirmation of that rumour, and we, in fulfilment of the highest duty which is imposed upon us by our pastoral ministry, cry to all the faithful and beloved children, beware, and we forewarn them against the perusal of that heretical and calumnious publication which, under the title of Iris de Paz (The Rainbow of Peace), declares open war against all the religious sentiments, not indeed of the majority, but of the totality of our diocesans. Such a publication condemns itself ipso facto. A periodical which dares to proclaim as the only truth the ill-called religion of Spiritualism, which is wanting in formulas, in ceremonies, in ostensible cultus, condemning the religion which St. Laurence and St. Vincent sealed with their blood, is a gross insult, and as infamous as a blow in the face to the most pure and exalted of Huesca. A periodical which impugns the existence of purgatory, of Heaven, and hell, and which denies other dogmas proclaimed by the Holy Church, is heretical, and as such we condemn it. The insolent diatribes against an immaculate institution and the bitter invectives which it pours forth (vomita) against a most respectable class, are the ignoble weapons chosen by the Iris de Paz to succeed in the propagation of its impious doctrines in this noble land.

"We are confident in the orthodoxy, and common sense, and wisdom of our beloved children, that they will not directly or indirectly help in the publication of the above-named periodical at the risk of compromising their unshakeable faith, and the proverbial nobleness of the sons of Aragon. Nevertheless, and in order to avoid as much as rests with us, that anyone through ignorance, or moved by curiosity may take up and read the Iris de Paz, we cannot do less than to warn the faithful of this province—

"Firstly, that the errors of Spiritualism have been condemned repeatedly by the Holy See, and especially on the 21st April, 1841, on the 28th July, 1847, and on the 4th August, 1856.

"Secondly, that the above-named periodical in its first number of the 18th of this month, as the organ of Spiritualism, is not even licensed by us, and therefore no one can read it without committing a great sin, and even incurring the terrible penalties thundered (fulminadas) by the Church.

"Thirdly, that making use of our authority we declare that the editor, the sub-editor, the printer, the subscribers, and all who consciously favour the edition and circulation of the Iris de Paz, published in the capital of our diocese, have incurred in the above penalties fulminated by the Church, and

"Fourthly and lastly, we ordain to all the faithful who possess the published number to give it up immediately to their respective parish priests who will deliver it to our keeping in the shortest possible time.

"Given in our palace at Huesca, on this 22nd March, 1883.

"(Signed) HONORIO MARIA,
"Bishop of Huesca."

One would think that the fulminated editor would have lost no time in running to the feet of the Bishop to have his soul laved from the horrible blot. Instead of which he goes straight to the printer and has the excommunication printed in a supplement to the Iris de Paz. Nay, he even dares to question the good logic of his Grace as follows:—

"If the exalted pastor had simply called our paper heretical and excommunicated us, he would have only fulfilled the duty of his office, and we should have nothing to say. But when he calls our publication calumnious, we would say, that calumny means to make a false and malicious accusation against someone; but his Grace forgets to point out the paragraph of the Iris de Paz in which we have done so. Again, why does His Grace excommunicate us when we, for a long time, have ceased to belong to his Church?"

It is clear that faith, in Spain, is on the wane, as everywhere else. The Bishop calls his diocesans the noble inhabitants of Aragon; he should be reminded that those noble Aragonese are the same who fought incessantly for 800 years to get rid of the dominion of the Moors, and their tenacity is such that, ere long, they may cry to escape from the thralldom of that priestcraft which has repressed the noble Latin race up to this time, but which is now reaching the age of reason.

G. DAMIANI.

29, Colville-road, Notting Hill, W.
May 25th.

P.S.—Since writing the above I find in "La Fraternidad" a spiritual review published at Buenos Ayres, that another excommunication has been launched against the spiritual Press in Spain. "La Fraternidad" announces the fact in the following fashion:—

"The spiritual review 'La Revelacion,' which with great success has been published for the last eleven years at Alicante, has just been excommunicated by the Bishop of Orihuela, Monseñor Guisasaola. We congratulate our distinguished colleague on having deserved the honour of excommunication; for it is evident that he is successful in undeceiving the followers of Romanism, and in propagating our rational belief which puts down superstition."

It is clear that the Roman Catholic hierarchy have forgotten the legend of the forbidden apple, or they would not be so lavish in excommunications.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

A Séance with Miss Wood.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Yesterday afternoon a very successful séance was held in this town at the Society's rooms. Miss Wood, the medium, was secured in the cabinet which has been so often described. We had a good light during the sitting, and the diminutive form of "Pocha" was well observed; she shewed us her black arm and hand, then dematerialised in our presence. After the medium (still sitting in her chair), had been moved out of the cabinet by the invisibles, and while in full view of the sitters, a form shewed itself at one corner of the curtains, and quite out of the reach of the medium. Four forms in all were presented to us. The first form which shewed itself intimated by signs that it was a friend of one of the sitters, and it transpired that the sitter in question (a lady) had been given to understand at another private circle that this particular spirit friend, who only recently passed over, would endeavour to appear at our sitting yesterday afternoon. The medium, Miss Wood, was quite unaware that this friend was in the spirit-world.

OBSERVER.

Several correspondents of the Christian Life are very much exercised as to "that singular and most inappropriate sermon which was preached in connection with the annual meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, from the pulpit of Essex-street Chapel, by the Rev. John Page Hopps. From beginning to end it was little else than half-veiled Spiritism." (1)

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

CAVENDISH ROOMS, 51 AND 53, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

"The Dangerous Dead." If we say that the dead are sometimes dangerous precisely because they are very much alive, we may be speaking suggestively to Spiritualists, and very fairly representing one aspect of the question raised here on Sunday evening last by the Controls of Mr. Morse; but the presentation of the truth in that apparently flippant form will not, we fear, convey to the inexperienced mind a perfectly accurate appreciation of the situation. We must elaborate a little. The death of the body, which is, in fact, simply an incident in the life of the individual, suffices to transfer to another sphere of action that always conscious entity, and commonly, no doubt, to intensify character; but it does not necessarily or probably involve an early amendment of moral tone if that were exceptionally feeble here, nor readily readjust the springs of action for the perverted or misguided intellect. If, indeed, the departed belonged to the more or less criminal classes, from which alone danger after death is conceivable, there may remain a lingering fondness for vicious tendencies which, in earth-life, were, perhaps, associated with the only pleasures he ever thoroughly realised; while an especially aggravated disposition to reproduce sensations of delight or to cheek reformatory processes, at any cost of suffering to others, will infallibly result from a sense of recent wrong, not unlikely to be very acutely felt by those whose bodily exit from our midst was precipitated by legal action. The operator is there concealed; he is presently quite conscious of that fact; the door for his mischievous activity is kept wide open by the prevalent depravity, of moral and intellectual quality, among those whom he knows only to despise; and a psychological element of disturbance is promptly introduced among us, of which our philosophy takes little cognisance, which is misunderstood or ignorantly dreaded by ecclesiastics, and is somehow beyond the scope of scientific weights and scales.

The remedy for the unquestionable risk will be found in an adequate appreciation of spiritual facts and conditions, and in honest, earnest, zealous, truthful lives.

The dead preach a spiritual democracy. They see clearly enough that only those are great who are good, and to such they are, in no case, dangerous. They recognise the royal-souled and true-hearted, and themselves rejoice if regarded as their earnest, loving friends, ever ready to grasp their hands with an immortal grip.

If then we would avoid the danger, and dissipate the risk, associated with the misguided dead, let us labour to become individually a source of trouble to every form of wrong, that, with tenderness towards the wrong-doer, we may practically illustrate the better way by the purity of our own lives, and the discriminating justice of our own conduct.

On Sunday, June 3rd, the evening at these rooms will be devoted to "Question and Answer," a form of instruction which permits the introduction of topics which perplex individuals, and concurrently illustrates the resources of trance-speaking.

CARDIFF.

OBITUARY.—Passed to the higher life May 23rd at eleven o'clock p.m., in his fifty-third year, John Haynes, of Straura Villa, Castle-road, Cardiff, in the sure and certain hope of continued life in a wider sphere of spiritual activities. A close and earnest observation of spiritual phenomena for about six years had given him the full assurance of immortality and that peace which passeth understanding. The change for him came suddenly, as a thief in the night, on the 26th anniversary of his marriage. The bereaved wife and children, while mourning the physical removal of so loving a husband and father, yet share the same assurance which was such a comfort to him.

Being a Scotchman by birth, the funeral, which took place on Saturday the 26th inst., was largely attended by Scotch friends in the same branch of business, also by a good number of local Spiritualists. This is the second funeral in Cardiff conducted in harmony with Spiritual teaching, and the service, which was led by the writer, was pervaded by an earnestness of feeling, and listened to with such evident interest, that I trust it may prove to many to be good seed sown by the wayside, which shall grow and flourish unto full fruition.

EXETER.

Spiritualism is represented in this city by the "Free Spiritual Church," which exists simply as a centre of spiritual teaching and influence, having neither official basis nor external organisation.

At Michaelmas of last year, Spiritualism and Spiritualists were, in this place, non-existent. But the writer of this was impelled and influenced by a power and a wisdom beyond his own to come here—literally without pence or scrip—and plant the standard of truth in the midst of the people. We have now completed exactly eight calendar months; and looking back from this point, we can truly say that the results have been remarkable. The heaven was well put into the mass, and we have been permitted and privileged to watch the steady, gradual permeation thereof in every direction. Our cause has had really a romantic career, being fraught from day to day and from week to week with interesting and exciting incidents. The "management" has been entirely on the spiritual side; any arrangements of our own, not having the sanction of the invisible powers, have been invariably scattered to the winds.

We have reason to believe that the spirit world has selected this place for an original, and—shall I say—hitherto untried experiment or enterprise in connection with this movement; viz., a regular, systematic and universal spiritual mission or campaign, the official management being entirely on the spiritual side. At any rate, our most interesting experience has been to watch the methods of working pursued by the invisible powers.

Every evening in the week, except one, besides two meetings on Sundays, is occupied with general meetings for inquiries, and select circles for the development of mediumship, and the work proceeds as regularly as clockwork, the machinery being invisible. Mediums of the highest order are being trained for prominent public work, and are just now being gradually brought upon the platform, not by their own consent or management, but at the will of the inward powers. Whit-Sunday was specially chosen for the commencement of this feature.

We have not yet been permitted to invite eminent speakers from outside, such as Messrs. Morse and Wallis, but let me assure these honoured brethren, that this is only a question of time—they will be invited, and under the highest auspices.

The partisan spirit in this great movement is to be deprecated—the writer has, from the first, carefully sought to steer clear of this danger; and I am glad to say that the goodwill of all classes of Spiritualists is extended towards myself and our work here; we have been freely supplied with literature from Messrs. S. C. Hall, A. Vacher, J. S. Farmer, J. Burns, J. B. Sloman, H. Bielfield, Captain Irwin, and others; and recently we have received a most acceptable work from Miss S. E. Gay, entitled, "John William Fletcher, Clairvoyant."

We have reason to believe that we are approaching an important crisis in the history of this local cause, but until the curtain is lifted we are not permitted even to hint at the next act in the drama. Suffice it to say our sappers and miners have surely done their work: the citadel will ere long be stormed.

In view of this it is pleasant to be on friendly terms with everybody, and to be able to speak of complete and unqualified success.—OMEGA.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

Spiritualism at Newcastle is still passing through a most trying ordeal, the present committee of old and well tried workers having to struggle against many grievous difficulties that beset them. Taking office at a time when the Society was virtually going to wreck, sunk in debt, and split with desertion, they have struggled energetically and succeeded in clearing off the heavy liability, in improving the platform, and in adding considerably to the membership. Still I am sorry to say that though they have done such good work there is yet a party who are doing their best to annoy and bring about fresh disruption. We trust the committee will deal with them with firmness and courage.

Mr. W. T. Robson has of late given an excellent address before the Newcastle Society upon "Religion," wherein he shewed that to do good to our fellows, to labour for the improvement of society, to work out progressive principles for the higher unfoldment of human kind, were the highest and truest ends and aims of religion.

We notice that of late in the district of Hetton and Houghton, a part of Durham bristling with Spiritualism, good work has been done. On Saturday evening, May 19th, Mr. H. Burton, of Newcastle, delivered a political lecture on the "Rights of Man," to a large audience, the proceeds from the lecture being given to the funds of the new Miners' Hall at Hetton. On the Sunday evening following, Mr. Burton lectured at the same place, under the auspices of the Spiritualists' Society, on "Our Belief and other People's Belief."

Our West Pelton friends, who have been compelled to leave the Corporation Hall on account of that body extending their storage, are at present agitating for a new hall. They have leased a parcel of ground for 63 years and are now appealing to the friends and supporters of the movement to help them towards the building of this hall.

The Gateshead friends are going on steadily and earnestly. Mr. Burton, on Saturday evening last, addressed them on the tendencies of the movement, shewing that its present influence was of such a nature as to affect society, scientific thought, and the creeds in a perceptible degree, and that its power would be more and more increasingly felt in the future.

A considerable amount of feeling and debate has gone on in Newcastle this last week regarding the Papal Bull issued against Spiritualism, and which appeared in "LIGHT" of the 19th ult. We are told by our Catholic friends it is false, and that it is concocted by our movement to gather sympathy.

NORTHUMBRIA.

[If our Newcastle friends will refer to p. 259 of this number of "LIGHT," they will find further information on this subject.—ED. "LIGHT."]

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medalist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., G.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Frisoe, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning, Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstübke, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H.I.H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H.S.H. the Prince of Solms; H.S.H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H.S.H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

Is it Conjuring?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HOUDEIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See "Psychische Studien" for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBS, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdein, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism and also the individuality of the spirit in Spiritual manifestation."

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butler off, in St. Petersburg; to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a Notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct sances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experience in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex; the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful sance.

The first indications of success usually are a cool breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form-manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly—Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning Spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your Reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

I regret that an error has crept into my notice of the approaching issue of Mr. Sinnett's book. I forgot that May would have passed into June before my words got into print, and I therefore should have said this, not next, month. The book may be expected immediately.

The Regulation of Public Circles.

The more knowledge can be diffused, the less likely are we to be called upon again and again to protest against some such stupid act as a resort to physical force in order to demonstrate an opinion about some psychical mystery. The acquisition of knowledge through reiterated observation and experiment by competent investigators is the great desideratum. This knowledge—science rightly so-called—should be placed at the service of those who need it, and who will ask for it. To such it will be the guide-book that they seek. To the rest of the world it will be an idle tale, a curious survival of mediæval superstition, a cause of wonder and scorn to the race of Gallio. Better that than the waste of time and patience that indiscreet proselytism is now responsible for. This educational process will be a long one, and we must not be surprised if, for long to come, the antecedent question,—Is there anything to inquire into? anything worth the inquiry? occupies the mind of men, who are half attracted and half repelled by what they cannot help meddling with. Nor will it be a matter for regret if some men, whose minds are better occupied with more material things, but who have been attracted by the physical aspects of things psychical, should find out that they are in the wrong place, and should betake themselves to more congenial fields of research. That is the shortest and best way out of a bad job. It clears the way, prevents stoppages, and avoids friction.

After all, the true course of action remains to be indicated. This is to revert to the ancient practice of secluding the medium, and preserving a sensitive nature from contamination by mixed psychical influences; from abuse by ignorant stupidity; and from those grievous risks which public mediumship when used in excess or in mixed circles must always involve. The grave indictment against public circles as now conducted rests not only on the inadequate methods employed to convince the investigator, but more largely on the damage done to the medium, and the spiritual dangers of possession that are incurred by all who are open to spiritual assault, and especially by the medium. They did these things better in the days of old Greece and Rome. A psychic, or sensitive, or medium, was then treated as a rare and delicate organisation to be preserved pure and undefiled from common contact. She—the female nature is usually the more sensitive—was trained with every care, was submitted to every refining and elevating influence, and was studiously defended from psychical contamination. Her inherent powers were developed; nor were they used until that development was sufficient to preserve the possessor of them from the risks which beset undeveloped mediumship. Even then, she was separated from the world, and consecrated to a life with which the things of the world had little to do.

So in the East. The development of the inherent psychical powers, which are our common heritage, though in different degrees, is there rightly regarded as a difficult and dangerous duty, to be approached with care, and to be carried out with all the prudent accessories of fasting, discipline, meditation, and the like; whereby the flesh is subdued to the spirit. With what horror, let us for a moment think, would any of these—Greek, Roman, or Eastern Occultist—regard the methods and means of a modern public circle. A fortuitous concourse of persons who are fortunate enough to possess five shillings, and who need have no other qualification for entry whatsoever:—the time of meeting carefully fixed for an hour when the body is satiated with food, and the system (perhaps) overstimulated by wine, though this is happily less and less frequent:—a medium whose powers, by this daily process of prostitution, are worn out, whose health is too frequently sapped, and who is the victim of a system that eats out the very life:—what would they—what would any reasonable creature—say of such doings?

I believe it is by a return to the intelligent principles of investigation which obtained in the days when the occult was approachable only after careful preparation, and through avenues jealously guarded, that we shall find satisfaction and safety. The development of the inner and truer Spiritualism, in its philosophical aspects, must necessarily be esoteric, and can be nothing else. But even the external presentation of its phenomena, in their very simplest form, can only be secured by attention to methods of investigation which I have indicated, and which are too often neglected. The phenomena must be graduated by the educated common sense of the investigator; he must be prepared in a way which organised methods cannot successfully interfere with; and usually he must be left to blunder his way out of a difficulty into which he has been unfortunate enough or foolish enough to fall, and to buy his knowledge in that shop where the genuine article is alone sold—Experience.

It would seem, then, if I am at all right in my principles, that the true path of successful investigation is that which has been pursued by scientific men in other subjects. Our unscientific observer must be left to his own devices, to a large extent. We can, indeed, do our best to prevent the introduction of fraud into the circles which he may attend, but we cannot do more for him. We can usefully devote attention to tabulating and recording the phenomena, and to placing the results within his reach: but he must use or abuse them as he will. And when all is done, the great work which most needs careful attention is the preservation of mediums from harm and injury, and the full development in all their purity of the powers which they possess. There is good hope that the time of wonder-hunting is passing. Maskelyne supplies that element, and fancies that Spiritualism contains no other. But Spiritualists who are worth the name are emerging from mere tricky trifling with phenomena, which the conjurer appreciates and counterfeits, into an arena where he and his stage devices find no place. That is the best omen for the future.

BULLS OF EXCOMMUNICATION.—The Universe of June 2nd, a leading Catholic newspaper, seems very angry with Spiritualists in general, and "Light" in particular, and expresses itself in terms which can hardly be called Parliamentary. We do not think we are called upon to notice criticism (if it can be called such) couched in language that we do not feel justified in quoting in these columns, and which, if a fair specimen of Catholic English, would go a long way in preparing us to find that the disputed text of the Bull of Excommunication in question was genuine after all.

"THE SPIRITUAL RECORD."—This is the title of a new monthly magazine of facts and phenomena relating to Spiritualism. It consists, for the most part, of narratives from the records of a period singularly rich in phenomena familiar enough to some, but probably new to nine readers out of ten. The collection of these stories, and their preservation in some such form as this, form capital pioneer work, and we wish our contemporary every success. The editorial department shows a practised hand, and when we state that the magazine is printed by Messrs. Hay, Nisbet and Co., of Glasgow, readers will know that the typography is all that can be desired. Copies can be obtained of the printers.—(See Advt.)

"A LIFE ON THE OCEAN WAVE."—The history of how this song came into being is thus succinctly told by the Commonwealth, of Boston, U.S.A.:—"A Life on the Ocean Wave" was written by the late Epes Sargent of this city. Some forty years ago Henry Russell, the English composer, being in America, asked Sargent to write a song for him, leaving the subject to his selection. In walking on the battery at New York the sight of the vessels in the harbour, dashing through the sparkling waters in the morning sunshine, suggested the poem, and the poet had it all planned out in his mind before he reached home. He showed it to a friend, whose criticism was that it was "a fair lyric, but not a song." Sargent was disheartened, but a few days after he met Russell and handed him the lines. "Let us go to my room and try it on the piano!" said Russell. They went. Russell sat down before the instrument, placed the words before him, studied them attentively, humming a measure as he read, then threw his fingers on the keys; tried twice, and finally burst out exultingly into the stirring strain in which the melody is now set. In England it was immensely popular. It has been translated into several languages. It is curious that the two ballads which have been sung more than any other in England are "Home, Sweet Home," and "A Life on the Ocean Wave"—both the products of Americans.

REICHENBACH AND THE PSYCHICAL RESEARCH SOCIETY.—The Journal of Science says that the experiments undertaken by this Committee, "and described in detail at the meeting held in Willis's Rooms, April 24th, if not entirely decisive, have, upon the whole, an affirmative character, and in short justify the public in concluding that 'there is something in it.' In other words, our verdict must be given in favour of Reichenbach, unless some quite unexpected source of error is detected on further experimentation." "But whilst we would warmly encourage these investigations, and are prepared to welcome the results, whether the phenomena are traced to od or are merely novel manifestations of some form of energy already known, we must again express our inability to recognise their connection with Psychical Research, and still less with Spiritualism. As far as we see, there is in Reichenbach's phenomena nothing which need be unacceptable even to the most determined Positivist, or to anyone who regards the phenomena commonly attributed to soul, spirit, or mind as the mere outcome of organisation. True, certain persons can perceive the magnetic luminosity, whilst others fail so to do. But this fact seems to us to stand upon the same plane as the well-known differences between man and man in the recognition of colours, in the perception of remote or minute objects, and in the hearing of very acute sounds."

Mrs. HARDINGE BRITTON will lecture at Liverpool, June 17th. —Address The Limes, Humphrey-street, Cheetham Hill, Manchester.

A SCIENTIST'S VIEW OF THOUGHT-READING.

The great interest which has been aroused in the minds of a large circle of the intelligent portion of the Liverpool public in the subject of Thought-reading by the experiments that have recently been made with more or less success in this city was manifested last night in the crowded condition of Hope Hall where a lecture was delivered by Professor W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E. The audience was a highly respectable one. The lecturer, who is a professor of physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin, is the secretary of a committee of prominent scientists, formed for the purpose of investigating the subject of Thought-reading or Thought-transference, and he has for many years been actively engaged in researches. His appearance was not so much in the capacity of a practical demonstrator of Thought-reading as the exponent of certain definite conclusions at which, after numerous successful experiments, he has arrived. The proceeds of the lecture are (as announced by Sir James A. Picton, who occupied the chair) to be devoted to two charitable institutions—one in Dublin, known as a crèche for the children of the poor, in which Professor Barrett is interested, and the other the Liverpool Mental Science Society, presided over by the Rev. Mr. Skewes, recently established for psychical research. Sir James remarked in introducing the professor that it was admitted on all hands that recent years had given rise to inquiries of a crucial nature into scientific subjects, particularly those connected with the mind and its relation to matter, to an extent that was never known before, and that the discoveries in modern science had certainly proved that, in the words of Shakespeare, "There are more things in Heaven and earth than are dreamt of in our philosophy." Professor Barrett observed that there was a widespread belief in the existence of something which might be called Thought-transference or Thought-reading, or mind acting upon mind, and, in his opinion, widespread beliefs had some foundation in truth. He set out in the investigation of this subject 12 or 13 years ago with a mental bias in its favour, and everybody who studied it must necessarily have a bias one way or another. The psychical willing game and the usual round of drawing-room experiments, which went by the mis-leading name of Thought-reading—and which were the only illustrations on the subject cited by physiologists—were nothing more than muscle-reading. In all those experiments some action must be performed, the hands of the operator being in gentle contact with the shoulders or some other part of the body of the subject. Many people had gone over the ground which Mr. Irving Bishop claimed to have discovered only by his own experiments, long before he startled the English public by his performances. The condition of the muscle might be sufficient to disclose to the operator the right or wrong direction of the subject, even when the subject was wholly unaware that he was giving those impressions, and when the operator was unaware he was receiving them. Thought-reading might be done by touches, looks, or gestures, and under that category would be classed Mr. Bishop's experiments. That gentleman, however, conducted his performances amid so much excitement as to give them a pantomimic character, and their scientific value was wholly destroyed. During a brief interval of the lecture, the Rev. E. H. Sugden, of Bradford, was asked to give some experiments in muscular interpretation. He was blindfolded, and Sir James Picton was requested to keep in mind a number, while he placed the muscular portion of his right hand on the back of that of Mr. Sugden, who held a piece of chalk. Both hands began to move almost instantly, and by-and-by the hands were withdrawn. The first figure written on the blackboard was a "6" legibly written, then a "7" imperfectly formed, an "8" written sideways, an "0" very distinct, and the latter figure, which Sir James said should have been a "5," was not completed. Sir James expressed himself well satisfied with the measure of success attending the experiment. At the instance of Captain Woollaston, Mr. Sugden made a most successful trial, every figure being plainly written. Captain Woollaston said he gave Mr. Sugden no conscious help, his hand being quite passive the whole of the time, but his mind was concentrated. Mr. Sugden was next blindfolded for the purpose of the pin-finding trick. The pin was hidden by Mr. Baron Benas in the tablecloth in front of the platform. Mr. Sugden led him down one of the side aisles, and several times stopped to feel for the pin, and eventually he declared his inability to discover its hiding place. He expressed the opinion that Mr. Benas's thoughts were not concentrated, but that gentleman assured his friends that they were, but he admitted that he was biased against the experiment. Professor Barrett proceeded to describe a number of surprising, and what the committee of which he is a member consider conclusive, results in Thought-transference. Remarking that knowledge was crowded with illustrations of the sympathetic response of one inanimate thing to another, he proceeded to experiment with tuning forks placed some twelve inches or more apart on the table. He sounded the note of one, and when he touched it with his finger to stop the sound the note was just audible on the other. He also gave an interesting and successful experiment with the singing flame, and concluded with shewing a number of examples of drawings reproduced as the result of Thought-transference, and asserted that this subject had been placed on a basis too secure to be overturned by casual objections. Sir James Picton, in according the lecturer and Mr. Sugden the thanks of the audience, remarked, in reference to the latter gentleman's experiments, that the one in which he was perfectly successful was just as good as 100 to prove his capacity for Thought-reading. Mr. Sugden, before the audience dispersed, expressed his willingness to try the pin-finding experiment again. He retired to be blindfolded, and in his absence a gentleman hid a pin in the coat of another sitting in the body of the hall. Mr. Sugden led his subject at a rapid pace along one of the aisles, returned without stopping, then walked without any apparent hesitation to the seat where the holder of the pin sat, and in a surprisingly short time held up the pin to the view of the audience amid tokens of entire satisfaction on their part. This concluded the proceedings.—Liverpool Daily Mercury, May 29th.

THOUGHT-READING.

Mr. Irving Bishop says he can read the number of a bank note which is only known to the person whose thoughts he professes to read, and Mr. Henry Labouchere denies its possibility. The following letter on the subject from the Times of June 4th, explains itself, and sets down the conditions of the proposed trial. We hardly think Mr. Bishop will accept them. However, we shall see.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE TIMES."

SIR,—I observe in The Times an advertisement of a "Séance Extraordinaire" at St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, on Tuesday evening, the 12th of June, at which Mr. Irving Bishop, the "eminent thought-reader" will appear, under the "special patronage" of the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh and others. It is further advertised that:—

"Mr. Irving Bishop will endeavour, as challenged by Henry Labouchere, Q.C., M.P., for the sum of £1,000 to read the number of a bank note concealed in any manner, and known only to the owner. The £1,000, if won by Mr. Bishop, will be presented to the Victoria Hospital for Children, as well as the entire proceeds of the séance."

I am not one of those who believe that any human being can really read the thoughts of another unless the two persons are in collusion, or the one person acquires a knowledge of the thoughts of the other by watching the effects on him of suggestive observations or signs. In order to test the possibility of genuine "Thought-reading," I offered to bet Mr. Bishop £1,000 to £10 that he could not tell the number of a note enclosed in an envelope, and known alone to the person whose thoughts he professes to read, under conditions which would render all collusion or trickery impossible. I am quite ready to stand by my offer. The first point obviously is to be safe against collusion. As the charity for which Mr. Bishop appears is in Chelsea, I will place the note which is to be experimented on in the hands of Mr. Firth, M.P. Mr. Bishop will hardly dispute the bona fides of this gentleman, and the inhabitants of Chelsea have already expressed their confidence in him by electing him as one of their members.

Mr. Bishop shall place £100 and I £1,000 in Mr. Firth's hands, before the experiment commences.

Mr. Bishop shall then have two clear and distinct guesses at each figure of the number of the note. While guessing, he must ask no questions, make no observations, flourish no pencil, and make no signs. The reason why these conditions are necessary is, that my contention is that wherever Mr. Bishop is successful in "reading" the thoughts of others, this is either due to collusion, or to his watching the effect of observations or signs upon them. Thus in endeavouring to guess a figure, he would reduce the guessing to a certainty by a process of elimination.

If Mr. Bishop does guess the number of the note under these conditions, the £1,000 would at once be handed to him by Mr. Firth, and he, of course, will be at liberty to retain it, or to bestow it on the Victoria Hospital or any other charity that he pleases. If he does not guess it, the £100 would be handed to me by Mr. Firth, and I shall do what I please with it.

Should Mr. Bishop not accept these conditions, which would, it seems to me, bring his pretensions to "Thought-reading" to a practical issue, the authorities of Victoria Hospital, and the patrons of the charity under whose auspices he appears at the St. James's Hall, would do well to insist upon his revising his advertisement, for the misleading character of which they otherwise will be responsible.—Your obedient servant,

H. LABOUCHERE.

ALLEGED PHOTOGRAPHY OF SOUND.—It is said that the direct photography of sound vibrations has recently been effected by Professor Boltzmann, as follows: A small, thin platinum plate was attached perpendicularly to the centre of a thin iron plate, which, as in the telephone or phonograph, was fixed on a wall piece and vibrated to sound. With a solar microscope an image of the platinum plate was focused on a screen. Then a prepared photographic plate was quickly moved across in the plane of the screen by a strong spring while the mouthpiece was spoken to. A bounding line between light and shadow was so obtained on the prepared plate, forming a curve which closely corresponded to the sonorous vibrations. To the vowels pretty simple curves correspond—often approximately curves of sines—often interference curves of two or three curves of sines. The consonants give very multifarious curves.

A PRESENTIMENT.—The Valley Virginian (Staunton, Va.) gives the following presentiment: "On the 12th ult., Miss Sue V. Wingfield, daughter of Judge Wingfield, of Bedford county, died at the residence of John A. Herring, Esq., near Bridgewater. She had been governess in Mr. Herring's family, and after an illness of a few days of rheumatism of the heart and lungs, she passed away in the bloom of her young life. On leaving with the corpse, Mr. Herring remarked that he would never see Miss Rebecca Davis again, who was a member of the family, and gave instructions as to the disposition of the body should anything occur during his absence. On Saturday following, the 14th, Miss Davis was taken suddenly sick, from which she died. She had long been one of the family and was greatly esteemed by those who knew her. It was a strange presentiment with Mr. Herring, that he should express himself so confidently that he would never see his relative again."

"THE 'SPIRITUALIST' CRAZE."

By John S. Farmer.

Author of "A New Basis of Belief in Immortality," "How to Investigate Spiritualism," &amp;c., &amp;c., &amp;c.

Such is the title of a paper in the Baptist Magazine for May, which is a fair sample of a type of utterance we had fondly hoped was a thing of the past. This illusion, however, has been somewhat rudely dispelled of late in numerous quarters. Not long since, the Church Quarterly launched its invective, and now Blackwood and the magazine in question follow in its wake, to say nothing of smaller fry. A common feature characterises them all: they fail to distinguish between "things that differ."

The dignity of our Baptist contemporary has been ruffled by the fact of the "deplorably prevalent" and "singular phenomenon" (Spiritualism) "of our times" having been "somewhat rudely thrust" upon its notice "by some paper at the end of a very innocent-looking book" which had been sent for review. An attempt was there made to establish the fact of a future life in such a way as to convince those who have yielded to sceptical impressions. Our critic allows that such an endeavour is legitimate enough in itself, but "gravely doubts" whether the author had adopted a legitimate method. We will now quote from the Baptist Magazine :—

The particular section to which we refer, is thus introduced :—

"Were the spirits of two persons once living upon the earth to make their appearance, and to identify themselves to the perfect satisfaction of several witnesses of the most trustworthy character, there would be in such a case no longer any doubt of the soul's conscious existence beyond the grave. In the affairs of life, any judge or jury in court would consider such evidence as conclusive."

Then follows a quotation of the account, in the Gospel of Matthew, of the appearance of Moses and Elias at the Transfiguration of our Lord, accompanied by certain proper and well-known considerations which go to shew that that account is perfectly credible. So far well. The author proceeds :—

"But the proof which the Gospel historians have recorded of the re-appearance of the dead fails to convince the sceptical mind. Persons of this class have no faith in the leading doctrines of the Bible, and therefore set aside its authority. They want evidence of a stronger and more direct kind. Can such evidence be given? Is it within the range of human experience and testimony? . . . To meet the demands of the sceptic, the reader will not, we trust, be offended, should we take the liberty of cutting a leaf from the pages of modern spiritualism: for any evidence which can confirm so grand a truth as the immortality of the soul must meet the acceptance of every one who wishes well to his fellow men."

Now, we cannot but think that the author would have shewn more wisdom had he ignored the so-called evidence from "the pages of modern Spiritualism" altogether. Most people who have examined the matter with any fair degree of intelligence and discrimination, are unable to escape the conclusion that those pages are so defiled with falsehood and imposture, as well as with hasty and blundering inferences from misapprehended facts, as to require to be put out of court when any scientific or theological issue has to be tried. At any rate, many of their statements are so obviously the sheerest fabrications, and many more of them so unmistakably the product of the wildest delusion, that, if we put ourselves to the trouble of looking into them at all, we may well do so with very little expectation of finding in them facts upon which we may confidently rely. . . .

If we are asked whether we assert that all the alleged manifestations are impostures, we reply that so many of them have been proved to be of that character that the rest are sufficiently discredited. . . . We do not believe that God has thus left "the gates ajar" for the dwellers beyond thus freely to come back, re-materialised, to be seen and chatted with. Those "gates" have been occasionally opened. . . . Had it been our Lord's will that the "realities of the future life" should stand revealed, He Himself would surely have revealed them. He was familiar with them in all their multifarious details; yet He said but little about them, and what He did say pointed to subjective principles rather than to objective circumstances. . . . Besides, even if we were to admit the existence of a little wheat in the shape of facts, we are not required thereupon to propound some theory by which the facts may be elucidated and systematised into a science or a philosophy. What philosophy have you of the snowdrop, of the rose, of life, of the elemental forces of the universe? If you have any philosophy of these things, it is speculative, not positive; partial, not complete; loose, not fixed; hypothetical, not authoritative; an attempt of the human reason which cannot, without the most contemptible arrogance, proceed upon the assumption of its own infallibility. Let science explain what it can; but do not tell us that when strange phenomena appear we are bound to accept your explanation of them, or otherwise to propound some better explanation of our own. We prefer to wait, and to allow the phenomena to multiply, if they are to multiply, in the natural order of things, and not to plunge ourselves into nobody knows what possible blundering, or into nobody knows what inevitable bewilderment, by our meddlingness. . . . This thirst for communications from the dead is so much the more pitiful and mean because it implies an ungrateful dissatisfaction with the more substantial privileges which God has placed within our reach.

We have quoted thus fully because we desire to state the arguments adduced as fairly as possible, but after reading and re-reading the passages and examining them carefully, bearing in mind while doing so the paragraphs to which they are intended as an answer, we entirely fail to perceive any sequence of statement of case and reply. The evidence of 2,000 years ago may satisfy the Baptist Magazine and those of a like manner of thinking, but it was not for such that the author of the book in question quoted the evidence of continued existence after death which Modern Spiritualism affords. It was for the sceptical mind, for "those who have no faith in the leading doctrines of the Bible," and whose name we may add is legion. "We have Moses and the Prophets—Christ and His Apostles," says our critic in a passage we have not quoted. True: and for many these suffice, but there are a far greater number who argue with undeniable force that communion with the world of spirit if possible at one period of human history, must be possible now and that both must stand or fall together. And surely they are right, but we would go further and say that without the light which Spiritualism throws upon the Bible much that is recorded there is thoroughly inexplicable.

Our critic must be singularly ignorant of the tendency of modern thought if he is unaware that materialistic ideas had become "deplorably prevalent" until Spiritualism came and placed once more the doctrine of the reality of a future life upon a surer and firmer basis than ever before. We sometimes hear loud complaints of the feebleness of spiritual life in these days, and no wonder, if the main-spring of that life has been cut off for nearly twenty centuries. The Bible record tells of the unceasing impingement of the spiritual upon the material world for more than 4,000 years. It shines forth in unclouded glory upon every page of that old and wonderful book which so many cherish and reverence, but it is asserted that all at once this intercourse between earth and Heaven, so beautifully symbolised by Jacob in his dream, ceased and was no more. We do not believe it. There is not the shadow of a reason for believing that the ministry of angels was so limited. With but rare intervals it has continued through the ages down to the present time, when, in response to the pressing need of the age a widespread outpouring of spirit has taken place. As regards the Christ failing to reveal the realities of the future life, He himself gives a reason for such an omission—"Ye cannot bear them." The world was not then ready for such revelations—indeed even now the higher teachings of Spiritualism are beyond the comprehension of all except a select few. Spiritualism has come with its scientific evidence of the realities of a future life in the same way that every other great invention or discovery has come, at the time when necessity demanded it.

Beyond all this, however, the question is not one of argument, but is rather one of fact. Here we must join issue with our contemporary, and while admitting that fraud and folly has, to a certain extent, soiled the pages of the record of Spiritualism, yet this has not been the case to nearly the degree indicated in the passage we have quoted. Taken as a whole, the history of Spiritualism for the past thirty-four years will compare favourably with that of any other movement for a like period, either in ancient or modern times. Spiritualism is yet young. Give it time, and its innate truth and purity will assert itself and rid the external organisation of the fringe of fraud and folly which is in reality no part or parcel of Spiritualism, any more than the excesses of the early followers of John Wesley were germane to Methodism. Among the early Christians there were "many unruly and vain talkers and deceivers, especially they of the circumcision, whose mouths must be stopped, who subvert whole houses, teaching things which they ought not for filthy lucre's sake." And so on. Many passages occur to us, but probably the editor of the B.M. will recollect them just as readily as if quoted in this place. But, because of this testimony as to the wrong-doing and folly of professing Christians, Spiritualists do not condemn the teaching of the Christ; yet this is exactly the style of argument adopted by our contemporary.

With regard to the last few sentences, we can only say that the phenomena have been accumulating for upwards of thirty years, and we think we may surely be content with foundations laid and tested by such an eminent galaxy of names as will be found on page 274 of the present issue. But, if these are not enough, there are the members of the Psychical Research Society, amongst whom are many who have already made their mark in other branches of human knowledge and inquiry. These men are commencing de novo in a research into these subjects. They take nothing for granted, and test and try everything that comes under their notice, and yet in so far as they have gone they have come to the very same general conclusions as Spiritualists arrived at twenty-five or more years ago. The "thirst for communications from the dead is so much the more pitiful and mean, because it implies an ungrateful dissatisfaction with the more substantial privileges which God has placed within our reach." Well, this may be so, but the argument cuts like a two-edged sword. If a future life for man is a fact, it surely behoves us to obtain as much information as possible of the nature and conditions of that life. Such knowledge can hardly unfit a man for continued existence, and it may prepare him for it. Besides, this argument would restrict and condemn all inquiry in any branch of human knowledge whatever. For ourselves, we have faith enough to believe that there are no privileges which God has placed beyond our reach, and that therefore "ungrateful dissatisfaction" is impossible. This weapon is too rusty for use in the nineteenth century, though it might have done service three or four hundred years ago. Here we must stop, the exigencies of space forbidding further enlargement, but we hope the little that has been said will present the matter in a somewhat different light.

HEALING THE SICK.

By A. P. S.

Less attention than they deserve has been paid in this country to the very remarkable cures that have lately been effected in India by Colonel Olcott, the President of the Theosophical Society. A paper I have just received from India records some further examples of the success Colonel Olcott has achieved, and some short extracts may interest the readers of "LIGHT." In the Indian Mirror, for April 27th, I read the following certificate :—

The undersigned certifies that he has just been restored to speech by Colonel Olcott after a mesmeric treatment of not more than five minutes; and also had strength restored to his right arm, which then was so powerless that he could not lift a pound's weight. He lost the power of articulating words in the month of March 1882.

(Sd.) Ram Kishun Lal, witnessed by the cousin of the patient.

This wonderful cure was wrought in our presence as described above.

(Sd.) Soshi Bhushan Moitra, Amjad Ali, Jogesh Chunder Bannerji, Govinda Churn, M.A., B.L., Amir Haidar, Pleader, Mohes Narain Gajadher Prasad, Pleader, Judge's Court, Sagivan Lal, Lal Vihari Bose, Haran Chunder Mittra, M.A., Banna Chunder Mukerji, Bani Nath Bannerji, Girija Sekhur Bannerji, Hem Chunder Singh, Annada Churn Mukerji, Ishwar Chunder Ghose, Baldeo Lal, B.A., Purnendra Narain Singh, M.A., B.L.

The incident referred to is further described in the course of a letter in the same paper, which says :—

"Colonel Olcott's short stay at Bankipore was the occasion of great commotion among all classes of men. Streams of people poured in from all sides, attracted by the miraculous cures he wrought, and thronged in hundreds at his door. During three days, the Colonel treated some twenty cases, and in many instances made an almost instantaneous cure. Cases of rheumatic pain, hemiparesis, pain in the shoulders, and other local affections even of a very long standing, were invariably cured. But the most marvellous instances were offered by a case of deafness and a complicated case of guttural paralysis. Babu Kunja Behary Ghose, a contractor, had for years past, lost all power of hearing in his left ear. After a few mesmeric passes, the Babu could hear low whispers, at a distance of twenty feet. But the next case was still more wonderful, and deserves the name of a miracle. The subject, late a Mohurrir in the Fouzdari Court, and a distant relation of the Judge's Sheristadar, had in March last year, been afflicted with guttural paralysis, and could utter only inarticulate sounds. He had also lost use of his right arm, which could not raise any weight, however slight. In five minutes, the man got cured, and could give vent to his feelings, which he did, in a most affecting manner. No one among the spectators could fail to be deeply affected with the successful struggles of Ram Kishun Lal to speak once more in his life, and when the Colonel asked him to raise a chair, which he did to the height of his breast, the spectators burst forth into spontaneous cheers, and beams of joy shot through the eyes of the Colonel himself. This scene was witnessed by some of the most respectable men of the station, who have since borne testimony to the marvellous cure in the local papers."

These cases are in no way more remarkable than many others which might be cited. While I was recently in India Colonel Olcott cured a boy, son of Baboo Surji Kumar Bysach, who had, for six or seven years, been suffering from constant fits of epilepsy. The father wrote a letter over his own signature in the Indian Mirror to state what had been accomplished, and another letter, signed by three witnesses, gives a full account of the Theosophical meeting at which the feat was performed. The work in which Colonel Olcott is thus engaged has grown out of similar achievements with which his last visit to Ceylon was associated. There he restored the use of their limbs and faculties to a large number of paralytic persons, under circumstances quite as sensational as those attending the miracles of healing recorded in the New Testament.

In all these cases it is an imperfect explanation of the result attained to say that it is due to Colonel Olcott's mesmeric power. Assuredly, I do not want to underrate this, nor the noble and self-denying life which Colonel Olcott has been leading for many years past, and one of the fruits of which is the development of his mesmeric power. But, of course, as Theosophists generally will be aware, the overwhelming curative force which he wields in the cases now attracting so much attention in India, is mainly derived from the great Adepts who are Colonel Olcott's masters, and who are able, now that his psychic faculties are in the state of development they have reached, to transmit their magnetism through him to suffering patients with whom he may come in contact. Some short-sighted critics of the Adept "Brothers'" policy in their dealings with the outer world are apt to find fault with them for not going about among their fellow creatures doing good after the Christian example. Complaints of this kind rest upon ignorance of the higher functions of the great "Mahatmas,"—upon an ignorance that will not be instructed. But the spectacle afforded by Colonel Olcott's present labours may suggest to more impartial observers that doing good amongst the sick is a task which is not excluded from the programme of Theosophical effort. The only difficulty in the way of carrying it out more extensively is that of finding persons qualified to work at it as the agents of the Brothers, and content to employ themselves upon it.

REVIEWS.

THE BATTLE GROUND OF THE SPIRITUAL REFORMATION. By S. B. Brittain, M.D. New York: Published for the Author, by Colby and Rich, 6, Montgomery-road, Boston, U.S.A. (8s. 6d.) or FROM THE OFFICE OF "LIGHT."

This work is one of the most solid contributions to American spiritual literature we have come across for some time, and its value is considerably enhanced by the clear, logical, and vigorous style in which it is written. The title—a very happy one, we think—is apparently an outgrowth of Dr. Brittain's introductory argument that the bold protest of Luther, Melancthon and Calvin was but the small beginning of a grand wave of freedom which shall not be stayed in its course till all the nations come under its influence. "The work of the reformers was incomplete," says Dr. Brittain, and then he proceeds to shew that though the agencies in operation now are somewhat different from those set in motion by the Protestant Reformers, yet the adaptability to the work in hand is just as suitable, and the certainty of their accomplishing the required end just as sure. The following passage will alike illustrate the author's meaning and serve as a keynote to the whole book.

"I emphasise the statement that the Reformation is not finished. On the contrary, its deeper meaning is just beginning to be apprehended. In our time it is something far more significant than a resolute protest against the conception of the pervading religion and the arbitrary dogmata of Ecclesiastical Councils. It is not in the highest sense a rude conflict with hoary errors and gigantic wrongs: it is not a mere tilt with the agents of despotic authority. It takes form in a new psychological science, and more profound philosophy of human nature, covering the entire realm of our relations to all things visible and invisible. The battle ground of this spiritual Reformation is not limited by geographical and national boundaries. It does not stop at the lines which separate the races of men, and is not confined to the large area of modern civilisation."

Primarily this book is the outcome of the Secular Press Bureau, an organisation established for employing the secular press of the United States for the purpose of such a statement of the facts and illustrations of the principles of Spiritualism as might be necessary to correct the popular misconception of its character, and to properly vindicate its claims before the world. Dr. Brittain was appointed manager and "editor-at-large," and he continued to wield the reins most effectively until he passed to "the land of the greater number." Of course, in a scheme of this kind differences of opinion were sure to arise as to matters of detail. With these we have nothing now to do. All we can say, in the light of recent events, is that Dr. Brittain did his work well, and probably introduced the subject to quarters not before accessible. His replies to animadversions, of which this book is a selection, were, whenever practicable, published in the journal in which the attack was made, and if this were declined they appeared in the Banner of Light.

Dr. Brittain was a true Spiritualist, and by his removal we lose one of the few remaining representatives of a generation who stood the brunt of popular opinion to an extent of which younger Spiritualists little dream. A scholarly, calm, and temperate writer, he fought long and well for a cause he had thoroughly at heart, and we can say no better than that he will long be remembered by what he has done.

On page 270 will be found a selection from the work entitled "Our Spiritual Guests," in which is propounded a somewhat novel theory as to the manner and method of so-called materialisations. We insert this particular section, not so much because we agree with the deductions of the author, but rather because it exhibits very fairly his general style and method.

DALSTON ASSOCIATION BAZAAR.—Attention is directed to the advertisement of the bazaar in aid of the funds of the Dalston Association, to be held at Quebec Hall on Tuesday and Wednesday next.

The Cornubian of June 1st contains a long poem by the "Cornish Exile," entitled "The May Queen's Message: A Modern Séance." There are many touches in it of singular beauty and pathos.

BISHOP BOWMAN ON SPIRITUALISM.—This American prelate recently gave utterance to the following:—"I am not a believer in modern Spiritualism and do not believe that spirits upset chairs and move tables, but I can say that I have never been able to account for many remarkable experiences I have had during my life under different circumstances. We are much nearer the spirit-world than we think, perhaps, and the spirits of the departed dead, I believe, have a certain influence over our minds."

LECTURES AT LANGHAM HALL, 43, GREAT PORTLAND-STREET, W.—The attention of friends is requested to the announcement in our advertisement columns of the third lecture to be given in this hall on Tuesday evening, June 12th, at eight p.m. Mr. Thomas Shorter, the editor of the old Spiritual Magazine, and also well known as the author of several standard works on the subject, will lecture on "An Answer to the Inquiry: What is the Use of Psychological Science?" The Rev. W. Miall, M.A., will take the chair.

THE PROOFS OF SPIRITUAL AGENCY.—"The essential question is this: What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."—Prof Gregory, F.R.S.E.

WE have been asked to announce that the next monthly conference of the London Society for the Abolition of Compulsory Vaccination will be held on Monday evening, June 18th, at 7.30 o'clock, at the Society's Rooms, 114, Victoria-street (adjacent to St. James's Park Station, District Railway), when an address will be given by Mr. Thomas Shorter, on "What is the Real Question at Issue?" Discussion will follow the address, and the committee hope that members will endeavour to secure the attendance of their medical friends, members of Boards of Guardians, and others.—William Young, secretary.

CONFERENCE AT NOTTINGHAM.—To the Editor of "LIGHT." Dear Sir,—Will you kindly give a place in your columns to the following "call" to Nottingham Spiritualists, and oblige.—Yours very truly, E. W. WALLIS. A Conference will be held in the Morley Club House, Shakespeare-street, on Sunday, June 17th, to which all sympathisers are invited. Order of arrangements: Morning, 10.30; chairman, Mr. E. W. Wallis. Subject, "How best to Promote Unity of Action amongst Spiritualists of the Town." Speakers allowed a quarter of an hour. Afternoon, 2.30; chairman, Mr. Waine. Paper on "Organisation" by Mr. E. W. Wallis, to be followed by arrangements for future work. Evening, 6.30; chairman, Mr. W. Yates. Public meeting. Among others the following are expected to give their best thoughts and inspirations: Mrs. Barnes, Mrs. Haines, Mrs. Wallis, Mr. Waine, Mr. Haines, and Mr. E. W. Wallis. Collections at the close, morning and evening.

PERSONAL EXPERIENCES IN PSYCHOLOGY.

Notes of an address delivered in Langham Hall, Great Portland-street, on Tuesday Evening, May 29th, 1883, by T. P. BARKAS, F.G.S. Joseph Cowen, Esq., M.P., in the chair.

Mr. Joseph Cowen, who presided, said, in opening the meeting, that he would not stand between them and the lecturer more than a couple of minutes, and for two reasons—first, because he knew little of the subject, and had no opinion upon it; second, because public duties would shortly require his attendance elsewhere, and he wished to hear Mr. Barkas as long as he could. He would say this, however, that he had known Mr. Barkas for thirty-five or thirty-six years; that that gentleman had given close, continuous, and intelligent consideration to Spiritualism and cognate questions; and that anything he had to say was well worth their attention, whether they agreed or disagreed with it. The experiences he would recite were the experiences of a careful observer and a trustworthy man.

MR. BARKAS' LECTURE (abridged).

The facts I propose to place before my audience this evening are so antecedently improbable to the great majority of educated persons, that I feel as if some apology were necessary in introducing them to those ladies and gentlemen who have honoured me by their presence.

They are, however, as the results of several years of sceptical inquiry, so manifestly true to my mind, that improbable, if not impossible, as they may appear to the vast majority of those who hear me, I feel justified in giving public expression to them and vouching for their genuineness.

I am free to acknowledge that, apart from personal investigation, I fear the evidence of mere testimony of the most credible kind would not have removed my doubts of their reality and genuineness; and, with Horatio, I might exclaim:

"Before my God, I might not this believe
Without the sensible and true avowals
Of mine own eyes."

I am free, therefore, to grant the widest range for scepticism; short of dogmatic denial without investigation.

Scepticism towards the phenomena I am about to relate is a proper and becoming attitude for every intelligent inexperienced inquirer, who has been trained in the ordinary schools of science and theology, but dogmatic denial in view of the marvels and antecedently improbable discoveries of modern science, is in the last degree illogical and unbecoming.

Facts somewhat resembling those I propose to adduce this evening, have, during the present century, been vouched for by myriads of competent observers, among whom I may enumerate Dr. Elliotson, W. Howitt, Dr. Robert Chambers, Judge Edmonds, Epes Sargent, Professor De Morgan, Professor Crookes, Mr. A. R. Wallace, Lord Rayleigh, Professor Barrett, and many other equally competent, credible, and unbiased investigators.

The more improbable the facts testified to, the greater the amount of evidence required in order to justify their acceptance.

I could with ease quote the evidence of hundreds of trained and truthful observers, but in the brief time at our disposal this evening, I prefer placing before you selections from my own experiences, in order that you may not only have the testimony of a living, present witness, but an opportunity of questioning and cross-questioning the witness to any extent you may deem desirable.

To quote my own experiences, in preference to those of equally, probably more, competent observers, may appear egotistical, but as books and distant persons can only give the information they have to convey in a stereotyped form, I think you will agree with me that in any inquiry into a subject so momentous and so commonly unbelievable as that we have met to consider, it is very desirable to have a living witness to cross-examine, who may be able more fully to explain the phenomena for which he has vouched, and at once to remove the difficulties that may have presented themselves to the minds of his hearers.

I wish to-night to confine myself, as far as is practicable, to a statement of facts, rather than to the propagation and defence of theories.

If the alleged facts be really established, theories respecting them may be allowed to take care of themselves. My sole object, then, is to shew that phenomena frequently occur of an occult and not generally accepted character, which cannot be accounted for by reference to generally received physical and psychological laws, and which seem to indicate the existence of intelligences other than those with which we are familiar in embodied human form.

The phenomena I propose to select are both physical and psychological, and all of them have a strictly intelligent psychological basis, from whatever source that intelligence may emanate.

Beyond the expression of my own opinion as the result of an inquiry extending over nearly half-a-century, I do not intend to go; it is that the phenomena are not produced by recognised physical laws, that they are, with the exception of the first fact I propose to relate, not produced voluntarily or involuntarily by embodied human beings, but are produced by beings of some kind possessing human intelligence and more than embodied human power.

At the present time we have much discussion respecting thought-reading, clairvoyance, and volitional transference of impressions.

The more recent experiments appear to me to be much inferior to those that were commonly practised and known about half-a-century ago, in the days of Spencer Hall, Dr. Darling, Captain Hudson, Mr. Adair, Dr. Elliotson, Mr. Lewes, and several other prominent mesmerists, with the majority of whom I was familiar.

In corroboration of this statement, permit me to place before you a typical illustration of experiments that forty-five years ago were almost of daily occurrence.

[The lecturer then went on to illustrate his arguments by relating several well-marked instances of the volitional transference of thought, of writing inside closed books and slates tied in various ways, and also on an empty slate held by himself and the medium, in the latter case the execution of the writing being instantaneous. He then proceeded to sum up his experience as follows:—]

I. I have witnessed motions of furniture when such motions could not be produced deceptively.

II. I have heard responses to questions that could not be accounted for on the theory of coincidence.

III. I have had a musical instrument played in my own hand in good light.

IV. I have seen articles of furniture obey unspoken requests.

V. I have seen tables rise from the floor notwithstanding the fact that by considerable pressure I endeavoured to prevent them from rising.

VI. I have seen apparently living human forms grow up in the middle of a room from apparent nothingness. I have witnessed those forms move about the room, shake hands with the sitters, shew signs of affection to those who were present, and then in the open room gradually decrease in size and become invisible.

I have heard similar forms speak and sing. I have seen them walk, sit, write, and lift heavy objects. I have felt their hands, feet, and pulses, and have ascertained on various occasions that their hands and feet were sometimes pleasantly warm, and at other times icy cold with a corpse-like, clammy chilliness. I have gazed in their faces in good light and have had as much proof of their real though only temporarily visible existence, as I have of the existence of any person with whom I am familiar.

Two living forms; a young woman and an old Quakeress have appeared in an open room, Mrs. P., the medium, sitting visible in the room.

VII. I have for many hours and on many occasions sat with an automatic sensitive, apparently in her normal condition, that is, without any signs of trance or unconsciousness, and have seen her reply in writing to questions I had personally asked in almost every department of physics, physiology, biology, and metaphysics, in a manner which was utterly beyond my own ability either to equal or imitate, and far beyond the capacity of anyone present in the room—the sensitive herself being a very ordinarily educated woman, and entirely ignorant of every branch of physics, biology, and psychology.

[Mr. Barkas then proceeded to describe the method of conducting the experiments, and quoted several instances of the actual answers given as examples of the style of reply obtained. A complete account of these sances was published in the Psychological Review for October, 1878, pp. 215, 242. He then concluded as follows:—]

I have endeavoured, as concisely as is compatible with clearness, to place before you some of the more salient phenomena of an occult and psychological character that have come under my own observation, during a period of inquiry extending over little less than half a century.

My investigation of mesmeric phenomena began in early youth, and my inquiries into what are termed spiritual phenomena, commenced thirty years ago, and have proceeded with, more or less, continuity until the present day.

I have taken advantage of almost every available opportunity for witnessing commonly inexplicable phenomena, and have arrived at the conclusion, that whilst there may in some instances have been deception, yet the vast majority of them are genuine, but of so extraordinary and unexpected a character, that I am not at all surprised at the incredulity with which recitals of them are generally received, and I repeat with Dante in his "Inferno," when relating the wonders he professes to have seen (p. 217):—

"If, O reader, now
Thou be not apt to credit what I tell,
No marvel, for myself I do scarce allow
The witness of mine eyes."

And yet, with Shelley in his "Queen Mab," I say:—
"Let us see the truth whatever that may be."

The non-recognition of these phenomena by the great mass of mankind, and especially by the more highly-trained specialists in science and theology, does not surprise me. We know from experience, that all discoveries in astronomy, geology, physiology, biology, and indeed every department of science, have had to fight their way through barriers of learned prejudice and conservative immobility; and on the other hand, utter indifference to marvellous phenomena in physics and psychology is too much characteristic of the mass of mankind.

The marvels of astronomy are a closed book to the great majority of the race, although "Heaven calls,

And round about you wheeling, courts your gaze
With everlasting beauties."

So with the phenomena, a brief record of which I have endeavoured to place before you this evening, they are everywhere pressing for investigation, and yet men generally close their eyes to the facts, and meet them with the bitterest scorn, and most stubborn prejudice.

I ask not belief of my record of facts, but I certainly ask for some inquiry prior to their entire and supercilious rejection.

OUR SPIRITUAL GUESTS.*

HOW THEY BECOME VISIBLE AND TANGIBLE.

By S. B. Brittain, M.D.

Having admitted the reality of the phenomena, and also the agency of spirits in their production (which we have never doubted), we are now to institute a philosophical inquiry into the essential nature of the facts, and the particular modes of manifestations. Do spirits so clothe themselves with the elements of matter as to be perceived through the ordinary avenues of sensation? Do they really extemporise bodies possessing all the chemical constituents and organic parts belonging to the corporeal forms which they occupied during their rudimentary life on the earth? Or by what other means and methods do they shew themselves to mortals?

And here I cannot omit the observation that many persons who set out in their investigation of Spiritualism by disputing all former revelations, especially the marvels recorded in Jewish and Christian histories, frequently run wild, in their extravagant assumptions, to the opposite extreme of unreasoning credulity. It is quite common for such people to express their contempt for the elder prophets and seers, and to ridicule the just claims of inspired Apostles; at the same time they are ready to swear to the infallibility of their own chosen medium. These novices talk of freedom and liberality while they take their place

"With bigots, who but one way see,
Through blinkers of authority."

The most improbable views are often accepted with the utmost favour. Theories of the phenomena under discussion obtain currency which are believed to be at once inconsistent with the laws of nature, the decisions of enlightened reason, and the discoveries of science. . . . A few critical observations may suffice to give our minds the right direction. In contributing my suggestions toward a philosophical exposition of the facts, I only presume to speak for myself and so many of my readers as may find their own ideas voiced in what I have yet to communicate.

As a further preliminary to the proposed analytical and philosophical exegesis of the facts under review a brief statement of several methods, whereby spirits may and do reveal their forms to our senses, will be of consequence in a more particular classification of the phenomena. One of the spirits of "The Golden Age" defines philosophy to be "facts seen in their right relations." This is the way we would look at the facts in this case. How then do spirits reveal their forms to us, and how do we perceive them? I apprehend by at least four several methods, which I will endeavour to briefly explain.

1. The conscious spirit in the body has its external and internal channels of communication. The senses open outwardly through all the physical organs to the whole realm of external nature, and inwardly to the immeasurable sphere of all spiritual realities. As a rule, during the life on earth the interior avenues of perception are closed, and men are blind on this spiritual side of their natures. But when—by the normal process of our spiritual growth or by other means—the dark curtains are removed from those windows of the soul which open towards the heavens, our interior being is illuminated. Then we see spirits as they really exist in their own sphere, we see them as they see one another, and as naturally as we behold the objects of the material creation. The cases which answer to this description are never numerous. Society, whether savage or civilised, is too sensuous to discern spiritual things. The common life and thought of the people are too external to admit of the frequent development of such examples. When, however, these interior avenues of perception are thus opened in a human being in this world, spirits require no clothing of material elements to make their presence visible. When the forms of spirits are distinctly revealed to us in this way they appear to be in all respects as real as the most tangible bodies in this world; and still there is no material substance in such a visible form that would arrest the motion of the most delicate chronometer. Spirits, whose natures are refined, readily pass through closed doors; and whenever they offer no voluntary resistance, very ponderable bodies may pass through them as through shadows, illuminated clouds, or the vapour from a steam-pipe. It will be perceived that when the senses are opened on the spiritual side of human nature, the appearance of spirits in visible forms does not, to say the least, necessarily depend on any materialising process. If such examples are scarcely more numerous than summer flowers in wintry weather, they are not so rare as Christian charity.

2. It is to be observed that the mind—whether in or out of its earthly tabernacle—has power to present an endless succession of psycho-electrotypes, or psycho-physiological pictures which have every appearance of outstanding realities. This is done by acting on the subtle agent that pervades the sensory nerves of the subject in such a way as to reflect an image upon the sensorium, the process resembling that by which light throws up an image or picture of the object from which the rays are reflected on the sensitive plate in the camera. Doubtless all ordinary sensation is the vital motive power of animal and human bodies. It is a great mistake to suppose that these sensorial impressions can only be produced by material means, or the presence of the objective forms of the physical world. This is ascribing to the elements of matter a pre-eminence over the faculties of the mind which I am not willing to concede. On the contrary, it has been experimentally demonstrated that the various impressions occasioned by the ordinary objects and agents of nature on and through the organs of sensorial perception, can be produced with similar precision and with equal force by the action of a positive mind on a sensitive subject. A strong imagination and vigorous will may thus multiply the mental images of everything in nature of which we may be able to form a definite conception. Every form that passes before the vision, every sound that breaks the silence, the aromatic flavours treasured up in the autumn fruits, and every precious perfume that is borne on the "wings of the wind," may all be made to come to us in the absence of the natural objects which contain these essential qualities—and all through the agency of the human mind, acting agreeably to psycho-physiological laws on the subtle forces of the nervous system. All these effects have been produced in this way thousands of times, and they are daily repeated by minds in the body and in the spirit. Many cases of the alleged "materialisation of spirits" are obviously phenomena of this class. Under this psycho-sensorial operation what really appears to be a solid body may be merely a sensation, this impression of tangibility being made through the nerves on the sensorium.

3. This classification of the facts calls for specific mention of the examples of transfiguration. In these cases the spirit takes such possession of the medium as to change all the facial lines and the expression of every feature so completely that the medium seems to have disappeared and the spirit alone is recognised. In such examples the powers of the spirit are sometimes so great that with the transfiguration the subject is partially transformed. Daniel D. Home and several other mediums have, it is confidently affirmed, been made at least apparently much larger or smaller, and by actual measurement, several inches shorter or taller, by this effort of the spirit to represent its own earthly proportions. The facts of this class have often been the means of exposing honest mediums to unjust suspicions, from which they should be conscientiously defended. When the spirit withdraws and the phenomena of transfiguration disappear, leaving the form, features, and expression peculiar to the medium, the observer who is mainly watching for some deception is liable to deceive himself and wrong the innocent object of his suspicion. How much the indwelling spirit may change the form is suggested by these lines of the poet.

"For of the soul the body form doth take,
For soul is form, and doth the body make."

4. There is still another method by which a spirit may become visible, regardless alike of all physiological powers and susceptibilities, and of the opening of the interior avenues of sensation. He may attract to himself and condense about the spiritual body certain sublimated elements from the medium, from

SPIRIT TEACHINGS.

SECOND SERIES.

This series of Spirit-Teachings, like the former, is made up of selections from a great mass which have been automatically written during a series of years. They are selected on no other principle than that of printing what has been valuable to the person for whom they were originally given, in so far as this can be done without trenching on what is merely of personal and private application. The latter consideration excludes a great mass of what would otherwise be interesting and valuable matter. The phraseology has been preserved, as far as possible, intact, names only being omitted. The series follows directly on the first, from which, indeed, it is separated only by the accident of its publication in another journal, and after some considerable interval of time. The publication is resumed in deference to many repeated requests.

No. XXXIX.

In writing a review of "Ghostland" you led me to make some very serious reflections as to the outcome of Spiritualism and Occultism. I have since been thinking of them, and wondering how far you can throw more light on them. I wish you would do so, for there are others who need it as much as myself.

May the blessing of the Supreme and All-wise be upon you. It may be well for you if we say what we only impressed you to hint at. The time is hardly yet come with the world at large when it is a matter for consideration whether the pursuit of truth in connection with spirit intercourse is for them fraught with danger. They are too much occupied as yet with the very externals. But for you, and for all who act as you do with reference to us, it is well to ponder. We are used, as you know, to select seasons for so causing you to ponder. We will use the present for presenting to you thoughts which you will do well to make your own. That which you call Spiritualism presents itself in divers aspects, but, so far as we wish now to view it, under two grand divisions, the Esoteric and the Exoteric: by the latter of these being popularly known. Taking the broad view that Spiritualism means the recognition of, and communion with, the world of spirit, it is the first business of those whose commune to find out what the world of spirit is. Most judge it by its effects, and these are gathered from the popular knowledge on the subject. The public records tell of many communications, many of them untrue in fact, and immoral in principle. The statements put forth revolt the judgment, and are plainly untrue. The acts are equally foolish and unmeaning. Men will not remember that the manifestations which are produced are the work of spirits corresponding to the mental states of the sitters. They take what they see, and judge it harshly. Accordingly, to the superficial eye the whole area of spirit manifestation is crowded with imbecility, immorality, and fraud. The observer sees plenty of this, and little else. And even then his eye does not see, cannot take in the real condition of things. If it could, he would shrink back in horror, as from an accursed thing.

By this standard Spiritualism is judged, and the verdict is a severe one, justly deserved. Who, it is said, are the agents here? devils, surely. We have told you before, good friend. Spirit is of all grades, and the fate of Von Marx is no paradox or parable. It is literal fact that the spirits who frequent circles from which the spiritual element on your side is absent, are unprogressed and undeveloped spirits attracted by the dominant temperaments of the sitters; earth-bound spirits who love to bewilder and perplex, or to lure to vice and sin, and, worst of all, those malignant spirits who, having passed through incarnation without progress, have now gravitated below your sphere, and are embodiments of their own evil, base, and sensual natures. They do not merely bear with them an atmosphere of evil, of vice, of impurity, of spiritual disease. They are embodied evil, incarnate vice, subsisting vampire-like on your emanations, and saturating your systems with their foul pollution. Beshink you, friend, these are not the speculations of a theorist; they are so much of truth as one who sees and knows it may declare. You are beginning to awake to the reason for our forbidding you to frequent such meetings, save when protected and guarded by our power: you are beginning at last to estimate at their real value the risks that beset the communion with spirit in unlicensed ways; you have experienced enough, in your own nightly visitations, to make you appreciate what we have told you. It is the only way in which you can learn, and now that you have so far learned, ponder on the lesson.

Think of the philosophy of spirit intercourse, what it is intended to be, and what it has been degraded to. The pictures are far different. The circles which gather other human bodies and from the earth's atmosphere so as to form a visible material covering, thus revealing the outline of the spiritual presence to the natural senses of the observer. Precisely how much matter may be required in the production of such forms is a question we will not undertake to settle. It may be more or less, according to the measure of the spirit's power, the proper materials at his command, and the results intended to be produced. But even the small substance of a summer cloud would be quite sufficient to render the spirit visible to all observers. While such forms may be more substantial than the momentary spell of the psychologist, their superficial aspects do not enable us to determine either their chemical composition or their specific gravity. We know that at the pleasure of the spirit such a form may be made as to resist the contact of ponderable bodies, and the action of physical forces, otherwise it may admit of being so penetrated that an arrow may pass through it as freely as it would make its way through the morning mist that hides the mountains.

Now would it be proper to say of an example belonging to this class that "the Spirit is materialised"? If the term is not applicable in this case it would seem to be out of place in any other. It must be obvious, I think, that when the spirit becomes visible by the opening of the senses, or the interior plane of perception; or the phenomena are produced by the spirit acting on the sensory nerves of mortals, the case is never, in any philosophical sense, one of materialisation. Does the term properly represent the facts which belong to the fourth division of this classification? The cases in which the spirit is clothed with material vestments? Let us see. According to Webster, to materialise is "to reduce to a state of matter;" "to regard as matter;" "to consider or explain by the laws or principles of matter;" "to cause to assume a character appropriate to material things." Does the spirit, per se, undergo any such change as is indicated by this comprehensive definition? No. Is the spirit reduced to a material state? Is it to be regarded as matter? No. Are its voluntary powers subordinated to the laws of matter? No. Is it in a condition that its nature and functions must be explained on the principles of physics? No. Is the character of the spirit changed in any important particular, or are its attributes essentially modified? I apprehend not. If, on the contrary, the change is in matter—if the spirits develop the facts by their own subtle and powerful agency in directing the faculties of mind and the forces of the physical world, why should we infer that the "spirit is materialised"? This assumption is a significant indication of the tendency of the popular mind. It does not distinctly recognise spirit as the active and controlling agent in the business. It is a virtual affirmation that the potencies of the universe belong in a most essential sense to matter; and that the spirit is brought down from its own high estate to the lower level of material things. If the active forces employed in the production of the phenomena under discussion really belong to the spirit world, it would better accord with the intrinsic nature of the facts to say that matter is spiritualised.

WHITHER ARE WE TENDING?—Forms social, political and religious are everywhere decaying, but humanity is in its youth; it has to develop into maturity before advancing to the realisation of its divine destiny. For our children's children we may foresee a social organization in which, cruel contentions ceasing, the reign of goodness and truth, of love and wisdom, will commence, when the God of Humanity will be adored, and when the good of each will flow from and harmonise with the good of all. Let us try to draw our brethren out of the mists of materialism; those whose sincere aspirations are towards a more perfect social order will feel that such order cannot grow out of decaying material forms.—Lamartine.

SECULARISM AND PSYCHOLOGY.—In a recent number of the Secular Review are two letters, one questioning the possibility of ghosts, and one from "C. H. G.," affirming their objective reality. The great secularist organ, the National Reformer, has an able contributor, "D.," whose standpoint has hitherto seemed to be that Spiritualism would die out if let alone; but, a few weeks ago, it contained a long paper by him about it, or rather, roundabout what Mr. St. George Stock and others wrote about it. When at Mr. Barkas's recent lecture, the esteemed Mr. G. J. Holyoake, the original leader of the Secularists, was seen to readily take the chair on Mr. Cowen being called away, it occurred to us that, putting these several things together, our Secularist friends begin to see that Psychology is no longer to be "severely let alone." If so, let us hope they will begin on the ground of facts, not words and phrases.

together all and any who may come, without preparation, without spiritual perception, without purity of heart and intent, without any spiritual instinct or desire, with no other wish but to gratify a whim, or make an experiment, or wile away an hour, or, perchance without knowing it, breathe a congenial atmosphere, these are they who seek communion with the spirit world. They use for the instrument one, perchance, whose body has become saturated with the influence of the depraved and debased spirits who throng around them; one whose vital forces have been sapped, whose health has been ruined, whose moral nature has too often been depraved, and whose spirit is the prey of the possessing fiends who have marked him for their instrument. Drained of all that supports life, he flies to debauchery and drunkenness as a relief from thought, and to stimulate the jaded strength which day by day grows less. Haunted by the vicious and depraved spirits who enthrall him, he is their prey, their slave, their helpless instrument, till when his wretched life is over, prematurely shortened by vice and sin, he goes to join their company, to be in turn a possessing spirit, and drive some wretched being to despair. Or, if the medium be not sunk to this depth, he is dominated by the undeveloped, his moral character is vitiated, or his bodily health impaired, so that, through his means, the spirits with whom you desire to commune cannot reach you. We speak from the plane of knowledge to you when we tell you that it is impossible for anyone to allow himself to be made the vehicle of spirits who are attracted to open circles without sinking sooner or later to their level: without mental, moral, and physical deterioration. We tell you that the company who gather in such circles, whether in the body or out of the body, are such that you may not frequent them without risk.

Moreover, we tell you that you will not meet there the wise and pure whom alone you should desire to meet. You may meet spirits who have sunk so low as to be almost as material as your materialists, and who will act on gross matter almost as easily as yourselves. You may meet the spirit who is so gross as to make himself readily visible to your eyes. But you will find in them all the absence of what for want of a better word we call Honesty. You will find every manifestation accompanied or followed by fraud and deception, so that you search in vain for evidence which perpetually eludes your grasp. You will never gain satisfactory proof there. For, good friend, proof must be found in an atmosphere of sincerity and truth; and there you have neither. The evidence most satisfying to you is upset the next moment, and you are forced to see and confess that you are dealing with a power that you cannot control, and with one on which you cannot rely. And meantime that you have spent your pains for nothing. You have drunk in the pernicious atmosphere of these depraved and deceitful spirits; you have imbibed the infection of their depravity, and have done your best to infect yourself with their vice. And if you are protected in the risk you run, you have no claim to incur that risk again and again save in the discharge of duty. You go to a pest house and expect to escape free; but one day you find you have gone too far; a vampire has fastened on you, and for the rest, you are possessed by a loathsome fiend whom you must emancipate yourself from by laborious purification, or to whom you must become victim. You know it, yes, but how long is it since we first told you, and what effect did it produce upon you? You, or your race, usually disregard a thing because it is not palpable to their rude senses. And yet they know that germs of disease are equally invisible. Only they have found out that infection of fever is surely caught in certain places. When will they learn that there is a more subtle poison which attacks the spirit, and that that poison is generated, and that infection propagated, where men meet to invoke the presence of spirits who are full of uncleanness and vice and moral and spiritual disease? Until they learn so much, the popular idea of Spiritualism will always be that it is a base and unholy thing. When they have learned so much they will be prepared to go deeper and learn more. We trust you have learned that Von Marx's warning was one that is not rare. They who spend their time in attempts to reduce spirit to material lines do in the end debase it so far that it is half-material, and satisfying themselves so far, they sink to the plane of the elementary and the undeveloped. They cannot gain spiritual enlightenment so: they cannot develop one grace in their own souls or win one truth that can make them nobler or better. Even the material evidence they can gain is illusory, and they end as Von Marx did by assimilating themselves to the spiritual plane on which their experiments were conducted. There is a deep spiritual truth involved here which you can only dimly see. Jesus proclaimed it when He said "Where the carcass is there will the vultures be." Where a man's tastes are there will be his spirit. Where a man voluntarily places himself there will be his future state, as you call it. A man selects his plane; and they who do as we have warned you above, do select and lower themselves to the plane of the elementary and undeveloped, instead of raising them to their own higher plane, and aspiring to communion with the noble, the pure, and the progressed.

What you say is very awful; and does not apply in its full hideousness to anything we know of in this country.

Hardly: yet the worst is not here, nor yet. We have told you of what is going on elsewhere. The wave has not yet reached you.

No. We apparently get our wave of influence from that land which is the Judaea of modern Spiritualism.

Be warned in time.

The Preparation of Inquirers and the Production of the Phenomena.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—It is with much diffidence that I venture to contribute a letter to your columns on the above subject, but the fact that my name and opinions have been quoted in relation to the general question, I thought might be a sufficient excuse for my so doing.

I am no controversialist—I only claim to be a sincere and humble worker in a much-loved cause, labouring zealously and indefatigably, and in perfect harmony with all my brother and sister Spiritualists, of whatever grade, name, or opinion.

From the commencement of my work in this movement, I have carefully endeavoured to avoid anything savouring of oracular or dogmatic judgment in the expression of my opinions, or of doing injustice to any other workers in the field. "To every man his own work;" "What is that to thee? follow thou me," is the voice which every worker should heed. I have invariably maintained an attitude of profound deference toward all those workers and teachers whose experience and ability and wisdom so far transcend my own.

Hence, it was with something like pain that I found in "LIGHT," of May 19th, my humble opinion quoted in apparent opposition to the views of so eminent an authority and worker as Mr. T. P. Barkas; and my present object in writing is particularly to say how thoroughly I appreciate the calm and courteous letter of that gentleman in last week's "LIGHT," and how fully I agree with the sentiments and judgment therein expressed.

Surely the author of "Outlines of Ten Years' Investigation of Spiritualism" (which I have now by my side) need not be supposed to "discountenance the presentation of records of phenomena to friends and the general public;" whilst Mr. Barkas' real design, viz.: "to show that advanced physical phenomena should not be hastily and miscellaneously submitted to public and personal inspection," I cannot imagine being seriously taken exception to; certainly it will not be by any one who has had anything worth calling "experience" in this matter.

In the concluding paragraph of his letter, Mr. Barkas says:—"Long experience has shewn me that the great majority of mankind are unfitted for observing the higher developments without preliminary training in the observation of more elementary phenomena;" and I would add, that not only long experience, but even a little experience, will shew this.

I beg to say, however, that my idea of preparedness and fitness relates chiefly to the spirituality, i.e., the moral character and disposition of persons, rather than to their intellectual status. I lay stress upon the word disposition, because there are hundreds who profess religion and knowledge who exhibit a shockingly bad disposition. They are influenced chiefly by conceit, prejudice, and bigotry, and I contend that these are an insuperable obstacle to their reception of the truth. These do indeed need a "preparation," and a stern, severe training, before the beautiful angel of truth can dwell with them.

But I contend that a person of good disposition and character is prepared for anything, either in Spiritualism or out of it. A person of a right spirit may be safely introduced to any, even the "most advanced," phenomena. He may be filled with wonder, but he will surely also ponder seriously and thoughtfully over what he has seen. If Spiritualists will let this determine their selections, they will never have any difficulty. I repeat, that a person of pro-er—i.e., of humble, sincere, teachable, benevolent spirit, disposition, and character, may be safely introduced to any circle or any phenomena. It is those of opposite character that are unfit and unprepared; and here, indeed, is our great field of work. It is the personal spiritual training that is needed, and if the present writer aims at anything it is this.

Taking this view of the case, the most serious matter is, in my opinion, the utter unfitness and unpreparedness of many so-called Spiritualists for this great cause of Spiritualism. In my opinion there is no greater obstacle to the spread of Spiritualism than the unspirituality and selfishness of so-called Spiritualists.

Everyone, it is true, may not be directly called upon, as has been the case with myself, to surrender and sacrifice everything dear, advantageous, and desirable in life for this cause, and devote himself, soul, life and all, aye and more than all, to it; but I have been utterly astonished to see to what an extent Spiritualists treat Spiritualism as a plaything, and how few are willing to forego the slightest personal pleasure or indulgence for the sake of this great cause.

I will conclude this letter by saying that my own work is based upon the principle that a knowledge of the truth and its practical influence in the life, is the preparation required for actual intercourse with the spirit world; and the world being what it is, what a field of work is here! The rest, I think, we may confidently leave to the spirit world, which surely knows better than we how much or how little to give to inquirers.

We may rest assured that it would give unstintingly to those who are worthy; those who are not will get just as much as they deserve.—I remain, sir, truly yours,

The Rev. John Page Hopps's Lecture.

SIR,—Though much admiring the lecture of the Rev. J. Page Hopps, "On a Scientific and Spiritual Basis of Belief in a Future State," I must venture to comment on some of its closing words. His version of Romans vii. verse 24 gives to that text a meaning widely different from what is conveyed to my mind either by the old, or the recently revised translation. This death-like body implies quite another idea, both of death and the body, than what is expressed by the body of this death; an idea which I think Mr. Page Hopps must import into Bible words before he can draw from them any reason for believing that "our easily besetting sins will probably disappear when kindly earth receives the body."

If there is the body of death, there must surely be an anterior spirit that caused such external manifestation as our dying bodies are. What can dissolution do towards healing a spirit whose phenomenal life is full of weakness, suffering, and various tendencies to evil?

When undressing a diseased body cures pain or cools fever, death may rid us of our besetting sins; surely not before: for much as the body fetters the will by imperfect organisation, it is the slave of the will, and the will cannot die with the body.

It is such soothing and unguarded sayings as these which close Mr. Page Hopps' admirable address, that encourage the madness of suicide, and the almost equal madness of habitual self-indulgence. Without any sort of qualification, he says, "Death is an advancement." And just before he had said very truly that "the dusky veil of the flesh hides a thousand times more than it reveals." Is it rational to take it for granted that only delights, only pleasures, rejoicing facts are thus hidden? The testimony of many an unhappy spirit, craving for the prayers of those still shielded by this fleshly veil, gives rather a different view of post-mortem existence; and on this point, I think too many of them would be ready to add their protest to mine.—Yours, &c.

A. J. PENNY.

Papal Bulls.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Illness alone has prevented me from noticing your reprint of a Papal Bull of excommunication supposed to have been recently published in Spain. That the document is not genuine, in as much as it does not in any way resemble any form of excommunication I ever saw, I am convinced. Secondly, there is no necessity for its existence, for without any such Bull the Archbishop of Santander or any other Romanist Bishop could at any moment place any person in his diocese under the major excommunication; for practising mesmerism, magnetism, table-turning, Spiritualism, or any form of divination by the Planchette, clairvoyance or otherwise. This power the Romanist Bishops have possessed since the 30th July, 1856, on which date a decree or rather an encyclical letter emanated by order of the Pope from the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Inquisition by which mesmerism, Spiritualism, &c., were pronounced to be heretical; all persons aiding or abetting such practices, or reading or composing literature on such subjects were therefore pronounced to be liable to all the penalties of excommunication under the provisions of the well-known "Bulle Cæne." A sentence of excommunication is not infrequently inflicted, but is rarely published—as certainly in all Protestant and in some Roman Catholic countries such publication is in law a libel. A sentence of excommunication runs usually somewhat as follows:—"To all the faithful throughout the world. Whereas A. B. has been guilty of certain grave offences, namely, heresy, &c., &c., contrary to the decrees of the Church and in subversion of good morals. We, C. D., by the grace of God and favour of the Holy Apostolic See, Bishop of —, do hereby pronounce upon the said A. B. the sentence of the major excommunication with all the pains and penalties attached thereto, and we do pronounce the said A. B. to be anathema." Then follow the place, date, signature of the Bishop and his seal.

The encyclical letter of the Sacred Congregation is very long; but if you think it of the slightest interest to your readers, I will send you a translation of a duly authenticated copy.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

CAVENDISH ROOMS, 51 AND 53, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

The evening of Sunday, the 3rd inst., at these rooms, was devoted to "Question and Answer." The inquiries submitted covered the following topics:—

The manner of approach and retirement of the controls, with a general description of their home and personal surroundings in Spirit-land.

The nature of the present occupation of the "almost infinite number" of exalted and advanced spirits.

The theory of guardian spirits and their duties towards individuals in the flesh.

Whether the work and mission of Christ were fully accomplished during His earthly existence or are being yet developed, and whether those who regard Him as their leader are rightly called Christians, and should pray for His help and guidance.

The best way to prove the immortality of the soul. Whether a Spiritualist would be justified in taking orders in the Church.

The possibility of defining God to the satisfaction of the Spiritualist and the acceptance of the materialist.

The method of powerful utterance and of imitation of most exquisite whistling peculiarly associated with a departed relation, by invisible unmaterialised spirits in the light, when to all appearance the organs of the medium were not used.

The facility with which spirits seem to acquire the capacity to speak in languages foreign to their experience in earth-life.

An explanation of the doctrine of the Trinity, with finally an appeal to the controls to say "what was the date of the Council of Chalcedon and who was condemned in it."

After a cordial expression by the meeting of grateful appreciation of the answers given, the president appealed to c'airvoyants present, if there were any, to say, as a matter of evidence, whether, during the proceedings, they had observed any spirit forms near the medium. In response one lady and one gentleman voluntarily certified, the one that she had seen and recognised the control known to her as the Chinese philosopher, and the other that he had seen the form of an old man in flowing white hair and with other special features that he described: whereupon Mr. Morse explained the origin and very palpable reality of the presence of his control, and the circumstances connected with the production of a drawing of him, some years ago, by an entranced artist in America.

The incidents of the evening seemed to make a profound impression upon the audience. If a sufficient number of applications for a verbatim report of the "Questions and Answers" are immediately forwarded to the secretary of the Lyceum at 53, Sigdon-road, Dalston, E., the Council will cause the same to be printed in pamphlet form, in continuation of the series, which already includes Nos. 1 and 2, now on sale.

In conclusion, the sympathies of the audience were directed towards the efforts, now in progress at the East End of London, for giving the very poor and feeble children of that locality an opportunity for change of air and moral treatment, by a residence of two or three weeks in the country. It was stated that, in reliance upon the active co-operation of their friends, the Council had already remitted the sum of £8 to the promoters of the movement, and that that sum would suffice to liberate twenty-five little ones for a week, or a proportionately smaller number for a longer period.

Contributions of any amount, for the general work of the Lyceum, including unsectarian charity, will be thankfully received by the secretary at the address quoted.

The subject of the lecture by the controls of Mr. Morse, on Sunday, the 10th inst., will be "World Gods."

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zollner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Bern; Professors Wagner and Butleroff, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mages, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, L.L.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning, Hon. Rothen Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Poët; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstübbe, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITIONS.—H.I.H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H.S.H. the Prince of Solms; H.S.H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H.S.H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

Is it Conjuring?

It is sometimes confidently alleged that mediums are only clever conjurers, who easily deceive the simple-minded and unwary. But how, then, about the conjurers themselves, some of the most accomplished of whom have declared that the "manifestations" are utterly beyond the resources of their art?

ROBERT HODDIN, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitive, Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. See "Psychische Studien" for January, 1878, p. 43.

PROFESSOR JACOBS, writing to the editor of Licht, Mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—"As a Prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect. Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. . . . Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force in mesmerism and' also 'the individuality of the spirit' in Spiritual manifestation."

SAMUEL BELLACHINI, COURT CONJURER AT BERLIN.—I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Bern; Butler, in St. Petersburg; to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the "How" of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a Notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex; the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to wait ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cool breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form-manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly—Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning Spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your Reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

Major-General Forlong has just published, and Quaritch sells, a book which should be full of interest. It is entitled "Rivers of Life: or, Sources and Streams of the Faiths of Man in all Lands, shewing the evolution of religious thought from the rudest symbolisms to the latest spiritual developments." General Forlong has studied his subject in the land where alone it can be fitly investigated—India: and his elaborate volumes are certainly a monument of industry. The first volume deals with tree worship, serpent and phallic worship, fire worship, sun worship, and ancestor worship. The second deals with the early Faiths of Western Asia, the Faiths of Western Aborigines in Europe and adjacent countries, and the Faiths of Eastern Aborigines, non-Aryan, Aryan, and Shemitic. He proposes in future volumes to deal with the historical and Biblical religions of the Hindus, Zoroastrians, Buddhists, Hebrews, Greeks, Chinese, Scandinavians and Mahomedans. The work is full of excellent illustrations, and is accompanied by a large chart shewing very completely the rise and fall of various religious ideas. I am not able to express any opinion as to the author's success in dealing with his vast subject, but I know of no more bold and comprehensive effort to grapple with a subject that is so full of interest.

Macmillan publishes, in two volumes, the essays which Mr. F. W. H. Myers has contributed at various times to the Fortnightly, Nineteenth Century, Century, and Cornhill. Many of these essays deal with subjects in which cultured Spiritualists are deeply interested. I may specially instance that on the Greek Oracles, which I directed attention to when it originally appeared. But in almost all there are incidental, and, in some, not infrequent traces of spiritual perception, and of the influence of that special line of thought to which the author has given so much of his time. And in all, without exception, there is a literary charm hard to parallel which should commend the volumes to a very wide class of readers, among whom I hope many Spiritualists may be found.

The first quarterly part of the second volume of "Facts" keeps up the interest of the preceding volume. It contains among other things the history of Mr. F. L. H. Willis, who was suspended from attendance at the Divinity School of Harvard University because of his psychical power. Mr.

Willis was during a part of his life a remarkable medium. I do not know whether, as with many others who have not cultivated the power as public mediums are forced to do, it has continued in full force. Probably not. The unseen intelligences who direct these matters adapt their means to ends, and it is long since the struggle of Dr. Willis against conviction was ended. The history of his life, if he would publish it, would be full of interest. His portrait prefixed to this part is a typical face of the psychic. It is the face of the seer, "the man whose eyes are open," and of one who communes habitually with the world of spirit.

Mr. Gillingham, whom I remember many years ago as the author of a singular treatise on "The Seat of the Soul," is contributing to the Chard and Ilminster News a series of long articles on "The Lost Senses and Kindred Subjects." It is a sign of the times that a local paper should be willing to give up a column and a-half of space every week for some two months to these elaborate dissertations. They are not remarkable in any way; they are, however, readable, and they give a good deal of personal experience and information in a desultory way. They are evidently read, for the editor thinks it worth while to advertise the fact that he has the back numbers, containing the earlier papers, on sale. This is, I say, a sign of the times.

Another sign of the times is that Mr. Haweis thinks well to deal with the subject of Spiritualism from his pulpit. He is always well abreast of the thought of the day, and late developments, especially the impetus given by the Society for Psychical Research to popular inquiry, have led him to the conclusion that it is his duty as a public teacher to guide his people, and instruct them on what it is no longer safe to ignore. Accordingly, he preached this week (on the 10th) a sermon on Transcendental Physics; or, Some Aspects of Modern Spiritualism. Mr. Haweis shews a due sense of his duty, and no little courage in handling at all, in the presence of a mixed congregation, so difficult and complex a subject.

Another sign of the times! The Society for Psychical Research has drawn Mr. Maskelyne. Not content with his illuminated skeleton he has now gone in for "Mental Telegraphy," and guesses thoughts most glibly. Of course! he has killed Spiritualism over and over again, according to his own showing, but somehow he always comes back to it in some form or other for his own livelihood.

The land that produced in one untoward generation Flavius Josephus Cook and Washington Irving Bishop has much to answer for. This latter phenomenon is just now occupying a large share of public attention, and provoking much merriment from those who remember his previous escapades in the North, and, indeed, in other quarters. The great Glasgow trick is to be repeated in London with the kind assistance of Henry Labouchere, Esq., M.P. In a portentous circular which the Standard appropriately describes as "couched in the language of Bombastes Furioso," and which might well be dated from Bedlam, Mr. Bishop "spreads himself" in his most graceful manner. It is vain to hope to give, by any quotation, any notion of this remarkable exposition of "what Mr. Irving Bishop will do"! What, indeed, will he not do, if his own estimate of himself be taken as the standard? "Jenny Lind, Charles Dickens, Adeline Patti, Rubinstein, Christine Nilsson, and Sims Reeves have not created so great a sensation," he modestly says. If one turns to the estimate of him in his own country it becomes still more impossible to answer the question. The man and his bombast are ridiculous enough, but the assumption of "heartiest sympathy in the noble work" of the Hospital for Children, which he now uses for his advertisement, is another thing. The letter to the secretary which Mr. Bishop prints with evident pride is the most nauseous thing I remember. One must go to slang to describe Bishop. He is the very materialisation of "cheek."

Before these notes are in the hands of my readers the experiment will be over, and I do not desire in any way to forecast the result. But Mr. Labouchere shews more wisdom in insisting that certain conditions shall be observed so as to exclude collusion and trick than he did in making any terms with Mr. Bishop. From a comparison of Mr. Labouchere's letter to the Times with an incoherent and ungrammatical rejoinder published by Mr. Bishop, it seems to be very probable that the contracting parties will not come to terms. And if they do, who will be the wiser? Only one thing is sure: in spite of Mr. Labouchere's astuteness, the astuter Yankee will score off him somehow; either actually, by pocketing his money; or indirectly, by advertisement and notoriety. With any sort of a memory how can people be so easily gulled!

Mr. Bishop informs us that he is about "to shortly discontinue" [How will he do it?] his public life in order "to resume my investigations of the mysteries of the East." The public will receive this news with equanimity, and I may venture to direct Mr. Bishop's notice to one "mystery of the East" that may profitably engage his attention. There was published in one of the early numbers of this journal an account of a phenomenal fakir who was buried for I forget how many months, and over whose tomb a crop of grain was sown and reaped. The best results might be anticipated if Mr. Bishop will try that experiment. Whether he were or were not successful we should follow the trial with interest unabated to the end.

M.A. (Oxon.)

The Rev. H. F. Limpus, M.A., Vicar of Twickenham, has recently preached a sermon in which many points are treated from a spiritualistic standpoint. We hope to give a report in our next issue.

CONFERENCE OF SPIRITUALISTS IN NOTTINGHAM.—On Sunday, June 17th, 1883, a Conference of Spiritualists will be held in the Morley House (Entrance: Shakespeare-street). Morning, at 10.30 prompt. Subject for consideration, "How best to promote Unity of Action amongst the Spiritualists in the town." Several Trance and Normal Addresses will be delivered. Mr. E. W. Wallis will preside. Afternoon meeting at 2.30. A paper will be read by Mr. E. W. Wallis; subject, "Organisation." Discussion to follow, after which plans for future work will be submitted to be adopted or otherwise. Mr. J. Waine will preside. In the evening, at 6.30, a public meeting will be held, when Trance and Normal Addresses will be delivered by Mrs. Barnes, Mrs. Wallis, Mrs. Haines, Mr. E. W. Wallis, Mr. G. Haines and others. Mr. W. Yates will preside. Collections at the close of Morning and Evening Services, to defray expenses. All Spiritualists and friends are earnestly requested to be present.

THE "CHRISTIAN WORLD" ON SPIRITUALISTS.—This paper, in noticing Mr. Barkas' lecture at Langham Hall, said:—"Mr. Barkas strikes one as the last sort of person one would expect to see a Spiritualist. He is stout built, elderly, and business-like, and talks in a clear matter-of-fact style. He admitted that the facts he was about to relate were so improbable, that really some sort of apology was needed for referring to them, and was free to grant the widest range of scepticism short of dogmatic denial. The lecture consisted of his own experiences, all tending to shew the existence of spiritual agencies at work around us. After the lecture a good many questions were put, some very absurd, creating roars of laughter—some very much the reverse, one young lady, naturally, with true feminine curiosity, being very anxious to learn how the spirits were dressed—whether their garments were of earthly texture, and of the fashion of this wicked world."

WRITING MEDIUMSHIP AND DREAMING COMPARED.

In the Paris fortnightly paper, Le Spiritisme, there is a correspondence between one who signs himself "Un Docteur Incrédule," and M. Alexandre Vincent. Alluding to mechanical writing mediumship, the latter relates of a medium under his own observation:—

"Having, in his ordinary waking state, taken his seat at the table with sheets of paper before him, pencil in hand, the room is made dark. Conversation is continued, the medium taking part in it. After a few minutes we hear the sounds of rapid writing. When the sounds cease we strike a light, and find five, six, or more pages covered with writing, and at the end the signature of one known to be deceased.

"During the past three years between thirty and forty different personalities have communicated with us in this way: physicians, philosophers, poets, peasants, some of all grades and of various periods! The greater number write in the medium's own language, French, but some in Italian, of which the medium knows not a word.

"If the invisible writers are questioned about the state which follows that of life on earth, they all say that they find it a better one. Once having written, each of them presents, in his subsequent writing, the characteristics, in all particulars, of his previous communications. Some of these invisible writers return at more or less lengthened intervals.

"There is nothing of the medium in these communications but the passive use of his bodily hand. A hand cannot reveal at intervals of months the phrases, styles, and orthography, distinguishing the communications of one personality from those of another. And the medium, in the meantime, cannot make reference to them, for once written, they are safe in my private custody. Many of them are on scientific subjects, of which the medium knows no more than he does of the technical terms employed in treating of them, which is nothing.

"I have witnessed such phenomena as these hundreds of times during the last three years. To me they are phenomena of a special psychical order. If this be questioned, if it be asked whether it may not be done by the medium himself in some peculiar morbid or abnormal condition, I should reply by relating other cases shewing the actions of invisible agents of an equally extraordinary character from a physical point of view, cases of objects, small and large, being moved without any contact at all of the medium. The medium, it has also been suggested, may be in an abnormal state analogous to that of dreaming. But during these experiments he is neither in the ordinary nor in the magnetic sleep. Then, the communications, declaredly due to the action of certain individuals deceased, are always coherent, while dreams are only occasionally so, but most frequently incoherent and nonsensical.

"Certainly we know that in dreaming, verses and speeches are sometimes improvised, dialogues held, and conversations sustained, upon subjects the dreamer is not familiar with in his ordinary state. If dreams were specially under discussion I might point out that the character of some of them denoted spiritual influence. But on the present occasion my object is to present facts for your consideration. With respect to the difference between the phenomena of dreaming and those of mechanical writing, I would further point out that in the latter the subject is awake, that during the writing he can converse with those about him; while in dreaming the subject has to be asleep; it is, therefore, manifestly impossible to establish any analogy between the two."

We shall be pleased to send specimen copies of "LIGHT" post free to any name and address supplied by our readers where it is likely to prove of interest.

The Lands Allotment Company, Limited, announce a further issue of capital to the extent of £250,000, particulars of which will be found in another column. This company, of which Mr. Morell Theobald is a director, has been in active work since 1872, and has from 1875, paid no less than 8 per cent. per annum in dividends and bonuses, besides creating a reserve fund amounting to £21,000 or nearly 9 per cent. of the total subscribed capital. A copy of the last report and balance sheet can be obtained upon application to the secretary, C. E. Brock, Esq., 20, Budge-row, Cannon-street, E.C.

Mrs. HARDINGE BRITTON will lecture at Liverpool, June 17th. Address The Limes, Humphrey-street, Cheetham Hill, Manchester.

VISIONS IN CONNECTION WITH THE REBELLION OF 1745, AND THE BATTLEFIELD OF CULLODEN.

The phantasm of armed bodies of men, even occasionally of conflict of troops, has not infrequently been observed upon the sites of great battle-fields. Sometimes this will have been observed previously to the event; sometimes subsequently.

In both cases, however, this phantasm may be classed by the Psychologist under the head "Second-Sight," since with things of the spirit it would appear that time is a condition which does not enter into the matter; time having alone—as we are led to believe—reference to things material. Thus it may be regarded probably in reality as no more miraculous to be able to perceive the visions of the future than to behold visions of things past.

A. M. H. W.

The following visions illustrate these two forms of "Second-Sight":—

"PHANTOM TROOPS ON CUMBERIAN HILLS ON MIDSUMMER'S EVE, 1735."—William Lancaster's servant related that he saw the east side of Souter Fell, towards the top, covered with a regular marching army for above an hour together; he said they consisted of distinct bodies of troops which appeared to proceed from an eminence in the north end and proceeded marching over a nitch in the top; but as no other person in the neighbourhood had seen the like, he was discredited and laughed at. Two years after, on Midsummer's Eve also, betwixt the hours of eight and nine, William Lancaster himself imagined that several gentlemen were following with their horses at a distance, as if they had been hunting; and taking them for such he paid no regard to it till about ten minutes after, when again turning his head to the place, they appeared to be mounted, and a vast army following, five in rank, crowding over at the same place where the servant said he saw them two years before. He then called his family, who all agreed in the same opinion; and what was most extraordinary, he frequently found that some one of the five would quit his rank and seem to stand in a fronting posture, as if he was observing and regulating the order of their march, or taking account of the numbers, and after some time appeared to return full gallop to the station he had left, which they never failed to do as often as they quitted their lines; and the figure that did so was one of the middlemost men in the rank. As it grew later they seemed more regardless of discipline, and rather had the appearance of people riding from a market than an army, though they continued crowding on and marching off as long as they had light to see them. This phenomenon was no more seen till the Midsummer Eve, 1745, which preceded the rebellion, when they were determined to call more families together to witness this sight, and accordingly went to Wiltonhill and Souter Fell side, till they conveyed about twenty-six persons, who all affirm that they saw the same appearance, but not conducted with the same usual regularity as the preceding ones; having the likeness of carriages interspersed; however, it did not appear to be less real, for some of the company were so affected with it that the following morning they climbed the mountain through an idle expectation of finding horses' shoes after so numerous an army; but they saw not a vestige or print of a foot." The battle of Culloden, which brought the rebellion to an end, was fought 24th April, 1746.

"As we left (in 1837)

says the author of "Visits to Remarkable Places," "we gave, with our thanks, a small gratuity to our intelligent young guide, Wully Mackenzie, which seemed to him so much beyond service, that, in the height of his gratitude, he was quite uneasy that he could not shew us some further good office. 'Was there nothing more that he could do? Would we go in, and sit down, and rest us awhile? Would we like a tune on the bagpipes?' In we went, and took our seats in their little hut, a regular Highland habitation, with smoky rafters, while Wully produced his pipes and began to put them in order. We had a long talk with these good people about the battle-field and its traditions. They told us that the name, Drumossie, was not now used for that moor—Culloden had superseded it; but was retained on a wild track at its extremity in the direction of Bodenach. They assured us, with the utmost gravity, that a battle would be fought there. We inquired how they knew that. They replied, because it had been repeatedly seen. On summer's evenings, people going across the moor had suddenly on various occasions found themselves in the very midst of the smoke and noise of a battle. They could see the various clans engaged, and clearly recognise them by their proper tartans; and on all these occasions the Laird of Cullodethel, a neighbouring gentleman, was conspicuous on his white horse. One woman was so frightened and bewildered by this strange spectacle, that she fainted away, and on coming to herself found all traces of the battle gone, and made the best of her way home again without proceeding on her original object. We told them that there must be strong impressions left on the imaginations of the people by the memory of the old battle, but they only shook their heads. They were perfectly satisfied that a battle was to be fought on Drumossie, and that the Laird of Cullodethel would be in it—though with whom the clans would fight or for what, they could not tell. Having finished our discussion on this second-sight superstition, Wully Mackenzie struck up on his pipes the tune with which the Highlanders were said to have marched into the battle of Culloden."

THE UNCANNY PICTURE IN THE CASTLE OF LISSA.

Not far from Breslau, on the road to Berlin, lies the small market town of Lissa, which may, by the railway, be reached in ten minutes. It is a place which is much frequented by the citizens of Breslau on account of the park lying behind the castle. In the year 1611 the estate belonged to Heinrich von Hörnig, who built the castle. In 1653, on account of debt, the lordship of Lissa came into the possession of Horace von Forno. The legend runs that he led a dissolute life and died in the full strength of manhood; also overwhelmed with debt.

Whilst he was being interred in the churchyard, the funeral company was seized with terror by beholding the deceased lord of Forno, as he had appeared in life, standing at the window of his castle watching the interment of his own corpse. Haste was made to complete the ceremony, and the company returned. In the days following, however, the spirit of the dead man was encountered everywhere; now he was seen at cross-ways, now by a gamekeeper in the woods, whilst he was believed to appear under the form of a ghostly dog which played all manner of tricks, &c. In short, the conclusion was come to that the dead lord had not found rest beyond the grave; and it was at length agreed that the corpse should be disinterred and removed beyond the boundary of the land-mark. This was done, and at a spot agreed upon, some half a German mile's distance from Lissa, the remains were again buried.

From henceforth Forno was not visible. In a room of the castle, however, there hangs a portrait of the ancient possessor of the estate which may be seen at the present day (1851), spite of the necessity experienced by later possessors of the castle to remove it thence, in varied arrangements of the furniture and fitting up of the room. It represents Forno clad in the ornamental hunting-dress of the period. He wears a cap of green velvet adorned with a spray of red poppies. His countenance is manly, not exactly disagreeable; but the brow is gloomy, and the expression altogether has a something in it doubtful and uncanny.

Whenever in former times attempts were made to remove this picture, there occurred in consequence in the castle such ghostly disturbances and noises, such banging of doors and shaking of windows, such cracking of hunting-whips in the passages, &c., that on every occasion, in order to ensure nocturnal rest, the portrait was restored to its original place. Even the late proprietor, Count von Wylich, formerly Ambassador in Switzerland, although a man of very free opinions, has not dared to find a place in the attic for the portrait of the Lord of Forno.—"Magikon" of Dr. Justinus Kerner, Vol. V., Part II., p. 186.

REVIEWS.

ESOTERIC BUDDHISM. By A. P. Sinnett. Trübner, 1883. Price 7s. 6d. Or may be obtained from the Office of "LIGHT."

FIRST NOTICE.

It may safely be said that so much definite information about mankind and the universe as this volume contains, has never before been given out in so compact a form within literary or linguistic memory. Mr. Sinnett's style has a business-like directness and an effectiveness which compel his reader to take him in earnest and to be in earnest with him. Doubtless this is largely due to the fact that he is delivering a message rather than imparting the results of independent speculation. A highly intelligent and educated mind, trained to explicit statement, and with a peculiar power of familiar exposition, has been charged with a task requiring all these qualifications in an eminent degree. For the undertaking is not a slight one. Western intellect and culture, having despaired of truth, have become "critical." That is to say, all past and present systems of religion and philosophy are regarded as mere historical moments in the development of thought. This view, which is in part correct as regards the form popular beliefs and speculations have taken, recognises no such exception as "esoteric" knowledge. Secret doctrine, indeed, there was and must have been, whenever men philosophised in advance of dominant superstitions. But an esoteric science of things beyond physical ken supposes transcendental faculties of observation and verification; and the existence of such faculties must itself be proved. We are, perhaps, emerging from the time when no proof would be allowed or listened to. Indeed, no time could be more appropriate for urging the claims of esoteric science than the present, when research is being so widely and earnestly directed to the facts which can alone make it probable that such a science exists. The proof of clairvoyance, for instance, carries the mind far beyond the limitations of the faculty as open to ordinary verification. For it then becomes not only easily imaginable that this sense is susceptible of a high degree of development by training and cultivation, but antecedently probable that it belongs to a distinct order of educible powers, giving an indefinite extension to the range of human observation. It does not require any great credulity to conceive that this psychology may actually have been pursued with success by generations of practical students, wholly devoted to its acquisition. It is no new thing that we are asked to believe. Indian philosophy, as may be read in any of our treatises on the subject, not only asserts generally the existence of transcendental wisdom and powers, but defines and classifies their species with much particularity. The sceptic, who finds an easy explanation of popular beliefs, must be perplexed to account for the growth of such systematic exposition, if it has no basis of experience. Incredulity on the part of Spiritualists, on the other hand, is almost illogical. Among them, Dr. George Wyld has the merit of being one of the first to point out * that all the powers we ascribe to disembodied intelligence in even its higher states must be latent in ourselves, their development being only a question of conditions, not necessarily incompatible with physical existence. The realisation of this fact in knowledge and experience is what is meant by Adeptship. For all who believe in spiritual evolution, however little they may have already systematised the conception, the onus of presumption in regard to actual adeptship is shifted. There are forcing processes in nature as in art; and the possible is ever also the actual, if we knew where to look for it. The "rare efflorescence" is not a miracle, it is at most an unreasonable phenomenon. Nor is it even the latter, unless it can be shown that individual development can never outstrip the kosmical. The scientific exposition of the latent principles in man, and of the course of their regular (as distinguished from their exceptional and extraordinary) evolution, is given by Mr. Sinnett in connection with the great scheme of universal manifestation, wherein the same causes, and the same system of their orderly succession, are apparent.

In another respect this book is peculiarly well-timed. The breach between science and religion has widened to a chasm which threatens to engulf the highest hopes and interests of mankind. The spectacle of our sickly faiths drooping and perishing in a hostile intellectual environment is about the most dismal that a mind of any sincerity can contemplate. We seem to be approaching a time when the "organised hypocrisy" of our churches will be as crying a scandal to human intelligence as monasticism had become to human morality three and a half centuries ago. And when it comes it will be a period of upheaval in more than one direction. The positive unbelief which is visibly extending from the intellectual aristocracy to the multitude will almost certainly react with destructive force upon political and social arrangements. It cannot but suggest the redress of inequalities in this world to those who have lost the shadowy hope of compensation in the next. The belief in a future life is not merely a powerful auxiliary to morals; if the kingdom of Heaven is the reward of the righteous, it is also the inheritance of the poor. Many a thoughtful mind must have dwelt with anxiety on this prospect, without seeing from what quarter the reconstruction of religious faith upon a permanent basis could be expected. Can it be that to "the bloodless and innocent record of Buddhism" will be added this claim upon human gratitude and love?

Nothing, certainly, can seem less probable to the student fresh from the pages of Dr. Rhys Davids, and others of the nihilist, or at best agnostic, school of interpreters. The authority of scholars, who brought to their task the utterly unscientific conceptions prevalent in the West about the human soul, has been largely committed to the statement that Buddhism makes no provision for an enduring individuality, and even expressly and emphatically denies it.

There are plenty of passages in Buddhist writings which seem to bear out this view; and in default of the key, which only a deeper philosophy could supply, they had to be left in paradoxical juxtaposition with doctrines implying the very reverse. Attempts to explain away such cardinal tenets as rebirth, the retributive force of karma, hyper-physical existence, &c., are of necessity lame and sophistical. The ordinary student of Buddhism is in the same position as the outsiders who questioned Gotama himself as to the meaning of his doctrine. When the wandering monk, Vacchagotta, in the dialogue translated by Dr. Oldenberg from the Samyuttaka Nikaya, asked the Buddha concerning the existence of a true individuality ("How does the matter stand, venerable Gotama; is there the Ego?"), we are told that "When he said this the Exalted One was silent." "How, then, venerable Gotama, is there not the Ego?" And still the Exalted One maintained silence. Then the wandering monk, Vacchagotta, rose from his seat and went away. "Then comes the disciple, Ananda, and asks the reason of this reticence. He gets the following explanation: 'If I, Ananda, when the wandering monk, Vacchagotta, asked me: 'Is there the Ego?' had answered 'the Ego is,' then that, Ananda, would have confirmed the doctrine of the Samanas and Brahmanas, who believe in permanence. If I, Ananda, when the wandering monk, Vacchagotta, asked me, 'Is there not the Ego?' had answered, 'the Ego is not,' then that, Ananda, would have confirmed the doctrine of those who believe in annihilation. If I, Ananda, when the wandering monk, Vacchagotta, asked me, 'is there the Ego?' had answered, 'the Ego is,' would that have served my end, Ananda, by producing in him the knowledge: all existences (dhammas) are non-ego? But if I, Ananda, had answered 'the Ego is not,' then that, Ananda, would only have caused the wandering monk, Vacchagotta, to be thrown from one bewilderment to another; 'My Ego, did it not exist before? but now it exists no longer!'"

Such passages as the above should surely have warned our interpreters of the danger of misconceiving the apparent negations of Buddhism. So of Nirvana. "It would be ludicrous," says Mr. Sinnett, "to turn to the various discussions which have been carried on by students of Buddhism as to whether Nirvana does or does not mean annihilation. Does the last penalty of the law mean the highest honour of the peerage? Is a wooden spoon the emblem of the most illustrious pre-eminence in learning? Such questions as these but faintly symbolise the extravagance of the question whether Nirvana is held by Buddhism to be equivalent to annihilation." That this should ever have been an open question among our scholars,* argues a certain lack of what may be called metaphysical common sense.

All the more remarkable on this account is the influence, even the fascination, which Buddhism, so far as already understood, has begun to exercise over Western minds. It is no very uncommon thing now to meet in society men who declare themselves, "if anything," Buddhists. The moral ideal of Buddhism is not only pure and beautiful: to a larger extent than in the case of any other religion it has been effective. And now that the materials for comparison are at hand, there is a growing disposition to judge religions by their fruits. A candid estimate of the causes which determine the character and history of races admits that this is a hazardous test. But broad contrasts leave an ineffaceable impression: and after all, it is a poor apology for a religion that it has not caused the cruelties and follies associated with its history, but has only failed to realise the spirit which is opposed to them.

* It is perhaps, no longer so; Dr. Rhys Davids, however, regards it as the sinless state of the Arhat in this life.

* In his essay on "Man as a Spirit."

But Christianity is defective in a still more urgent matter, with reference to the needs of the present time. The present unbelief in individual immortality is greatly owing to ignorance of any rational and logical alternative to materialism. We have, it is true, our idealistic philosophies, satisfying, perhaps, to the metaphysician who does not ask for practical information. But it is the simple fact that nearly nineteen centuries of Christian teaching have left the plain unphilosophical man without a single clear conception of himself, his history, and his future. The clergy have long shirked statements on these points which once were definite enough. But we are without any positive or authoritative instruction to set off against dogmas which common sense repudiates as shocking or preposterous. Buddhism, on the other hand, retains conceptions inherited from the untold antiquity of Brahmanism, and which yet seem almost framed in response to the demands of modern intelligence. Our philosophy is beginning to see that if this physical existence is not the end, neither is it likely to have been the commencement. Buddhism speaks of former as of future births. We ask that the moral order of the world shall be vindicated by causation as necessary as that which science discovers in the physical order. The East answers us with the inflexible justice of Karma. We are revolting from the notion of an eternal state irrevocably determined by a few precarious years of earth-life under accidental conditions. Buddhism replies that no condition is accidental, and no state everlasting. Our religion has never got over the shock of the discovery that this earth is not the centre of the universe. Buddhism never required or admitted that supposition. Above all, we seek for a more spiritual conception of God than that of a Being in external relation to us and to the world. Buddhist negation of such a Being is charged against it as Atheism; whereas the Bodhi, Wisdom, or Logos, is represented as the inmost principle of all that is. Yet all religion recognises our connection with superior powers; and the so-called "Atheism" of Buddhism is not inconsistent with adoration, prayer, and worship. We have been speaking only of exoteric, or popular Buddhism; and we find that it avoids all the fallacies which modern enlightenment rejects in a religion, and that it fulfils all conditions which we can see to be essential.

If, now, this pure and reasonable belief can also be shown to be the outcome of a philosophy, or knowledge of Nature, relating scientific to spiritual conceptions, and effecting the reconciliation so urgently demanded, we may confidently expect that the light thus offered will be recognised and welcomed by our best intelligences, and that the closing years of the nineteenth century will be brightened by a new hope for humanity. But whether the book before us justifies this expectation; how far it succeeds, and in what respects it seems to fail; of what problems it opens a prospect of solution, and what others remain involved in obscurity, or are insufficiently dealt with,—these are questions which must be reserved for examination in future articles.

THE SCIENCE OF MAN, A MANUAL OF ANTHROPOLOGY BASED ON MODERN RESEARCH. Second Edition. By Charles Bray. London: Longmans, Green and Co., or may be obtained from the Office of "LIGHT."

This is a somewhat ambitious attempt to unravel the "Mysteries of Man" and the universe. In order to accomplish the herculean task, the writer has laid a general embargo upon the writings of modern physicists and metaphysicians.

The region of metaphysics is proverbially barren of definite results, and there is in it a wide field for the most latitudinarian speculation.

In physics, however, notwithstanding the transcendentalism of its higher aspects, we are now within our recognised sphere, and in that region of inquiry the author of the "Science of Man" is painfully weak and antiquated.

Chapter I. is devoted to the physical development of the earth, and to the introduction of living organisms with sensibility and consciousness. To specify the errors into which Mr.

Bray has fallen in this department would be to review and practically re-write the entire chapter.

We shall select and briefly note the errors of a few paragraphs taken almost at random.

Mr. Bray says (p. 2): "The moon may be a dead and used up world, such as the earth is becoming, and may probably become, even before it falls into the sun towards which all planetary bodies are gravitating."

The last word of science is that the moon and planets are receding from the sun and from each other. Again, "The earth is gradually cooling down and is still conjectured to be in a state of internal fluidity," whereas the latest speculations of science point, not to the internal fluidity, but to the extensive hollowiness of the sun, earth and all planets.

Again, "By the aid of the spectroscope it has been demonstrated that planets, sun and stars are all made of one material." That has never before been affirmed except speculatively, viz., that all substances are allotropic conditions of hydrogen, but science recognises each body as of many materials.

Speaking of the air the writer says: "These suspended particles are living germs." Some certainly are, but the mass of matter in suspension in the air is mineral and inorganic.

Again and egregiously: "Astronomers now rejoice in the knowledge of eighty eight planets instead of seven." This must be a quotation from an old work, as the number now recognised is about 240, and they are being added to almost monthly.

Further, "The density of Mars is about three-fourths that of the earth." The fact is its mean density is greater than that of the earth, and greater than that of any planet except Mercury.

Again, "So all animal matter has been evolved from a shapeless mass of what Professor Huxley calls protoplasm." This is based on Professor Huxley's hypothetical Bathybius, the existence of which the professor himself does not now affirm.

Again, "If a drop of water can contain 500 millions of living animalcules, each manifesting very decided volitions, and, therefore, endowed with mind." It is very improbable that any one of these millions exercise volition or possess mind; their actions are entirely automatic, and they no more feel or think than does a healthy human heart or the iris of the eye under the stimulus of blood, or light; both are automatic and neither feel nor are amenable to volition.

Again, "Very few, however, if any of these ancient forms of animal life were identical with those which now live, certainly not one of the higher animals was of the same species as any of those now in existence." On the contrary, a fish known as Ctenodus lived in the long ago carboniferous lakes, and a similar fish known as Ceratodus now lives in an Australian river. We fail to see any generic or even specific difference between them, and yet one was a palaeozoic fish and the other is a modern fish, and no similar remains have been found in the formations which fill the intervening millions of years.

Finally quoting the author, "Minute creatures which shew evidence of volition." Their actions are really automatic and unconscious, and no more prove volition than do the automatic movements of Diatomaceae, Volvaceae, Desmidiaceae, and the animal which Mr. Bray says is all stomach, viz., the Amoeba.

The body of this work is filled with ordinary metaphysical speculations, respecting the relations between mind and matter, the subjective and objective, and the most salient feature is, that all our knowledge of mind here, is associated with nervous organisation, forgetful that the boundless manifestations of intellectuality in the universe, as a whole, can scarcely be referred to an infinite physical brain, and besides there are in modern times myriads of manifestations of human intelligence, or intelligence resembling human, apart from the possession of a visible physical organisation.

Notwithstanding its many scientific lapses and anachronisms, "The Science of Man" will well repay perusal, and should the book ever reach a third edition it is to be hoped that the author will submit the revision to the criticism of some discreet and candid scientific friend.

TRANSCENDENTAL PHYSICS: OR, SOME ASPECTS OF MODERN SPIRITUALISM.

A Sermon preached by the REV. H. R. HAWES, M.A., at St. James', Margate, on Sunday Morning, June 10th, 1883.

My subject last Sunday was purely practical, and to-day, some of you will say it is purely speculative. That will not be wholly but only partly true. After all, speculation and practice ought not to be severed. Political speculation precedes all good government; scientific speculation precedes all discovery in science; and philosophical speculation precedes all progress in social life. No speculation is worth anything that is not closely allied to practice, and no speculation ought to be introduced in the pulpit, unless it has points of contact with morals and religion. The subject this morning is Transcendental Physics, or Some Aspects of Modern Spiritualism, and you will ask, What are Transcendental Physics? What is Spiritualism? What have they got to do with each other? and what have either of them to do with Religion? The ideas that arise in your minds as I say these words are doubtless of a very varied kind, and in speaking to a mixed congregation like this I shall ask your indulgence, while I try and put forward what I have to say in a manner to conciliate all reasonable prejudice.

Transcendental Physics and Spiritualism Defined.

What are Transcendental Physics? Transcendental physics deal with alleged phenomena outside the known laws of nature, such as mesmerism, trance, clairvoyance and perhaps, table turning, &c. These cannot be explained by the ordinary laws of physics, and they are therefore called transcendental physics. What is Spiritualism? That is a vague term and covers a large ground. It seems to deal with the borderland between physics, and metaphysics, and with various alleged phenomena including, as you know, various movements of furniture, trances, lights, the writing on closed slates, and some people say spiritual communications; at all events phenomena which are attributed by some to spiritual agencies, by others to animal magnetism, and by a great many people to imposture. That last point you should note carefully. Even the most intelligent believers in Spiritualism are quite agreed that there is an enormous amount of imposture connected with spiritual phenomena, and that the whole question has been exploited by interested persons and charlatans of every kind. The point interesting to the general public is—I can speak more calmly than I could ten years ago—not whether there is imposture—we are all agreed about that—but whether there is a substratum of fact which cannot be explained by the hypothesis of imposture.

Method of Treatment.

With reference to my method this morning, I shall exclude my own experience, because when a man begins to relate his own personal experience, there arise at every point questions which cannot be answered from the pulpit or asked from the pew. I shall exclude also relations of particular occurrences. I am not here to deal out to you a number of marvellous narratives of which your own friends can tell you, and which, if they have not occurred to them, have occurred to somebody else. There is another reason why I should not relate personal experiences or particular narratives. You might say I was silly; or that I was lying; or that I had been taken in; or that what I said could be explained by the known laws of nature, but that I, being a very weak-minded person, had been deceived and had fancied that it was supernatural when it was really natural, whilst you with your superior cunning would have seen through the trick. I could not meet these charges in the pulpit.

These Questions are of Great Interest.

It is impossible to deny that there is very great interest in all these questions in our days; that side by side with the material philosophy which denies the immortality of the soul, and sweeps away various traditions of the past and the superstitious aspects of religion, there is a keen desire to know whether there is anything beyond—whether there is any ground for believing that we have a spirit capable of surviving the shock of death, and whether there is a spiritual world around us into which we may emerge beyond the grave, and also whether there are points of contact between the two worlds with inter-communication going on between them. These thoughts are agitating the minds of people in the present day, and they are intimately connected with the phenomena of the borderland of physics, such as mesmerism and other phenomena which do not range themselves under any known laws of nature. The reason why I put them alongside with Spiritualism is because the two interlace, as it were. The subjects of the one are the alleged subjects of the other. The whole class hangs together, and seems to form a sort of Transcendental science.

The Two Propositions to be Considered.

The propositions I desire to lay before you this morning are two which will commend themselves to all seriously minded people, and they connect the whole subject practically with some of the most vital aspects of religion, and especially the Christian religion.

First—That the phenomena of mesmerism, trance, clairvoyance, clairaudience, thought-reading, and many of the alleged phenomena of Psychicism or Spiritualism are worthy of serious attention and investigation.

The Second is in the words of Mr. Henry Sidgwick, the eminent author of "The Methods of Ethics":—"If only a tenth of the spiritualistic phenomena recorded are bona fide that fact is of the utmost importance to science, and very nearly touches some of the dearest interests of religion."

The Attitude of Literature and Science.—Lecky's Argument.

I need not tell you that we are stopped on the threshold by the contempt of literature and science. If we would be stopped we should be stopped. Literature meets assertions, and propositions of the kind I have laid before you, with flat denial. Thus Mr. Lecky and others say in effect: "Yes, in the past there were people who believed in miracles, and in all kinds of abnormal phenomena; but, as the world has grown wiser, and the light of science has advanced, all these things have disappeared into the limbo of forgetfulness, which shews that they were the result of imposture, or that what was once thought marvellous and miraculous can now be explained by natural laws. We no longer believe in ghosts or the possibility of communion between this world and any other." That sounds very good and very philosophical, and it commends itself to a great many thinking persons who, looking over past history, notice that one after another the superstitions of the ages have faded out, and that many things once thought miraculous are capable of a natural explanation. The only flaw in an assertion of that kind as regards Spiritualism, is that it is not true. If it were true it would be most convincing; but it is not, for the thing is not dying out, nor is there any cessation of the alleged phenomena.

The Number and Status of Believers in the Phenomena.

You have millions of people in the Old and New Worlds believing in a great many abnormal and apparently miraculous phenomena—things which cannot be explained by any known laws of nature. In addition to these millions of the masses, you have thousands of people in both hemispheres who are known to be educated and intelligent persons, who believe in it. So you see it is not only the ignorant masses who accept these phenomena. But besides these millions and these thousands there are hundreds well known to the public as above reproach—people of position, lawyers, doctors, and others—who also bear witness to these things. And you have also some tens of people whose names are counted as amongst the most illustrious in science, literature, art, philosophy, and every branch of human learning. You have witnesses, therefore, who range from the ignorant masses to the most educated of the civilised world, so that the literary position would be excellent but it does not agree with facts. You have four newspapers in England alone devoted to this subject, and numerous societies throughout the civilised world. We had the Dialectical Society, and now we have the Psychical Research Society, under the presidency of Mr. Sidgwick.

The Attitude of Science one of Repugnance and Fear.

Then there is the attitude of science, which is one of repugnance in the first place and fear in the second place. There is something which seems to repel our scientific men from the investigation of this subject. What it is I don't know, unless it is that their present methods seem futile and useless when dealing with Spiritualism. Perhaps it is as Goethe said long ago: "Incredulity has become like an inverted superstition for the confusion of our age." There is also what I have called fear of the subject in the scientific world. This is strange, but true. They advise you not to look into it, because people who were before otherwise quite sane have looked into it and have gone off their heads. This is very simple. You look into it; you become convinced; and people say you have gone mad. You must not investigate, first because it is unworthy of attention, and in the second place because if you do you might become convinced, and that would be a great calamity for you. Upon such pleas as these science will not have anything to say to Spiritualism.

The Narrowness and Bigotry of Science.

Now such an argument is not one entirely to be listened to, because we have, alas! experience that the scientific world is in its way almost as narrow and bigoted as the theological world. You can look back and see that every new invention has been scoffed at by the scientific world. You will remember the contempt thrown on the notion of electric telegraphy and the lighting of the streets with gas, the steam engine, &c., &c.—these instances are amongst our common-places. If you want to go farther back there's the well-known instance of Galileo. The Astronomer Royal of his day refused to look through his telescope for fear of seeing a planet he did not believe in. Science was wrong in all these cases, and its authority is not any more infallible than that of the parsons or the high priests of art. There seems a point where human prejudice and narrowness and slavery to method comes in to prevent science from giving a fair hearing to what may after all be the words of soberness and truth.

The Triumph of Mesmerism over Opposition.

Take the question of mesmerism and you will see an illustration of what I say. There was a good deal of imposture connected with it, but many of us are old enough to remember the turn of the tide as to its main facts. I think it was between the years 1825 to 1831 that there was much talk about mesmerism, in France, and at last a number of doctors and scientific men of the Academy of Paris determined to make an end of mesmerism and met together in a committee to expose it. Amongst them were Itard Fonquier, Geursent Bourdois de la Motte, &c. But these distinguished men, after examination, were compelled to draw out a report bearing witness to the facts of mesmerism. The most important point established was that of its therapeutics—the wonderful power mesmerism has to alleviate suffering. I remember the case of a relative of my own who was suffering from internal cancer, who got two hours every day of most perfect happiness and peace—of entire freedom from pain—through the agency of mesmerism. Some years ago there was a mesmeric hospital in the Marylebone-road, where people were put to sleep and their legs were cut off, and numerous surgical operations performed without the slightest pain to the patients. Mesmerism was making vast strides, and what killed it in England was the use of chloroform forcing itself upon the attention of medical men. It was found to be much more speedy in its action, and that destroyed the interest in what was the most convincing phase of mesmerism, viz., its anesthetic uses. Well, as I have said, all these scientific men bore witness to the main facts although before they scouted it. I suppose there are now very few people who have not had some kind of experience of mesmerism in one way or another.

Now we come to the phenomena of Spiritualism which cover many classes of facts—all roughly comprehended under the general name, "Spiritualism." I think as long ago as 1830, Lord Brougham said, "Even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism, I see a rain cloud, no bigger than a man's hand: it is modern Spiritualism." These are very remarkable words to come from such a man.

The Facts and Theories of Spiritualism.

You may ask me to describe roughly what I mean by Spiritualism. I allude to a large class of phenomena, such, for instance, as the movement of furniture in various ways, to sounds and noises, to cold winds passing over the hands of people, to the appearance of lights. Mr. Crookes told me once he had made a special study of these lights which had often been placed in his hands—sometimes as large as an egg—but he could not make them out; they baffled him to explain on ordinary grounds, and as far as he was concerned he—a critical, analytical chemist—had not been able to analyse them. Then there are the so-called materialisations, substantial to some and filmy to others; also the phenomena of clairvoyance, clairaudience, and others. Many theories obtain amongst Spiritualists to account for these things. It is supposed by some that there is a fluid aura given off by certain persons which is capable of being collected and stored in somewhat the same way that electricity can be collected and stored in a Leyden vase, which can be made to explode with a report; and in like manner the furniture and the rooms where these things take place act as receptacles for the storage of this nerve-fluid. Then there is another theory that this force once accumulated is used by an intelligence external to those sitting in the room. Then there is the theory of imposture, which says that everybody who says he sees anything does not do so; he is deceived, and all that occurs is the result of conscious or unconscious imposture. This is a rough description of modern Spiritualism. The remarkable thing is the growing attention which the subject is meeting with. People at first said it was in the hands of charlatans, and that only ignorant people believed it. But then, Lord Brougham was interested, so was Lord Houghton and Lord Dunraven, Sergeant Cox, William Crookes, Mr. Wallace, &c., and a great many people who did not care to lay themselves open to aspersions of character. It was soon found that there was a mass of evidence floating about in favour of these things. Then there was Mr. Thackeray, who published an account of a séance in the Cornhill, and sent down its circulation by 30,000 copies. Thereupon he got frightened, and said with a good many others similarly circumstanced, "Well, it is a very interesting subject, and perhaps I shall take it up by-and-bye, but I am now engaged in other matters." The real fact is, many people have not the courage of their convictions, and in dealing with Spiritualism all these things have to be noticed. I remember when Mr. Crookes hit upon the radiometer, a remarkable discovery, and interesting from a spiritualistic point of view as shewing the borderland between physics and transcendental physics, i.e., as revealing the extraordinarily subtle nature of the forces with which we are surrounded, how we can see a little and touch a little, but that what is seen and touched is as a tithe of what may be in the universe—I think it was at the time when Mr. Crookes was very much engaged with spiritualistic phenomena that his mind was dwelling upon the extraordinarily subtle forces there are in nature, and the result of his meditations was that possibly even light itself might have a dynamic force—the power of moving something. He then constructed in a vacuum a little weathercock with a silver side to it, and exposed it to light. The instant the slightest beam impinged upon it, it began to revolve slowly, and if you bring it into the far end of a dark room, and light a candle at the other end of the room, so sensitive is it that it will begin to revolve slowly, and in the broad sunlight will spin round with remarkable rapidity. Mr. Crookes attributed the motive power to light, but Sir Charles Wheatstone thought it was heat, and I do not know whether this question has yet been settled. It is sufficient for our purpose, however, to recognise it as an infinitesimally subtle force, and if you believe that the radiometer goes round, as you must when you see it, there is hardly anything connected with nerve force or vibrations that is beyond the bounds of possibility though you may relegate it to the realm of transcendental physics.

The Wide Testimony to the Truth of Spiritualism.

As I have said, an endeavour has been made to explain all this away. People were impostors: they did not understand science; they were specialists and had no critical power; or they were a weak-minded lot, and lived chiefly in America, where everything seems to be believed. Perhaps England also was a little tainted, because English people were not very critical—and, yes! sceptical France might have gone a little wrong—but it was said that Germany, the land of science and philosophy—Germany did not go in for these things. And then in 1877 Germany, too, went wrong, and although such great names as Carl Vogt and Haeckel are dead against spiritualistic phenomena, you have others equally illustrious testifying to their reality—as, for instance, Weber, Scheibner, Fechner, and Zollner, and the Emperor of Germany's Court conjurer. All these men have examined and become convinced. They got one of the most eminent mediums and kept him for weeks experimenting upon him, and at the end of the time he bore witness to the phenomena of trance, slate writing, and a variety of other things. It is most remarkable that a professional conjurer should have been called in. This was done because other people should not say it was trickery, and they, not being experts, had been taken in. Bellachini, the Court Conjurer, bore witness before a public notary as follows:—"I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. But he is not the only one. So long ago as 1847 Robert Houdin said he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain. And Mr. Maskelyne, who is supposed to expose all these things every day at the Egyptian Hall, when pressed by the Dialectical Society, was obliged to confess in writing: "I have never denied that such manifestations were genuine." The general impression is that he denies it every day, but I suppose we must accept this statement as from any other gentleman who sometimes says contradictory things which we cannot reconcile. Jacobs, the European conjurer, in 1880, professed himself at Paris not only a believer in the phenomena, but presented a memorial to the Society at Paris with tests to enable people to distinguish between the false phenomena and the true.

Do you remember the proposition with which I started? Do you think I have established it? Do you think it is a sober proposition, not quite dependent on my opinion? I have shewn you that, as a matter of fact, there are literary men, scientific men, professional conjurers and philosophers—reasonably average reliable people—who have conspicuously borne witness to the reality of these phenomena. Does this not establish, to a great extent, what I premised—viz., that the phenomena of mesmerism, trance, &c., and the alleged phenomena of Spiritualism—not are true—but are worthy of attention and investigation?

The Historical Evidence for the Phenomena.

But when I take a broader and wider view of this subject, and look through history, what do I find? Why, that these very phenomena are part and parcel of the history of the world. No doubt they have been dismissed into the limbo of things utterly incredible by modern philosophers, but you have only to open the Old and New Testaments to find all these classes of phenomena there. Some of you profess to believe your Bible and if you turn to that you find records of all these things. They are generally connected with certain striking personalities, the great leaders and prophets, who stand out and who seem to have been persons abnormally gifted, and in whose presence many striking things are said to have happened, sometimes associated with prayer and at others with fasting, concentration, religious feasts, or sacrifice. Do you not call to mind the trances of David and Solomon, the voice heard by Samuel, the lights seen in the presence of the Shekinah and the use of the crystal in connection with the Urim and Thummin. Many of these things may have been mixed up with superstition and fancy. We are not concerned with that. What we are concerned with is the nature of the phenomena—the things are of the same kind as those which are said to occur now-a-days. Why, the Bible is full of witchcraft as well as of messages from the Lord. We find these phenomena were not confined to specially good spiritual agencies—the power seems to have been due to some physical quality, and the gifts were to be found in exercise amongst the good, the bad, and the indifferent just as everything in this world is mixed up with the good, bad, and indifferent. When the phenomena occurred amongst the heathen, they were said to be due to witchcraft; when in connection with a high Spiritual power amongst the priests and prophets of the Hebrew race, they were claimed as coming from the Lord. But the whole thing is there. The very occurrences which are detailed in our Spiritualistic newspapers, and which occur at séances to-day, have their prototypes in many passages of the Old and New Testaments. So with the gifts of the Spirit. The gifts of healing and of inspiration—variously exercised through the influence of the hands, the eyes, or the breath—are there. "He breathed upon them and said, Receive ye the Holy Ghost." I could go through the Old and New Testament and shew you that all these remarkable occurrences were found in the lives of Abraham, Moses, Samuel, Saul, and in those of every prominent character of the Bible record. Just to shew you what a common thing it was in those days I may mention the case of Saul seeking to find the strayed asses through the agency of Samuel, the seer. He went to him and was at first afraid he would not have enough money wherewith to pay the seer—for such persons seem to have received payment for their services—but in the end he consulted "the man of God," who told him where the animals would be found. It was a commonly accepted thing to have these men about the courts of monarchs in those days. You cannot imagine it was wholly imposture. In the New Testament also you have recurrent classes of spiritualistic phenomena. There they are more rife than ever. There you find people laying their hands upon the sick. James says if you pray with concentration and lay your hands on the sick they shall recover. If there is anything more like therapeutic touching than that I never read it. You often read of the place where people were assembled being shaken; at times there was a rushing wind going through the room; at another time lights appeared when they were assembled together—"cloven tongues of fire." In other places you read of the transfiguration of the individual, as in the case of Stephen, whose face shone as the face of an angel. In the Corinthians Paul goes through all the various phases of trance mediumship and explains how people spoke with tongues and how strange and unknown things came from their lips; and in another epistle he refers to his own spiritual experiences. That is exactly paralleled by the alleged trances going on now. There are also remarkable words of our Lord's. I need not tell you that in His life the miraculous phenomena are not of a different kind from what are recorded in the Old Testament in connection with the prophets, but are rather of an intensified degree. When people wondered at His miracles He merely said that greater miracles could be done by His disciples through faith. He recognised their abnormal character, but did not speak of them as peculiar to Himself, but as something vested in highly sensitive conditions of humanity, of which He was, no doubt, a most perfect specimen.

Three Views Possible.

You may take now three views. You may say: In the Bible these things happened, but we do not believe they happen anywhere else. But people may answer this by saying they appear in heathen history also. There was the spirit-rapping of the sacred tripod of Apollo, the appearances as of "Gods" at the Eleusinian mysteries, the oracles of Delphi, and the gifts of healing amongst the Egyptian priests. Precisely the same kind of things have been going on amongst all nations and in all times.

You may then say: We reject them all—in the Bible and out of it—the sacred as well as the profane. We deny all the miracles of history; we make a clean sweep of all the supernatural in the Bible or in Church history.

Or you may take up the position that doubtless there has been much superstition, much misconception, much charlatanism, but nevertheless the phenomena are so universal, so recurrent both in sacred and profane literature, and so little likely to disappear in this nineteenth century, that we are inclined to think that there is evidence of unknown forces—of forces which have not yet been analysed—at work amongst us connected with special personalities, and we are inclined to think that these forces may sometimes be used by spiritual agencies and by intelligences extra human.

How Science and Religion are Affected.

Now, both these points affect science and religion. If there are any unknown forces that fact concerns science. If a sensitive can put his hand upon the face of a compass and affect the needle, that means a modification of force of some kind, and such modifications surely concern science. If there has ever been a single case of force at a séance which has not been directed by the people present, nor been caused by complicity or imposture, or by a manifestation of the force of the people there assembled in connection with their wills, do you not see in that a crowning point which affects religion, which makes it so important to us to know whether these things are true? It does not matter whether the intelligence is high or low. I will admit that much of what passes current at séances as far as the order of the intelligence goes, is beneath contempt. The point is, Have you evidence of any intelligence whatever acting apart from a brain and nervous system? It may not be human intelligence but that does not matter. Such evidence, if it exists, strikes away the physiological argument against the survival of the soul. This argument is that there is no such thing as soul; that intelligence is the product of matter and force; that without a brain and nervous system you cannot have intelligence; that when you dissolve matter and force in the body you dissolve the soul, because intelligence is entirely dependent on molecular motion. If you can present conscious intelligence of any kind acting outside of a brain and nervous system you have overthrown the materialistic argument. That is what the scientific people are struggling with us about. If you shew that mind can exist and work apart from matter and force then you have established—I do not say the exact truth of our survival—but the possibility of it. If any mind or intelligence can exist outside the body then yours can exist, and you have a new view of the immortality of the soul and the possibilities of your survival; you have a new insight into the philosophy of a spiritual world and you have inflicted an incurable wound upon the heresy of negation and the giant despair of materialism.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

The Graduation of the Phenomena.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Accustomed to obey my impressions, I am constrained to supplement my letter of last week with a second, hoping I shall not be thought obtrusive in so doing. The present discussion is of great importance at the present time, when, as you say, an extensive inquiry is taking place in regard to Spiritualism.

I would venture to suggest that each person contributing to this discussion will be sure to write from his own standpoint; every one write and speaks of Spiritualism as he views it. How true it is that Spiritualism is to each of us as we conceive of it, and that its effect upon us is determined by our perception, capacity, and susceptibility; remembering this, we shall be generously tolerant of the inevitable and infinite diversity of opinion herein exhibited.

I would respectfully suggest further, that each one's personal experience will be the safest guide to him in any opinions he may offer upon this question, and from this principle I deduce two others, viz.: first, that no one can claim to advance opinions that are not legitimately based upon personal experience, and secondly, that no one's experience qualifies him to be an infallible authority to others. The advantage of this discussion, therefore, at the utmost, will be the wisdom and suggestion gathered from the aggregate of individual opinions.

My first experience of Spiritualism was to witness the movements of a little table produced by unseen intelligences, whereby I and others were able to converse at any length with those invisible intelligent beings. This was in the sacredness of a private home, in a company of earnest Christian friends, including four "preachers of the Gospel." The effect upon myself was such that I did not, strictly speaking, see the table; what I really saw, that is, looked at—what arrested my attention was the intelligent agency, the mighty mysterious power, which produced these movements. That little table was to me simply a door opened between this earth and another world, the existence even of which I had not suspected; and the opening of this "door" poured a blaze of light upon me, as when a door is opened between a brilliantly illuminated room and a dim apartment, where I had hitherto been, knowing nothing of the splendid apartment adjoining. There I first discovered that our friends, yea, the countless myriads of human beings who had departed from material life, had not "left" us at all, but had simply extended the range of their existence and experience; and were able at their pleasure to return to the tiny point (earth-life) whence their sentient existence commenced.

From this time, April, 1879, to January, 1880, I saw no phenomena beyond that little table, but this did not signify. I had found one doorway and did not need many; but during those nine months, with reading the literature of Spiritualism and converse with the invisible friends through that little table, I experienced such a "graduation" of thought, of soul, and of experience, such as I had never received from all my years of religious and theological training. In January, 1880, Mr. E. W. Wallis, the eminent trance speaker, came to Plymouth where I then was, and my introduction to him marks a distinct epoch in my experience of Spiritualism. Whilst with Mr. Wallis, I was lifted for a brief moment to the Mount of Transfiguration; but after he had gone I was again left with the little table for another nine months, until October, 1880, when it pleased the spirit world to commence that work at Plymouth, the history of which is known.

During the whole of this time I was labouring in the denominational ministry; in January, 1881, I was called to account and "suspended" for my connection with Spiritualism; then I found that the spirit world had directly chosen and prepared me to become a pioneer of the new era of Spiritualism which commenced with 1881. To very few persons in any part of the world has the year 1881 the significance that it has to myself.

I hope, sir, I shall be pardoned for making these personal references. What I want to ask is: Is it not this graduation of thought and feeling, of mind and soul that is needed, and is the graduation of phenomena, in any case, of use, without some measure of this? Is the result worth the pains in the case of those who see nothing but the phenomena? I am distinctly of the opinion that the advanced phenomena will be thrown away upon those who have not sufficient perception to appreciate the humblest manifestations. This, of course, leads logically to what Mr. Barkas and other experienced Spiritualists contend for, viz., that improper minds should not be admitted where delicate and advanced experiments are being made by the unseen workers. Here, therefore, we are entirely at one. What I wish to emphasise is that no "graduation of phenomena" is of any use to unspiritual persons, and, on the other hand, that those who are inwardly enlightened do not need any such "graduation"; the simplest manifestation will have an effect as great, relatively, as the highest phenomena. At any rate, it has been and is so with myself. The falling of a little apple revealed as much to the mind of Sir Isaac Newton as the grandest phenomenon in Nature could have done.

The outcome, sir, to my own mind, of the principles here laid down is this: that you should omit one half of the heading to this discussion as being entirely superfluous. What is wanted is the preparation of inquirers purely and simply, preparation of mind and heart and soul, then only will they be fitted to have communion with the spirit-world.

In conclusion, I beg to say again, that I pay the profoundest deference to the views of more experienced Spiritualists. When I read the works of "M.A. Oxon," Mr. Barkas, Miss Houghton, J. S. Farmer, &c., I feel how little I know; whilst, therefore, feeling deeply and earnestly in all that relates to the purely spiritual, I gladly sit at the feet of such teachers in all that relates to the "graduated phenomena."—I remain, sir, yours very truly,

CHARLES WARE.

Popery and Spiritualism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The Bull against Spiritualism was too evidently apocryphal to need explanation; but I think something may be said respecting the alleged Encyclical of 1856. If such a document exists, it cannot be known to Catholic priests, bishops, or even cardinals. I knew priests in America who were much interested in Spiritualism, as being in accordance with the faith held by the Church and the phenomena of Catholic miracles. The lives of the saints, even as recorded by so careful a writer as Butler, are filled with spiritual manifestations. The facts of Spiritualism confirm the faith of Catholics in the supernatural, and Catholics have no difficulty in accepting the facts of Spiritualism, even if they believe them to be diabolic.

The late Cardinal Wiseman was well acquainted with the facts of Spiritualism, and looked upon them as a means of spreading Catholic doctrine, and disposing people to join the Roman communion. I know personally that he did not, in some cases, discourage spiritualist investigations. Had the fact been as stated by your correspondent, "A Quondam Romanist," is it likely that he would have not only not forbidden, but actually encouraged, such investigations?

It is evident to me that Spiritualism favours so much the very basis of religious belief that every denomination should rejoice in its advent and influence.—Yours truly,

T. L. NICHOLS, M.D.

The Spiritualist Craze.

SIR,—Your strictures on the article contained in the Baptist Magazine under the above title were as appropriate as they were courteous. One erroneous statement of the writer of that article has, however, been left unchallenged, and I claim your permission to reply to it. The reviewer says: "Many statements in their pages" (meaning the literature of Spiritualism) "are so obviously the sheerest fabrications, and many more of them so unmistakably the product of the wildest delusion, that," &c., &c., &c.

With regard to the delusion this is the old plea which one would think had been left a stage behind, but when he speaks of fabrications I give a blank denial to this thoughtless assertion. As I am loth to ascribe to the rev. reviewer the intention of wilful misrepresentation, his statement proves either his utter ignorance of the spiritual literature or of the phenomena connected with the new dispensation. Let me for one, who have perused nearly all that has been written on the subject in England, America, France, Germany, Italy and Spain, for the last thirty-five years, assure that gentleman that the statements of facts contained in the vast literature of Spiritualism are only an insignificant modicum of the phenomena that have actually occurred in every part of the world. I may add that the phenomena experienced by myself during a very long career of experiment and research are far in advance of anything that has hitherto been described in our pages; phenomena of so transcendent a nature that I dare only communicate them to the most advanced Spiritualists, and which if brought to the knowledge of that rev. gentleman would send him into an ecstasy of bewilderment.

It is to be hoped that the reviewer of the Baptist Magazine will, in future, be more cautious in his assertions in regard to the veracity of Spiritualists, lest he lay himself open to the suspicion of intentional misstatement.—Respectfully yours,

G. DAMIANI.

LANGHAM HALL LECTURES.—The attendance on Tuesday evening last was not nearly equal to that of the two previous evenings, mainly owing, no doubt, to the counter attractions of Mr. Bishop's trials at St. James' Hall, the Dalton Bazaar, and Mr. Howitt's paper before the Anthropological Institute, as much as to the advanced state of the season. In view of this latter circumstance the committee have thought it wiser to defer extended action until the autumn, when they hope to be able to announce a long series of lectures for the winter 1883-84. The present short course of lectures have been thoroughly successful, and we think the committee are acting wisely in not jeopardising that success by continuing the series now that the summer months have come. The balance sheet will be published in these columns after being submitted to the Council of the C. A. S.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON &amp; THE PROVINCES.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

CAVENDISH ROOMS, 51 AND 53, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

"World Gods." The controls of Mr. Morse were clearly in exceptionally vigorous action on Sunday evening last; for, quite apart from the unfailing impress of intellectual power, and penetrating analysis of motive and conduct—always directed practically to the amendment of the conditions of life—to which we are accustomed, as characteristic of the lectures at these rooms, there were oratorical graces of manner to a quite unusual degree. Man himself—the being whom they know, with whose history and prospects they are acquainted, whose inner nature is their always loving theme—supplies to these controls an inexhaustible basis for the exhibition of moral, mental, and spiritual truth, of the highest consequence to the development of the individual. From his surroundings, or his appetites, or tendencies, man has manufactured many World Gods, created many an ideal of the supreme, and will, probably, go on blundering till he comes to see the essence of an all-pervading Divinity which is within himself, and a real part of himself, as the positive and abiding source, in exercise and in promise, of all goodness and of all power. Men have found their World Gods in their sensuous lives, and associated the Supreme with sustained bodily indulgence; they have found them in the opposite extreme of philosophy, which recognises only mind and spirit; and in a large and perplexing variety of intermediate combinations; but there is much danger, and always error, in these extreme, isolated views. The compound nature of man, and the wisdom and goodness of God, being fairly understood and righteously esteemed, there need be, and there will be, no disposition to exclude the bodily functions from cultivation and use, nor, on the other hand, relatively to magnify unduly the mental and spiritual possibilities of being, or to deify any mere presentation of either. Thoughts, speculations, moralities, and systems of each, blossom and bear fruit as World Gods until, in the multiplication of philosophies, the world grows confounded, and earnest souls are as troubled as when the senses ruled. Speaking generally, a man's religious ideas, collectively considered, represent his God; and pitiful, indeed, sometimes are these ideas; but then we must remember that after all they are only attempts to paint Him. Gods of this formation are, unquestionably, the most powerful of the race, because the strongest emotion of our nature is associated with our religious belief; but they are, in their range of consequences, the most pernicious also. The World Gods growing out of the creeds, the doctrines, and the litany of the world, are, nevertheless, of use, in so far as they evidence an aspiring habit and active thought, seeking, under the pressure of the whirl of time, the rest of eternity.

It is also true that religions exist because of the vital truth within each of them, and that that truth will endure while the system which temporarily enshrouded it crumbles away, for religion is the voice of God speaking to the souls of men—the Supreme speaking to His own child.

There are intermediate agencies for the transmission of this voice, and a great mistake is made, said the control parenthetically, when Spiritualism is thought to mean phenomena only, high and heavenly intelligences executing, each in his degree and in combination, the purposes of God, by the cultivation and exercise of their own qualities and powers for the sustenance of humanity. Thus it has happened that all the great teachers of the world, Christ, Buddha, Mahomet and others, have been strong in proportion to the mighty spiritual force within and behind them, although the influence of the not infrequently associated idea of incarnated Gods is distinctly pernicious because it militates against the truth that the Divine spirit is everywhere, running through and therefore intimately affecting the life of every sort and condition of man. What the world needs is not a few Gods who shall be the embodiment of Divinity, or of its own fancies or prejudices; but a recognition of the truth, actively influential in the life, that all mankind should find, within themselves universally, the expression of the Divine principle. The true God is within each of us by essential nature, and a perfected and glorified humanity will one day disclose Him. S. B.

LIVERPOOL.

On Sunday last, in Rodney Hall, Rodney-street and Mount Pleasant, Mrs. E. H. Britten delivered two lectures. The subject of discourse in the morning was "Evil Spirits." The lecturer took advantage of this theme to trace out the origin of evil, which she claimed to be the unsolved difficulty both of science and religion. After tracing out rapidly the various attempts that were made to solve this problem, she gave illustrations of the mental conditions of the primordial man in the savage state, depicting the various causes of difference which must arise under the influence of disease and ante-natal or hereditary tendencies. In a word, she insisted that the causes of disease, want, war, crime, and wrong all lay in man himself, and that the growth and unfolding of the race tended to multiply these differences until in the progress of ages they produced the present heterogeneous conditions of society and the immense variety of grades, both of character and fortune, which mark the condition of humanity to-day. As, therefore, the causes of that which we call evil arise in man himself, so also with man lay the true springs of reform. The lecturer dwelt largely on the value of knowledge as the motor power from whence true reform must spring, and whilst elaborating her theme by carrying forward the results of evil doing on earth into the life beyond, she claimed that, though progress was the genius of creation, man himself must be the lever to work it out, and that a true understanding of the causes of evil would be the best means of promoting a steady and healthful growth in purity and goodness, and an ultimate annihilation of all that we now call wrong and evil. In the evening the lecturer gave an elaborate review of the addresses of the Earl of Carnarvon, at Exeter Hall, on "Modern Infidelity," and the Bishop of Manchester on "Religious Inquisitiveness." There was a large and attentive audience.—Liverpool Daily Post.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

NEWCASTLE.—Spiritualism in this district is spreading among all sections of society with wonderful rapidity. I have been astonished of late in my rambles amongst various classes of people to find the most unlikely persons who were firm believers in the subject. Several of our local magistrates, Churchmen, and Methodists, at the present time are, I hear, having wonderful experiences. I hope they will have the courage of conviction.

The Newcastle Society have been favoured of late with a visit from Mr. Ogle and his subjects, Mr. and Mrs. Nesbit, who are two of the best mesmeric test clairvoyants I have seen. If their services could be secured in the South for a short time, I am of the opinion they would be of some benefit to the scientific investigator. On Sunday morning and evening last, Mr. Brown, trance speaker, of Manchester, discoursed to the friends at Weir's Court. His lectures were of a serious and aspiring nature, and they shewed an earnest effort in the direction of truth.

We notice that our North Shields friends are making strong endeavours to spread a knowledge of the subject in their district. They have engaged the large Oddfellows' Hall for the first Sunday in every month, and should the attendance be continued as at first, they will be highly successful. Mr. W. C. Robson, on Sunday evening, spoke at their regular meeting house, Tyne-street, upon "The End and Aim of Religion." The audience was a large one, and the address, which was a masterly one, met with the highest appreciation.

Our Gateshead friends are still jogging on steadily and surely. Last Sunday evening their president, Mr. Henry Burton, lectured upon the opposition that was ever being hurled at our movement by scurrilous and sceptical opponents. During the course of his remarks he referred to an article recently published in the Family Herald upon the supernatural, and criticised somewhat strongly the ridiculous position taken by the author of the article. We hear from good authority that some time in July Mr. J. J. Morse, of London, will be giving a course of lectures at Gateshead, Newcastle, and North Shields.

NORTHUMBERIA.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Correspondents will greatly oblige by sending us marked copies of newspapers, magazines, and references to books containing articles or items of interest to Spiritualists.

The members of the General Purposes Committee of the C.A.S. are particularly requested to attend the special meeting fixed for Tuesday next, June 19th, at 6.30 p.m., at 38, Great Russell-street, W.C.

MR. HAWES'S SERMON.—We have printed an extra quantity of this issue of "LIGHT" and shall be prepared to supply copies at the rate of 6s. per 100; 3s. for 50; or 12 copies for 1s. Early application is imperative.

MR. SHORTER'S LECTURE.—At the close of Mr. Shorter's lecture on Tuesday evening last, entitled "What are the Uses of Psychological Science?" a desire was expressed for its publication; and one gentleman offered to subscribe two guineas towards the five guineas requisite. A verbatim report was taken; and we shall be very happy to carry out the idea if desired to do so.

MR. JOHN M. SPEAR, OF PHILADELPHIA, U.S.—Many of our readers will be interested to hear that the venerable Mr. John M. Spear, of Philadelphia, one of the pioneers of modern Spiritualism, is expected to be present and take part in the conference of the London Society for the Abolition of Compulsory Vaccination, 114, Victoria-street, Westminster, on Monday evening, June 18th, at half-past seven, when an address will be delivered by Mr. Thomas Shorter, as mentioned in our last issue. It may be remembered that Mr. and Mrs. Spear founded the first spiritual association in England, and have devoted their lives to the interests of human progress. Their sojourn in England, we understand, will be of brief duration.

FURTHER ISSUE OF CAPITAL.

[Previous Issue, £250,000.]

It having been unanimously decided by the Shareholders of this Company to increase the capital from £250,000 to £500,000 by the issue from time to time of 25,000 shares of £10 each, the Directors are now prepared to receive applications for shares of the first £100,000 of such additional capital at a premium of £1 7s. 6d. per share.

The Lands Allotment Company has now been in active work since the year 1872, and has paid the following dividends and bonuses on its paid-up shares:—

YEAR ENDING	DIVIDEND.	BONUS.	TOTAL.
31st March, 1873	5 per cent.	2 per cent.	7 per cent.
31st March, 1874	5 per cent.	2½ per cent.	7½ per cent.
31st March, 1875	5 per cent.	3 per cent.	8 per cent.
31st March, 1876	5 per cent.	3 per cent.	8 per cent.
31st March, 1877	5 per cent.	3 per cent.	8 per cent.
31st March, 1878	5 per cent.	3 per cent.	8 per cent.
31st March, 1879	5 per cent.	3 per cent.	8 per cent.
31st March, 1880	5 per cent.	3 per cent.	8 per cent.
31st March, 1881	5 per cent.	3 per cent.	8 per cent.
31st March, 1882	5 per cent.	3 per cent.	8 per cent.
31st March, 1883	5 per cent.	3 per cent.	8 per cent.

A Reserve Fund has also been created during this period, which now amounts to £21,000, or nearly nine per cent. of the total subscribed capital.

Interim dividends at the rate of five per cent. per annum are paid half-yearly on the 30th September and 31st March, and the Bonus after the Annual Meeting, which is held in the month of April.

The shares of the new issue are payable as follows:—The premium and £1 per share (£2 7s. 6d. per share in all) on application; £1 per share within one week of allotment; and the balance in four instalments of £2 per share on the 1st July, 1st October, 1st January, and 1st April following. Shareholders may pay up in full or in advance, and will participate in Interest on payments in advance, and in Interest and Bonus on shares paid up. Numerous transfers of the previous issue of capital have been registered at £2 PER SHARE PREMIUM, and it is fair to anticipate that this issue will speedily command the same price.

Existing Shareholders of the Company having already subscribed for upwards of one-third of the present issue, early application for the remaining shares is desirable.

As the Company has been in active work for several years, contracts too numerous to specify have from time to time been entered into in the course of business for the purchase, sale, and letting of properties, and for advances thereon, and for works, and for the equipment, improvement, and development of the same. Applicants for shares shall be held to have waived any further or fuller notice of these contracts, and of the particulars thereof.

A copy of the last report and balance sheet, and a report of the proceedings at the recent general meeting, with forms of application for shares, can be obtained of G. E. Brock, Secretary, Offices: 20, Budge Row, Cannon Street, E.C.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

(With which is Incorporated the British National Association of Spiritualists. Established 1873.)

38, GREAT RUSSELL STREET, BLOOMSBURY, LONDON, W.C.

(Entrance in WOBURN STREET.)

THIS ASSOCIATION was formed for the purpose of uniting Spiritualists of every variety of opinion in an organised body, with a view of promoting the investigation of the facts of Spiritualism, and of aiding students and inquirers in their researches by providing them with the best means of investigation. The Association is governed by a President, Vice-Presidents, and a Council of thirty Members elected annually. The Reference and Lending Libraries contain a large collection of the best works on Spiritualism and occult subjects. Spiritualist and other newspapers and periodicals from all parts of the world are regularly supplied for the Reading Room, to which Members have access daily. The Secretary, or his representative, is in attendance to receive visitors, and answer enquiries; on Saturdays, from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m.; on other days from 2 p.m. to 9 p.m. On Sundays the Rooms are closed. Spiritualists and others visiting the Metropolis are cordially invited to visit the Association and inspect the various objects of interest on view in the Reading Room and Library. Information is cheerfully afforded to inquirers on all questions affecting Spiritualism. Members' Free Stances are held on Wednesday evenings, at 8 o'clock prompt, subject to certain regulations, which can be ascertained on application. Discussion Meetings are held fortnightly during the winter months. Admission free to Members and Subscribers, who can introduce one or more friends to each meeting. Programmes can be obtained on application during the winter season. Soirees, at which all friends are welcome, are held at intervals during the season. An admission fee is charged, including refreshments.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

Some of my correspondents are anxious to know what I make of Bishop and the £5 note. Not very much. As the Daily News said of the Psychological Society's thought-transference, "We cannot accuse the thought-readers of collusion, we cannot suggest additional precautions to avoid guess-work or cheating; we can only say that we remain unconvinced," so in a measure say I. I am quite unconvinced, and it would require a much more carefully conducted experiment than that most disorderly one at St. James's Hall to convince me. Accounts vary very much, and it is hard to get a clear notion of what did occur. But it seems that Lieut.-Colonel Statham held a note which Colonel le Poer Trench got from his bankers a week previously, and the number of which he did not know. There would seem, then, to be no check on any attempt to change the note; and in the disorder that reigned it is conceivable that such an attempt might be successful.

It may, perhaps, seem that this is hypercritical. But Mr. Bishop inspires criticism, and all experience hitherto is dead against the possibility of performing such a feat as Mr. Bishop claims to have done under such conditions as those in which he is alleged to have performed it. When Mr. Bishop first came to England his pretensions were of a much more modest nature (if the use of such a word, in such a connection, may be pardoned), and this writing "with great rapidity" on the first trial, and with no conceivable clue from the subject, 66,894, is, to the last degree, suspicious. Moreover, Mr. Russell's bank-note was rejected, and Mr. Bishop fenced about "amid groans of weariness and disgust" until he apparently got what he wanted. If he could write off the five figures without a pause when Colonel Trench's note was in Colonel Statham's hands, it is not a little curious that he should have risked disgusting his audience, alienating the gentlemen who were on the platform—Mr. Haweis and another gentleman seem to have left in disgust—and converting sympathetic friends into angry foes by his equivocation and wrangling. Mr. Bishop is too astute to do that without some strong cause. And the natural suggestion is that he knew that he could not get the number of Mr. Russell's note, but that he could get "with great rapidity" the numerals 66,894.

However this may be, it is necessary that the experiment be repeated under more sensible conditions before the claim made can be admitted. Nothing is impossible; and it is not impossible that Mr. Bishop may be able to do "what no human being has ever done since the commencement of the world," as Mr. Labouchere rashly says. But having regard to what we do know, it will require excellent and unimpeachable proof to add that as a fact to our stock of knowledge. Spiritualists, instead of being the credulous race the world imagines them to be, are used to sifting evidence, and they want something better than the disorderly scene on the platform at St. James's Hall. Mr. Labouchere's letter of June 13th, to the Times, renews his challenge in terms to which no fair objection can be taken. It is not surprising to read that Mr. Bishop will have none of it, for the preposterous reason given in this paragraph—"Mr. Irving Bishop will not accept Mr. Labouchere's second proposal to test his powers of thought-reading until the member for Northampton has paid the wager which, in Mr. Bishop's view, he lost in the early part of the week. Mr. Labouchere does not acknowledge that the wager was lost, and has, of course, no intention of paying the money."

In a rejoinder of inordinate length to Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Bishop avails himself to the full of the opportunity to advertise himself. He does not, however, in the least, explain why he declines to avail himself of the chance of transferring £1,000 from Mr. Labouchere's pocket to his own. The amusing part of his very 'cute letter is his account of his reasons for declining to operate on his "friend," Professor Lankester. Nothing more amusing has been read for a long time than the narrative of the Professor's demand for two guinea stalls for the entertainment on the sacred name of friendship, and of Bishop's consequent high-minded refusal to deal with him, lest it should be imagined there was collusion between these two searchers after truth. It is not uncharitable, I hope, to suggest that Mr. Lankester would have been not unwilling to be selected as a "subject," especially as his "friend" did not exact the guinea for his entry. He might then experiment in his own way on the "elusive wild beast;" think (for instance) of the wrong number, or of none at all; and so the failure would have been all the more signal. It was very pretty, and Bishop's counter-move was very shrewd. Of course Professor Lankester does not believe in Bishop's pretensions, and would catch him with glee. He says in effect, in his letter to the Times (June 20th), that he is a mere conjurer. Probably; but the correspondence is not yet ended.

It was inevitable that some attempt should be made to supply the vacant place caused by the cessation of the Psychological Review. This has been done by the publication this month of the first number of the Spiritual Record. The aim is somewhat different from that of other magazines. A large amount of space—"at least two-thirds"—is to be devoted to the record of facts "gathered from the old range of scientific observation—the old and the new." This is the "first and most important work—to set forth the phenomena." Accordingly we have in No. 1 some facts about Slade; some narratives from the proceedings of the Psychical Society; some evidence from Mr. S. C. Hall, Mr. T. P. Barkas, and Dr. Nichols; and the photographing of Katie King, besides other matter. The area from which facts can be drawn is now very great; the facts themselves are very numerous, though whether or not most of them are recorded with precise accuracy is a very different matter. There can be no doubt that the recording in accessible form of any facts is good work. But, unless I am mistaken, it is the collation of those facts and the framing of a philosophy that shall explain and interpret them that the age now needs. They are being verified with most scrupulous care by the Society for Psychical Research. What is needed now is the mind to group and collate them, to distinguish their causes, and to give us a philosophy that shall interpret them. The tendency of thought is all in this direction: and that, to my mind, is one of the hopeful omens for the future. That work is one of vast magnitude, and it will be aided, in no slight degree, by the careful collection of evidence such as is proposed in the Spiritual Record.

Mr. Haweis' sermon was a bold and outspoken utterance even for him. He has accustomed his congregation, which includes a larger number of advanced thinkers than any other in London, to a free use of Reason in all things. It is not till a man habitually brings everything to that test, and uses the faculty which God has given him on all questions that concern him, that he can be fitly said to think. Many men who pass for intellectual giants never think at all about what demands clearest and best thought. Many a scientist never thinks or argues outside of his own subject, and though profound and widely informed in respect of it, talks mere nonsense on such a subject as that handled last Sunday week by Mr. Haweis. If in any church receptive minds may be looked for, it is among Mr. Haweis' congregation, and it is a subject for thankfulness that he was moved to provide them with the food he then gave them. It is hard to believe that good will not come of such a candid and lucid exposition of truth.

It is, indeed, very cheering to find efforts at the promulgation of truth from the world of spirit so frequent now. It leads to the conviction that the unseen Teachers are finding vehicles for their messages in the most unlikely and divergent quarters. Through no one medium can the whole message be transmitted. To no one mind is it given to grasp the many-sided truth. He will get most who lends a listening ear to most that comes through these various channels. He will learn least who thinks that he knows most already. Broken lights of the Sun of Truth are flashing all around us, and it seems as if the discord and chaos of the past years were about at length to yield to harmony and order. The time is ripe for a philosophy of our complex subject: and efforts are being made in nearly all lands to supply it from all points of view. And that we may not lose our hold on what the world calls objective facts, the Psychical Society is verifying them anew and pinning down our attention to the very foundations of faith. So that from all points of view that impact on our intellectual lives, on our moral code, and on our religious aspirations, which a "sickly faith" has well nigh ceased to exercise, seems to be in process of realisation.

In his review of Mr. Sinnett's new book, "C.C.M." puts the case with profound truth in a passage of singular beauty, which I may be pardoned for extracting from a review of a book which may not command universal interest:—

"The breach between science and religion has widened to a chasm which threatens to engulf the highest hopes and interests of mankind. The spectacle of our sickly faiths drooping and perishing in a hostile intellectual environment is about the most dismal that a mind of any sincerity can contemplate. We seem to be approaching a time when the 'organised hypocrisy' of our churches will be as crying a scandal to human intelligence as monasticism had become to human morality three and a-half centuries ago. And when it comes it will be a period of upheaval in more than one direction. The positive unbelief which is visibly extending from the intellectual aristocracy to the multitude will almost certainly re-act with destructive force upon political and social arrangements. It cannot but suggest the redress of inequalities in this world to those who have lost the shadowy hope of compensation in the next. The belief in a future life is not merely a powerful auxiliary to morals; if the kingdom of Heaven is the reward of the righteous, it is also the inheritance of the poor. Many a thoughtful mind must have dwelt with anxiety on this prospect, without seeing from what quarter the reconstruction of religious faith upon a permanent basis could be expected. Can it be that to 'the bloodless and innocent record of Buddhism' will be added this claim upon human gratitude and love?"

It is because I believe that the Religion of the future will be founded on the Science which is now being demonstrated by Occultists and Spiritualists, and that so Science and Religion will meet together and walk hand in hand, that I am hopeful and trustful as to the future.

REVIEW.

ESOTERIC BUDDHISM. By A. P. Sinnett. Trübner, 1883. Price 7s. 6d. Or may be obtained from the Office of "LIGHT."

SECOND NOTICE.

"The esoteric doctrine finds itself under no obligation to keep its science and religion in separate water-tight compartments. Its theory of physics and its theory of spirituality are not only reconcilable with each other—they are intimately blended together, and interdependent."

That is a statement which every reader of this book should keep in view, for on its verification depends the value of the doctrine expounded for Western thought. Does the conscious life of man take up and carry on the process of Nature, fulfilling her purpose in its own development? In other words, is there a point in evolution at which Nature becomes humanity; at which the unconscious impulse no longer suffices, but finds the possibility of further realisation in the very fact of self-knowledge? In that case we should expect to see the biological process which carried Nature up to man resumed in consciousness. The universal will which heretofore worked as forces of nature would henceforth appear as the voluntary striving of the individual; the manifestation of the higher principles belonging to the ideal life. The natural philosopher would thus be compelled to recognise the moral and spiritual law as a continuation of that with which he has been conversant in his own department. By a comprehensive extension of the domain of science, the so-called supernatural would be understood as the negation, not of law, but of finality; and the belief in it as the conscious presentiment, indeed the very working, of further evolution. That is to say, the idea of evolution, maintained in its integrity, and carrying with it the law of its operation as recognised by the previous observations of science, is transferred to the soul. What the unscientific believer in soul had hitherto regarded as the unknown subject of his temporal and habitual consciousness, is now seen to be a well-spring of principles. The discovery of these principles becomes, from the very nature of the case, their realisation also; and this, which constitutes the religious life of man, is also the consummation of science. Thus, also, the mystic aphorism that "to know is to be," is justified and explained. Science, which supposed that its province was purely intellectual, will find with astonishment that in order to advance it must become "religious"—not, indeed, devout and ceremonial, but aware of the spiritual principles whose exposition is conscious development. That, in future, is the field of scientific observation, and observation and experience are then identical.

Every mystic, that is, every one in whom religion has become vital, or in whom the next principle—the sixth in Mr. Sinnett's classification—has commenced its conscious evolution, has had a necessary perception of this truth. Hence many phrases in the higher religious literature which seem merely figurative when not absolutely unintelligible to ordinary minds, and yet are expressive of this advanced experience, such as "Regeneration," "Christ in us," the "New Man," &c. Here the esoteric and felt truth blends with, and invests itself in, the forms derived from traditional teaching. For this experience rarely results in intellectual negation, though it has frequently ensued thereon. In the first case you have the orthodox mystic, who, because he has found a language in which he can symbolically clothe his perceptions, will contend that this spiritual meaning is the true, inner, and a priori intention of the language. That was the case with Swedenborg, who read his doctrine of degrees into the Bible, and deduced a theory of verbal inspiration,* the latter being the continent of a spiritual, and that of a celestial meaning. It does not signify what the religion or sect of the mystic is. He will identify his sixth principle with the personal and historical representative of his exoteric creed, whoever that may have been. Certainly, the mystic comes very near to the conception of evolution as expounded in this book, when he asserts that a divine germ is ingenerated in all mankind from the beginning; just as we also find the doctrine of the "Fall" corresponding with the account here given of the gradual materialisation of life on the downward arc of the grand cycle of our world chain. But the unscientific form of religious experience cannot represent the process in consciousness, the energy of a deeper Will, otherwise than as the convertive influence, fructifying if not actually creative, of a distinct personality. And that is because the religious mind has the ordinary conception of individuality as already complete, of the soul as a finished entity, terres alque rotundus. The view to which this book introduces us, while testifying to the same facts of real religious experience, is a wholly new one as regards human individuality. That man has grown out of nature is an idea which the speculations of the last twenty years have made familiar enough. That this has taken place within the largest period which science can assign to organic life on our globe has always been a difficulty with Darwinian evolutionists. And they will be slow to accept the conditions on which the theory is here shown to be truly maintainable. We are more immediately concerned now with the fact that this psychology represents our conscious life as manifesting one only of the principles of universal Nature, and therefore also of its own. The individual microcosmic unit germinally or latently includes from its first appearance on the scene of evolution all the principles, seven in number, whose successive manifestation is necessary to its perfection. Thus individuality is coeval with cosmic nature itself; but for its manifestation in consciousness, its self-recognition and life as an Ego, the process must be completed, and until this happens the personality of any given stage is not coincident with it. The personal Ego belongs to whatever principle it expresses; it cannot say, I am the imperishable individual; it has to become that, or to follow the fate of its principle when the world period has arrived, for this to be superseded by the manifestation of the next higher (or deeper) degree of life. The personality of a principle—in humanity at our stage the fifth—must, as we understand the doctrine, be regarded as covering all the incarnations which, so far as memory is concerned, will appear as themselves distinct personal existences. The plunge into matter at each incarnation obliterates the personal memory which is conserved in the long intervening periods of rest, or Devachan; but the Ego remains the same, and inherits its past Karma, or merit, with all the consequences for its new earthly life. Yet that Ego is not the individual, any more than a part is the whole. The Ego of the fifth principle cannot represent the sixth or seventh. The sixth principle, when ready for evolution, will suppress or assume the fifth. But evolution having arrived with humanity at the conscious stage, can only be carried on in the consciousness of that principle which the higher, or evolving, principle thus raises to itself. That enables us to see that the fifth principle Ego must, by willing admission and realisation of the sixth, "work out its own salvation." But it cannot, so to speak, keep the universe waiting for it to do this. There comes a critical time in the vast history of human development when the sixth principle must take possession of the world stage—of the seven planets which form the theatre of our evolution. It may be asked—How can that time be fixed if the process is voluntary on the part of all the Egos concerned? And why, in that case, have they it not in their power "to keep the universe waiting"? We suppose the answer might be somewhat like that which a statistician or actuary would give if asked for the data on which uniformity of results is anticipated from the actions of human caprice, or the accidents of human life. Individual cases vary, but averages are certain. The laggard Egos would then find themselves in the presence of a race becoming more and more superior to themselves, and that would happen to them which happens to savage tribes when confronted with a higher civilisation. The Ego of the fifth principle would find it increasingly difficult to obtain re-incarnations in a world gradually getting to be composed of sixth principle entities. The consciousness in Devachan being exhausted, they must, therefore, lapse into lethargy, and at last into complete oblivion until the return of the universal life impulse to their appropriate stage in the next manvantara. Then they wake up and try again.

It will thus be seen that the doctrine of "conditional immortality" in the Adept teachings refers to the self-conscious life of forms, or ideal entities, which are themselves imperishable. It follows with strict necessity upon the fact, that evolution from a certain point must be carried on in the conscious and voluntary life of humanity. But the personal Ego of the fifth principle not being sunk in, or identified with, any one of its many objective existences, does not lose consciousness—or from an Ego lapse into a mere potential form; in the rare case of such an existence being blotted out from the grand memorial life the Ego would recover in union with the sixth principle. "That complete remembrance," says Mr. Sinnett, "is only achieved by the individual at the threshold of a far more exalted spiritual state than that which we are now concerned with, and which is retained far later on in the progress of the vast cycles of evolution. Each one of the long series of lives that will have been passed through will then be, as it were, a page in a book to which the possessor can turn back at pleasure, even though many such pages will then seem to him most likely very dull reading, and will not be frequently referred to." And in this "book of the resurrection," we are told, "there will be no entirely infamous pages; for even if any given spiritual individuality has occasionally, during its passage through this world, been linked with personalities [objective Egos] so deplorably and desperately degraded that they have passed completely into the attraction of the lower vortex, that spiritual individuality in such cases will have attained in its own affinities no trace or taint of them. These pages will, as it were, have been clearly torn out of the book." Far more important is it whether the fifth principle Ego itself can "tide over" the great crisis of its destiny—the middle of the fifth round, when the turn of the sixth principle has arrived for conscious evolution. As long as the fifth principle is the super-jacent deposit in the stratification of life, its Egos are safe. "If it seems to any one horrible," observes the author of this book, "that an 'immortal soul' should perish, under any circumstances, that impression can only be due to the pernicious habit of regarding everything as eternity, which is not this microscopic life. There is room in the subjective spheres, and time in the catenary manvantara, before we even approach the Dhyan Chohan or God-like period, for more than the ordinary brain has ever yet conceived of immortality. Every good deed and elevated impulse that every man or woman ever did or felt, must reverberate through aeons of spiritual existence, whether the human entity concerned proves able or not to expand into the sublime and stupendous development of the seventh round. And it is out of the causes generated in one of our brief lives on earth that exoteric speculation conceives itself capable of constructing eternal results!"

Of the conditions of conscious evolution, we learn much that is new, and entirely consistent with the general tenor of this philosophy. Up to a certain point, everything is done for us, or, which is the same thing, Nature has not yet become self-conscious in humanity. If we ask what responsibility means in this system, we find it in the relation of the developed fifth to the undeveloped sixth principle. The latter for us now is the spirit. The distinction between intellect and spirituality is, perhaps, less clearly explained than would be desirable. But by intellect, Mr. Sinnett means the discursive or ratiocinative faculty—the dianoia of the Greeks—as distinguished from the higher ideality or nous. The knowledge of the latter is intuitive. But the objects of these two faculties are also different. "There is one thing which intellectual processes do not help mankind to realise, and that is the nature and supreme excellence of spiritual existence." We may perhaps illustrate the relative functions of the two faculties by the operations of genius. A great idea does not result from any amount of reasoning. It is the intuition of the sixth principle, but it can only enter our consciousness by taking on an intellectual form and getting worked out by an intellectual process. The intuitions of a sixth principle consciousness, on the other hand, would entirely supersede all such work. But more than that; it would grasp at once the multitudinous ideal relations which distinguish whole truths from the half or partial ones attained by intellect at its best. It would be exempt from the danger of "a little knowledge." We can thus understand also the Satanic nature of the sixth principle will, which not having the excuse of ignorance, to be wicked must consciously say, "Evil, be thou my good." For that too is possible, according to this startling doctrine. Spirituality, while it is the condition of survival into the spiritual, or sixth principle period, is not identical with goodness. That position is stated by Mr. Sinnett with his usual uncompromising clearness. "It will plainly be seen eventually that there must be evil spirituality as well as good spirituality. So that the great question of continued existence turns altogether and of necessity on the question of spirituality, as compared with physicality. The point is not so much, 'shall a man live, is he good enough to be permitted to live any longer?' as 'can the man live any longer in the higher levels of existence into which humanity must at last evolve?' Has he qualified himself to live by the cultivation of the durable portion of his nature? If not, he has got to the end of his tether."

But upon this an important observation presents itself, for which we are also indebted to Mr. Sinnett. Although virtue has its direct and appropriate reward in the long, though temporary states of post-mortem rest, or Devachan, as also in the improved conditions of future earth lives in the present period of humanity, it also gives the Ego an immense advantage in the struggle for existence which is to ensue at the critical transition period. For while the evil will of the fifth principle very rarely develops the spirituality of the sixth, the good moral consciousness is eminently conducive to it. We may safely assume that of the Egos which tide over the crisis, a great majority will be potential demi-gods, and comparatively few will be potential devils.

But the possibility of the latter accounts for the difficulty of obtaining initiation into practical Occultism. For not only would the possession of its powers by a will not seen times purified from every taint of selfishness be dangerous to surrounding humanity; but these powers belonging to another principle, the latter must be developed for their full attainment. Practical initiation, with its premature forcing processes and training, might just as easily, as will be seen from Mr. Sinnett's explanation of spirituality, develop a devil as a demi-god. Now the Adept, Ariat, or Mahatma (for we learn that they are all the same) is more than an accomplished Psychical Researcher in our sense; he is one who has in himself forced or antedated the regular progress of evolution. So, at least, we are told. We further learn that his great object in the service of humanity is to swell the number of successful Egos at the great transition. But there is no hurry; and in view of the danger aforesaid, he prefers to wait for a later race—which will consist, he it remembered, of just the same Egos—better prepared by nature for the attempt. In the meantime, however, it is thought by some of the fraternity that the time is ripe for imparting a speculative knowledge, of which mankind may make a great and fruitful use. Hence this book.

The British Lodge of the Theosophical Society reposes a provisional faith in these statements. Its attitude is not one of blind credulity, or of reason surrendered to authority. But many of its members believe that there have already been given the outlines of a great philosophy. They have entered the school within which they expect those outlines to be filled up and completed. And, like rational scholars, they do not begin by questioning the knowledge of their masters. That must be tested by ability to solve the doubts which arise, and to remove the difficulties suggested by instructed criticism. The above article has touched but one of the subjects—though all are intimately connected—comprised in this book. It will be impossible to refer to all of them on the same scale. The book itself—there are only 215 pages—must be read and re-read by anyone who would be qualified to form an opinion upon the questions it deals with. But next week, with the permission of the editor, I will refer to some metaphysical questions which have been purposely reserved from the foregoing review.

Mr. T. P. Barkas, F.G.S., writing to the Newcastle Daily Chronicle with reference to thought-reading and thought-transference, asks, if any of the readers of that paper have mesmeric sensitivities under their control, to be allowed to try some crucial experiments in thought-reading and clairvoyance. Perhaps some of the readers of "LIGHT" can help Mr. Barkas.

THE VALLEY OF DEATH.—The Valley of Death in the island of Java, where "the deadly Upas tree" exerted its baleful influence over all forms of life, turns out to be a huge imposture. The scientific curiosity of Dr. Otto Kuntze, the celebrated German explorer, impelled him to visit Pakamamm for himself and to investigate its potent death-sleeping effects. His guides and servants would not countenance such temerity, and one of them tried to hold him back from certain death by sheer force. But he pushed on, and found instead of myriad skeletons of beasts, serpents, and birds, that such a thing as even a dead fly was not to be discovered, after a long and careful search, and that the valley was quite as healthy as any other part of the island.

A BURNING KISS.

About the year 1869 or 1870, I went with a friend named B. F. on a visit to an old house in Scotland. I had heard nothing of any rumour of the house being haunted, but the first night I arrived our host said, "You and B. are going to have the two large rooms in the tower; you won't mind?" I said, "Oh no, it will be jolly, and I am glad that B. will be in the next room." He said, "I am sorry to put you there, but the house is quite full." When I saw my room I was delighted with it, for it had one window to the North and another to the South, with lovely views over the park and hills. I was glad to tumble into bed, for I was very tired, but before doing so I fastened my door and also tried another door which looked as if it went into B.'s room, but it appeared to be screwed up and had not any keyhole. I asked B. through the door if it opened into his room. He said there was a similar door in his room, but it was fastened up. (I went the next day and found it secured as tightly as my own.) I then shouted good-night, and was soon asleep.

I was wakened in the night by what seemed to me a burning kiss. It appeared to sear the flesh through to the cheek bone. I jumped up in bed and distinctly saw the half body of a lady pass from the side of the bed, go down the room and through the door that was closed up, as if going into B.'s room. I jumped out of bed and went at once to the door and tried it, but it was as firm as a rock. Both my windows had the curtains undrawn, and the moon was shining into the room almost as light as day. I then struck a light and went to the glass, expecting to see my cheek blistered, but there was no mark, though it ached as if burnt. I then went down the stairs and tried if my lamp outside could in any way produce such a spectre, but it did not. I then turned into bed again, feeling cold and uncomfortable. In the morning, directly I heard B. moving, I went to his door and said, "Oh, I have had a most horrible thing occur." He said, "Stop, don't say another word. I have also; you tell some one and I will tell our host." We did so, and our accounts exactly agreed, the figure in his case also disappearing into the closet between our two rooms. It was a beautiful face, but there was a gloomy, hard look of misery; B.'s term was, "a look of despair." I was nearly telling it at breakfast, but a look from our hostess stopped me, for she was afraid it would alarm the other guests. A lady who was staying there before I came had alarmed the whole house by saying that some lady had been lying with her head on the pillow by her side, and when she tried to touch her there was nothing to touch, but she could see her distinctly.

One night, a week or ten days afterwards, I was sitting up late, writing letters home. All had gone to bed, when the door of the room I was in suddenly opened wide. It was a heavy oak door studded with iron nails, and very heavy to open. It seemed as if an iceberg had come into the room, but I saw nothing; yet the same kind of uncomfortable feeling passed over me. I put away my papers and marched off to bed. Going down the corridor I saw the same face again looking through a window. I turned my light full upon it, and had time to notice it distinctly; but I did not see it again, though I should have liked to do so; and yet there was such a very strange feeling both times. They told me that the lower half of a female had been seen many times walking in an old graveyard that there was in the park, and sitting on the gravestones there.

From what I could gather, one of the old Lairds was jealous of his young wife, and after giving it out that they were leaving home for some time he murdered his wife in the tower, cut her body through, and put it in a chest in the closet in the wall between the two rooms. He disappeared for some time, then came back intending to bury the body, making up a story that she had been drowned.

He had taken half the body to the graveyard and buried it, intending to bury the other half another time, but he was found dead at the entrance to the tower, supposed to have been killed. That was one version, but there were others also, fairly agreeing as to the murder having been committed and the body divided. But this is all hearsay. I can only vouch for what occurred to me. I am not in the least superstitious. If I had been so, the old place and the gloomy staircase up to the tower might have made me fanciful, but I went to bed charmed with my room and with the novelty of the whole place, and I had not a thought of a ghost on my brain.

E. J. S.

The foregoing letter was not originally addressed to me; but, having obtained a copy of it, I submitted the MS., in its present form, to the writer (a gentleman well-known to some of my friends) for his authentication. He further referred it to his companion on the visit, and to the gentleman who was their host on that occasion. They all three accept it as an accurate account of the occurrence.

In a letter from a common friend of the parties, communicated to me by the lady addressed, he says that he took the occasion of a visit from the host of the haunted house to question him about the story, when he told him that there was not the slightest doubt of it, and that the apparition had been seen by three other people, none of whom knew anything about it beforehand, making five in all who saw it. Only the face was described by the other witnesses as being extremely repulsive. The very unpleasant kiss was only inflicted on the writer of the present narrative.

CLAIRVOYANT DREAMS.

I am allowed by Mr. John Mackenzie, 1, Greig-street, Inverness, an Associate of the Society for Psychical Research, to send to "LIGHT" for publication the following cases within his own experience:—

"In the month of December last, my eldest son, about twenty-three years of age, was on his way to the West Indies. On or about the morning of the 14th of that month, my wife, who, like myself, has a strong propensity for dreaming, said, 'I dreamt last night that Davie was shipwrecked.' In less than a week after I was startled by seeing a paragraph in a newspaper to the effect that the ship he sailed in struck on a reef of rocks, four miles from Barbadoes, on the 13th December, 1882, and that all hands were rescued by boats from the shore on the following morning.

"Now, with the exception of the exact date of the dream, I am prepared to give satisfactory proof for the above in every particular. First: That my wife informed myself and the members of my family of the dream several days before we heard the news. Second: That my son, who at present fills an office in Barbadoes, was in that ship when wrecked, and was one of the last two men rescued from her. And lastly, I attach a paragraph quoted from military authorities as to the actual occurrence of the wreck and the narrow escape they had."

The paragraph enclosed by Mr. Mackenzie is a cutting from a newspaper, the material part being as follows:—

"Royal Artillery. The Field-Marshal Commanding-in-Chief has expressed in general orders his high appreciation of the conduct of Lieutenant-Colonel W. H. Wardle, R. A., and the officers, non-commissioned officers, and rank-and-file under his command, on transport Bolivar, when it was wrecked off Barbadoes, on the 13th December last."

"About eighteen months ago, I dreamt of seeing my only sister, who resides about a hundred miles from me, in a most pitiful plight, lying in bed, and her face the very emblem of suffering pain. In the course of a few days after, I receive tidings of her having accidentally broken her ankle bone, from the effects of which it took her several months to recover."

PROPHETIC DREAMS OF THE DERBY.

In the spring of 1871, the year that Favonius won the Derby, Mr. Ramsay, of Croughton House, Brockley, was intending to back the horse called King of the Forest. But in a dream one night, about two months before the event, he saw the race run, and being below the stand he saw that King of the Forest came in second, and a horse that he did not know, first. On looking at the numbers on the board over the Judge's box he saw Nos. 5, 7, and 23 for the first, second, and third places.

At the same time he understood that No. 23 would only be third if one of the Dawsons ran a horse, and, as it turned out, there was none from their stables that year. When Mr. Ramsay came to Epsom he told all his friends of the dream, and on the numbers coming out on Wednesday, he backed Favonius (No. 5) to win, and King of the Forest (No. 7) for a place among the three first. He had distinctly seen him come in second in his dream, and observed his colours, yellow and black cap. Only seventeen horses ran, so that there was no No. 23 on the list.

Among those to whom Mr. Ramsay told his dream was Mr. Severne, of Wallop, M.P. for South Shropshire, who, with Mrs. Severne, was one of a large party at a house near Epsom for the race week. Mr. Severne related the dream he had from his friend at dinner on Tuesday evening, and he and some others determined to back the horse which should be indicated by No. 5, an intention which he carried out next day when it proved to be Favonius.

At the actual running Favonius came in first, while Albert Victor (No. 6) and King of the Forest (No. 7) ran a dead heat for the second place. Digby Grand (No. 17) got the third place. The dream, it will be seen, two months before the event, was true as far as it went, though it was incomplete. It shewed the position occupied by King of the Forest, the important point to Mr. Ramsay, but it took no notice of the other horse that came in even with him. At the same time the conjuncture is too complicated to be reasonably regarded as a case of accidental coincidence. The facts foreshewn were, first, the success of No. 5; second, the occupation of the second place by King of the Forest; and third, the designation of the latter horse by No. 7. If we take it as an even chance that King of the Forest was one of the three first, and again an even chance whether of those three places he was first, second, or third, his chance of being second would be 1-6th, while the chances of each of the other predictions coming true would be 1-17th. Thus the chance of all three coming true would be  $\frac{1}{17 \times 6 \times 1734}$ , or 1733 to 1 against the conjuncture foreseen.

I had the account of the original dream from Mr. Ramsay himself, while the fact of the communication to Mr. Severne and his announcement at the Tuesday's dinner was told me by Mr. Severne in the presence of his wife, who was one of the party. I took the result of the running together with the numbers of the horses from the account of the race in the Daily Telegraph of May 25th, 1871; so that the evidence of the case is as complete as it is possible to be.

By an odd coincidence a friend to whom I had written on the Tuesday after the last Derby, asking him to look at the Racing Calendar for 1871, in his reply says: "General B., who dined with me on Tuesday, told me that a lady friend of his dreamt just before the last Derby that she saw a chestnut colt win the race, ridden by Wood, the jockey, but the name of the horse she did not learn in the dream. Down went B. to Epsom on the Derby day, took 5 to 1 on Wood's mount, when he saw him on St. Blaise, and brought home £25."

TEMPORARY OFFICES OF "LIGHT," 39, GREAT RUSSELL STREET,
BLOOMSBURY, W.C.
(Entrance in Woburn Street.)

[The Editor of "Light" desires it to be distinctly understood that he can accept no responsibility as to the opinions expressed by Contributors and Correspondents. Free and courteous discussion is invited, but writers are alone responsible for the articles to which their names are attached.]

TO CONTRIBUTORS.

Reports of the proceedings of Spiritualist Societies in as succinct a form as possible, and authenticated by the signature of a responsible officer, are solicited for insertion in "Light." Members of private circles will also oblige by contributing brief records of noteworthy occurrences at their sances.

The Editor cannot undertake the return of manuscripts unless the writers expressly request it at the time of forwarding and enclose stamps for the return postage.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

The Annual Subscription for "Light," post free to any address within the United Kingdom, or to places comprised within the Postal Union, including all parts of Europe, the United States, and British North America, is 10s. 10d. per annum, forwarded to our office in advance.

ADVERTISEMENT CHARGES.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

REMOVAL OF OFFICES.

In consequence of the property in which 4, New Bridge-street was included, having changed hands, and the intention of the new proprietor to make structural alterations, we have been obliged to leave, and therefore have to announce for the information of friends and subscribers that our Temporary Offices are now at 38, Great Russell-street, W.C. (entrance in Woburn-street), to which address all communications should be sent until further notice.

THE REV. H. R. HAWES'S SERMON ON SPIRITUALISM.

Notwithstanding our having printed an extra quantity of the number of "Light" containing this address, the supply was speedily exhausted, and, as an alternative plan, several of our readers have expressed a strong desire that this report (which we may mention is the only verbatim one) should be issued in the form of a pamphlet for general distribution. We shall be pleased to accept the suggestion if a pretty general desire is expressed to this effect. If friends and intending subscribers will kindly notify their wishes to us, not later than Tuesday morning next, we shall, in the event of a sufficient demand arising, be pleased to put the work in hand. The intention is to issue it in somewhat the same form as the Church Congress Pamphlet at 1d. each, and we feel sure that the widest distribution would result in much good being done in an effective way. We leave the matter now for the decision of our readers. Communications should be made to the Editor of "Light," 38, Great Russell-street, W.C.

A facility of disposition, and delicacy of feeling, when exposed to a frequent contact with the ungenerous, is one of the most serious misfortunes that can befall humanity. A person so constituted is obliged to endure a thousand affronts; and, if by any means, he is roused to resentment, he is called irritable—for no other reason, but because he is uniformly expected to be submissive.

SPIRITUALISM AS AN AID TO THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

A short time since we referred to the indications of renewed interest in Spiritualism which were springing up on every side, and we think those who have watched the announcements made in this journal week after week since that time, will have recognised the justice of our remarks. Obviously we cannot make public all that comes to our knowledge. Could we do so, many people would be surprised at the rapid strides which are just now being made. A regular wave of interest in Spiritualism seems to be passing over society, and one hears every day of fresh developments in widely different directions. As someone well competent to express an opinion said to us the other day—"You can almost see it grow."

The most pleasing feature about this, however, and the one for which we are most thankful, is the absence of the noisy, blatant element which unfortunately characterised the old Spiritualism. That is a thing of the past. The old Spiritualism gradually died—the process of dying probably culminating in the times of spiritual conflict, unrest, and apathy through which we have recently passed. In Spiritualism, as in all else, "the old order changeth, giving place to new."

And what of the new? What are the signs of its coming? It is being ushered in by many a ripple on the waters of social and professional life. In art, literature, music, the drama, and in the Church, you see these indications everywhere abounding. Not the least notable of these ripples was the sermon preached by the Rev. Mr. Hawes, and reported in last week's "Light"; and scarcely less important as one of the floating indicative straws was the attack made by the Baptist Magazine on Spiritualism, and which we noticed in "Light" for June 9th. We had not then seen the book which served as a peg for the discourse in question, but since then have ascertained its name and received a copy. It is entitled "The Good Shepherd," and is written by a Mr. J. B. Allan.* There is very much in it of interest, and we think we cannot give the book a better notice, and at the same time more efficiently commend it to attention, than by quoting rather copiously from the last few pages.

The Scriptural Evidence for the Conscious Existence of the Soul Beyond the Grave.

Were the spirits of two persons once living upon the earth to make their appearance, and to identify themselves to the perfect satisfaction of several witnesses of the most trustworthy character, there would in such a case be no longer any doubt of the soul's conscious existence beyond the grave. In the affairs of this life any judge or jury in court would consider such evidence as conclusive. All legal uncertainty would be removed. But there is on record evidence of a similar kind as regards the conscious existence of the soul beyond the grave. The evidence that the soul of man survives the ruins of the earthly tabernacle is as follows:—

"And after six days Jesus taketh Peter, James, and John his brother, and bringeth them up into a high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them: and His face did shine as the sun, and His raiment was white as the light. And behold there appeared unto them Moses and Elias talking with Him. Then answered Peter and said unto Jesus, Lord, it is good for us to be here; if Thou wilt let us make here three tabernacles, one for Thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias. Whilst He yet spake, behold a bright cloud overshadowed them, and behold, a voice out of the cloud which said, This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased: hear ye Him. And when the disciples heard it, they fell on their faces and were sore afraid. And Jesus came and touched them, and said, Arise and be not afraid. And when they had lifted up their eyes, they saw no man, save Jesus only. And as they came down from the mountain, Jesus charged them saying, Tell the vision to no man until the Son of Man be risen from the dead. And His disciples asked Him, Why, then, say the scribes that Elias must first come? And Jesus answered and said unto them, Elias truly shall first come and restore all things. But I say unto you that Elias is come already, and they knew him not but have done unto him whatsoever they listed. Likewise shall also the Son of Man suffer of them. Then the disciples understood that He spake unto them of John the Baptist."

In this passage there is recorded the conscious existence of Moses and Elias after they had left this earthly scene. The proof of this fact rests on the testimony of three witnesses of unquestionable integrity.

The Gospel Proof Fails to Convince the Sceptical Mind.

But the proof which the Gospel historians have recorded as to the reappearance of the dead, fails to convince the sceptical mind. Persons of this class have no faith in the leading doctrines of the Bible, and, therefore, set aside its authority. They want evidence of a stronger and more direct kind. Though they believe in profane, they are not disposed to believe in Gospel history. As to the reappearance of the dead, the unbeliever wants facts, demonstrable facts, as a proof of such reappearance. Can such evidence be given? Is it within the range of human experiment and testimony? Is there to be found in our times faithful and trustworthy witnesses of the return of the departed? To meet the demands of the sceptic, of him who believes in no hereafter, of no existence beyond this life, the Christian reader will not, we trust, be offended should we take the liberty of culling a leaf from the pages of modern Spiritualism, for any evidence which can confirm so grand a truth as the immortality of the soul must meet the acceptance of every one who wishes well to his fellow men. If this blessed doctrine be rejected, religion will be bereft of its power to support and comfort the soul in the trials of life. Remove from the mind of the Christian pilgrim the hope of enjoying the heavenly home, and what is left? Nothing but a solitary ruin of God's love, comprising a few pleasures mingled with many cares and troubles and closing with sickness and death. It is, therefore, a matter of the greatest importance to have this article of our faith well grounded, as its denial forms the foundation of almost, if not all of our infidelity.

Present-Day Evidence of Continued Existence.

The literature of Spiritualism, comprising hundreds of volumes, silently testifies that the dead reappear. For more than a quarter of a century streams of periodicals have flowed from the Press, confirmatory of the great truth of man's immortality. These, like a great cloud of witnesses, have gone forth into all the world, and told the blessed news in almost every clime, causing the sceptic to lay aside his dark faith, and to walk in the light of a hopeful immortality.

But Jesus and His Apostles did not only teach, but also exemplified the doctrine of immortality. The remarkable fact recorded by Matthew took place on "a high mountain apart," and was seen by Peter, James and John. Moses and Elias, the honoured and devoted servants of God during their eventful lives on earth, reappeared, and were acknowledged by the three Apostles. This return of these two distinguished personages had, no doubt, an important object to fulfil. Such an appearance of the departed dead was an ocular demonstration to the apostolic mind of the blessed truth that man has a conscious existence beyond the grave. Jesus knew that evidence of this kind was necessary to overcome the various forms of scepticism of the age in which He lived, and doubtless foresaw the opposition which, in the course of time, would arise to so grand a doctrine. This séance on the mountain was, most probably, preceded by prayer, and, as many suppose, took place during the night.

The Present Age Requires this Demonstration.

If such a demonstration of immortality was required to overcome the infidelity of that age, and to remove every shadow of doubt which might linger in the minds of the three Apostles, does not the age in which we live also require such a demonstration of this great foundation of all religion? Does the preaching of the pulpit overcome the scepticism of the age? Does not infidelity increase? To thousands and tens of thousands is not the Bible a dead letter? . . . If, then, in the most civilised parts of the world religion and morality are languishing, and infidelity and sin are increasing, do we not require such demonstration of immortality as that demonstration which took place on the mountain in the presence of Peter, James, and John. If there be anything more powerful than another to overcome the wave of scepticism and vice, it is the evidence of the senses as to the return of the dead. In most, if not in all cases, infidelity has its chief foundations in the disbelief of the soul's conscious existence beyond the grave.

The Religious Influence of Spiritualism.

When the sceptic has this basis of his unbelief removed by the testimony of his senses, and knows as a certainty that the dead do return, he is not far from the Kingdom of God and its righteousness. By such testimony many have laid aside their scepticism, believed in the Gospel, and become followers of the lowly Nazarine. Multitudes of professing Christians who have been disturbed, even tortured with doubts and fears with respect to the soul's conscious existence after death, have had them totally removed by the reappearance of departed friends. The mother who has wept and mourned for the loss of a dear girl or boy has had her sorrows soothed, her heart comforted and cheered by once more beholding the object of her undying love. On the border line which separates the two worlds, the widow has met her husband, and been consoled; the orphans have beheld their dear father, and have enjoyed his affectionate embraces, and both widow and orphans have thanked God for so great a blessing. Many, too, over whose minds the prospect of death shed a melancholy gloom have had the darkness dispersed by sensible and certain proofs of immortality. They know and are assured that the principle within them, which thinks, judges, and reasons, which loves, wills, and rejoices—yea, that principle within them which feared death—does not die, but begins a new life that knows no end. Following "the way, the truth, and the life," embodying the excellencies of the Prince of Peace in their daily walk and conversation, they "know that if their earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, they have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." Such facts, such knowledge, such certain prospects of a blessed immortality sweeten the path of earthly life, inspire the mind with joy, and shed a bright and heavenly light over "the valley of the shadow of death," and enable the dying pilgrim to say, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

If such, then, have been the blessed effects of Spiritualism on the character of sceptics and many professing Christians, would it be unscriptural or unadvisable for Christian communities to adopt this agency, in order to stem the torrent of infidelity and vice, which threaten to overwhelm in their gloomy depths the sacred ark of heavenly truth? From what has already been said, it might be considered advisable on the part of the Church to employ this spiritual agency in order to oppose the onward march of an enemy so destructive to Christian truth. Whatever has its basis in truth, whatever is found to advance the substantial comfort, the moral interests, or the permanent well-being of man, ought, when properly considered and understood, to be received with feelings of gratitude by every follower of the humble Nazarene.

An Argument for Progress in Religious Truth.

All men, indeed, act upon this principle. The Christian, how strict and stringent soever he may be in adhering to the dogmas of his sect, feels no difficulty in adopting any honest improvement which is made in the course of his business. If any of his workmen is deficient in morals or skill, he finds no difficulty in replacing him by others better fitted to accomplish his designs; should any new or useful invention commend itself to his intelligence and appear suitable to his department of trade, and to widen the sphere of his interests and speculations, he has no hesitation, if the means are at hand, of taking it into his service. The mechanic, the artist, the merchant, the statesman and the philosopher will, if circumstances allow, endeavour to carry out this principle. But should Christian communities pursue a different course of action? Do they neglect the means which would strengthen and extend their religious views? Are there ignorance, drunkenness, and infidelity in the village or town? To overcome these enemies of truth, tracts are circulated, Sabbath schools are formed, lectures are given and missionaries are employed. From what has already been said in favour of Spiritualism and its blessed effects, would it not then be advisable for all Christian communities to employ this mysterious agency in order to stop the onward march of enemies which neither the pulpit, nor Bible, nor the religious issues of the Press are able to subdue? Do not reason and morality and religion unite their voices, and say that it is advisable to employ this supermundane power—a power which demonstrates immortality, destroys one of the great strongholds of infidelity, which comforts the mourner, dissipates the fear of death, and has for its object the love of God and the best interests of the human family? Would not such an auxiliary be in perfect harmony with the general principle acted upon by all Evangelical bodies? Would such an alliance despoil the tree of life of any of its life-giving fruits? If rightly used and not abused, as many of the blessed truths of Jesus have been, it will neither adulterate nor destroy any of the teachings of the loving and lowly Nazarene. The adoption of Spiritualism by Christians does not therefore appear inadvisable.

The Adoption of Spiritualism not Unscriptural.

But would the adoption of Spiritualism by professing Christians be scriptural? Is there any direct and positive passage in the New Testament which can prove the affirmative of this question? Could such a passage be found, it would settle, or ought to settle, the question between the Spiritualist and the Divine; but should such a direct and positive scripture not be found, would Spiritualism, prayerfully used and not abused, as many of God's blessings have been, be at variance with the teachings of Christ and His Apostles? No, the absence of such a scripture would be no proof that it was in opposition to the blessed truths for which the Redeemer lived and died. Is there any direct and positive passage from the New Testament, as proof for the formation of Sabbath schools, for the institution of Bible societies, for the holding of bazaars, and for many other schemes? Yet these are considered to be in harmony with Evangelical truth, though no direct passage from the New Testament can be adduced in favour of their adoption. It does not therefore follow, though there were no verses either from the Gospels, or the Epistles, directly in support of Spiritualism, that it would be at variance with Evangelical truth. An instrumentality which demonstrates immortality, dissipates the fear of death, comforts the mourner, destroys the great stronghold of infidelity and vice, and teaches man to follow the footsteps of the meek and lowly Jesus, has claims upon the Christian professor surely as great as Sabbath schools, Bible societies and showy bazaars. If the one class of objects is in accordance with the spirit of the Gospel, is the other class of objects less in accordance with the spirit of the Gospel?

Scriptural Authority for the Practice of Spiritualism.

But is there any passage in God's Word which would give authority, or serve as an example, for the practice of Spiritualism? If the affirmative of this question can be shown, professors of every religious denomination ought to lay aside their opposition and identify themselves with such a practice. In the brief narrative of the Transfiguration as recorded by Matthew, Mark, and Luke, there appear the leading features characteristic of modern seances. At the close of day, when the shadows of Egypt fell over Galilee, Jesus with His three beloved disciples—Peter, James, and John—climbed the mountain side to hold communion with God. Such was the usual custom of our Lord when he had finished the labours of the day. After the great Medium had poured out His deep and strong desires to His Almighty Father, a strange and extraordinary spectacle appeared. The face of Jesus glowed like the sun, His apparel became white as the snow, a bright cloud overshadowed Him, and stranger than all, the dead reappeared. Moses, who had led the hosts of Israel to the border of the promised land, and John the Baptist, who suffered martyrdom for reproving the royal adulterer, stood in the midst of this little band of Spiritualists. They beheld, with astonishment, both the great Lawgiver of the Jews, and the hardy forerunner of the Messianic reign. During the course of this seance, the three disciples also heard a mysterious conversation between the two materialised spirits and their beloved Master Jesus. Finally, a voice came from the luminous cloud which overshadowed them, saying, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye Him."

Bible Facts Paralleled by Modern Experience.

In this brief account of the Evangelists the chief elements of the modern seance appear. There is the Medium Jesus; there are the sitters; there is the going apart, there is the quietude of the mountain, there are the materialised spirits of the dead; there are heard the voices of these holy ones; and here is also the wonderful change which took place in the appearance of the great Medium. To these the leading features of the modern seance bear a striking resemblance. There is the medium, there are the sitters, there is the quietude of the house or hall; there are the materialised spirits of the dead; there are heard the voices of the departed; and there is sometimes also a wonderful change in the appearance of the medium. Darkness is another feature in which the two seances are like each other, as the one on the mountain top is generally considered to have been a night seance. And in addition, as the one was preceded by prayer, so the other is often preceded by prayer. The correspondence existing between them is certainly very remarkable. Had there been anything in these manifestations on the mountain, in opposition to the purity of Divine truth, or at variance with the spirit of holiness, Jesus and His three disciples would never have set such an example before the world. He who was the purest, the wisest, and the most excellent of men, who could look into the distant future and read the pages of the world's history, and finally gave up His spotless life to benefit and bless His fellow-men, was not likely to give an example of anything which would prove injurious to those whom He came to save. It is quite the contrary. Every act of the great Master has been a blessing to man. He has, indeed, ever been esteemed by His followers as the perfect pattern of a holy life and of a self-sacrificing death. Can it, then, be either unrighteous or unscriptural to follow the example of one so distinguished for wisdom, goodness, and piety? Can the Christian err in doing that which Jesus, and Peter, and James, and John, did at the top of the mountain? If converse with the materialised spirits of the dead was in accordance with the spirit of Jesus, it cannot be wrong in any of His followers to follow His blessed example: yea, to follow His example is not only right but is the duty, the happiness, and the joy of every believer in the Saviour. To hold communion with the spirits of the departed is scriptural, having the authority both of Jesus and His three elect Apostles.

Spiritualism the Ally of the Christian Church.

If then, infidelity and consequent vice are making progress so rapidly and extensively in these kingdoms would it not be both advisable and scriptural to employ an agency which is calculated to destroy the great stronghold of so dangerous an enemy, which neither the pulpit, the Church nor the Press can successfully oppose? If ever there was a time in which some powerful instrumentality should be called into exercise in order to combat the evils which menace the Christian faith, it certainly is the time in which we now live. Hear what Sir John Holker, M.P., the late Attorney-General, speaking at Preston, says: "There is one characteristic of this seething, throbbing age of excitement which is very alarming." (He alluded to the advance of scepticism upon religious subjects, and to the rapid advance of positive infidelity.) "It is an appalling feature, and if infidelity advanced with anything like the rapid strides which it had made up to the present time it must result in the destruction of the Church, which was so dear to them, and the undoing and breaking up of all bonds by which society was held together." In such a state of things would it be unwise on the part of Christian professors to adopt some measure by which they might be able to uphold their sinking cause? If the respectable and pious merchant be convinced that his speculations in trade are likely to terminate in bankruptcy, he will gladly avail himself of any just and legal measure by which he can prevent so undesirable an event. Should the follower of Jesus be less prudent in the management of the heavenly treasure with which he has been entrusted? Should he allow himself to become bankrupt when the means of continuing solvent are at hand? When Spiritualism, rightly interpreted and prayerfully used, teaches man to love God supremely, to love his neighbour as himself, to advance the temporal and eternal well-being of his fellow creatures and follow the footsteps of the loving Saviour, can the Christian have any objection to identify himself with such a blessed ally? Already throughout the different parts of the world, Spiritualists are being counted by the thousand, yea, by the million, and amongst its advocates and sympathisers are found not only working men, but the doctor, the lawyer, the minister, the philosopher, the statesman, and many of the aristocracy. So rapid and extraordinary has been the progress of this wonderful agency as to awaken the prejudices and stir up the hostility of the pulpit and the religious Press, perhaps ignorantly concluding that their craft was in danger. The pure and beautiful truths taught by the blessed Saviour, and founded as they are on eternal truth, will continue to shed their heavenly light through all future ages of the world. True it may be, that, in the course of time, the traditions, the dogmas, and inventions of the priesthood may be swept away; but the pure and genuine truths taught by Jesus shall remain.

IS DEATH THE END?—Mr. W. M. J. Savage in his "Belief about Man" has a chapter under this heading, in which he contends within the material body of man there is another body which is ethereal, the inner form occupying the interstices of the outer one; for the molecules of visible and tangible matter never (in the opinion of some scientists) really touch each other, but have spaces between occupied by something akin to the ether that fills up the spaces between the stars. Death, according to this theory, may be only the falling away of the outer body; the inner and more ethereal form retains its life and rises liberated and free.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

Catholicism and Spiritualism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—There are some things in which Roman Catholics are united, and without which unity the Church could not exist; but Spiritualism is not one of these things. Every Catholic is de facto a Spiritualist, but each must judge for himself or herself whether the Spiritualism of others—be they Catholic, or Protestant—is genuine, and also whether it be from good or bad spirits. Few will deny that mischievous manifestations may be as genuine as those that are beneficent. Much is said of the attitude of the Church toward Spiritualism. Catholics and others will tell you that the Church, as represented by the Pope and the Prelacy, has condemned Spiritualism. This is not, and cannot be true, because each individual instance of spirit manifestation must stand or fall on its own merits; and no Pope and no Prelacy can examine all cases. A Pope may express his opinion of a series of manifestations. Any prelate may do the same, and he may try to save his flock from what he considers evil; but this is not speaking from the chair of St. Peter with authority. As I came into the Church, and brought some twenty others with me, from spiritual manifestations, I have a right to speak on this matter. I, as a medium, spoke, as it is termed, inspirationally on the seven Sacraments of the Church, when I did not know their number. I saw clearly an early Jesuit who was martyred, and who gave his name. He was afterwards identified in Catholic history, and I heard the sermons he preached, and repeated them to my circle. Catholic priests who knew the faith declared that these sermons contained it. I wrote out a comprehensive account of these teachings, and a learned Jesuit said of it "every item is of Catholic faith," though he was careful to add "I do not know where you got it."

From our coming into the Church there was difference of opinion about us. One said, "The devil has brought them into the Church." To this a bishop replied, "The Lord sent them, if the devil brought them." I have reason to know that on the subject of Spiritualism Catholics are just like other people. They differ. One says, "The manifestations are diabolical." Another says, "That cannot be, for great numbers have been brought into the Church by them." An irritable and irritated Catholic once threw his rosary on a table, around which some persons were seated having a seance. The manifestations ceased instantly. "There," he said, "that proves it is all diabolical." Now I was member of a circle into which one of our members came, in an angry mood. The manifestations ceased after this was communicated: "Cannot sit with us. He has offended by being angry." The one proved diabolism as much as the other. When we had been some four years in the Church, a distinguished Catholic Doctor of Divinity examined through a rapping medium, and also through my mediumship, some of the phenomena. He was greatly interested, but our civil war broke out at the time, and I was induced by another priest of great learning and goodness to give my word that I would not practise Spiritualism—that is, that I would not sit in seances, and would try to hinder myself from being clairvoyant. Under this promise I saw the doctor who had been investigating with me—he rebuked me sharply for putting myself in bonds. He said, "You have submitted to be directed by a man whom you ought to direct." At this juncture we left America and came to London. I soon found myself in very burdensome bondage in trying to keep my promise. I went to my confessor, who was a young man. He said, "I dare not absolve you from your promise. I advise you to go to Cardinal Wiseman." I did so. After telling him my case he set me free, saying, "I could deny my faith as soon as I could deny what comes to Spiritualists." And he told me of a lady who he said was quieted as I was, and he added, "It always comes out all right." More than this, he said he could bring me to know people who would value me none the less because of my being a Spiritualist, and he promised to give me a director who should help, and not hinder. He died soon after this. I obtained what I desired, but whether by his aid or not I do not know. If Cardinal Wiseman had been in the least doubt about my Spiritualism he would not have set me free to practise it. A priest, to whom I went to confession afterwards, and to whom I mentioned the subject, refused to give me absolution; unless I would promise to give up the whole thing, and place myself where I was before I saw the Cardinal, he would not give me absolution. I said, "Father, you are not my director." He answered very properly, "Go to your director for absolution." As he was not in town I went to the parish priest. I was in error in mentioning the subject to a confessor at all. Confession is simple and according to rule, and does not admit of disputation. If a Spiritualist wishes to convert his or her confessor, he had better make the effort out of the confessional. There, within recognised limits, he is master and arbiter. Conversation is not confession. The zeal of converts to anything gets them into trouble. I remember when I wanted to convert my confessor to Spiritualism. Now I don't care whether he is converted, further than to be a Catholic Spiritualist. I have learned to wait for all things—that green apples may become ripe; that materialists may become spiritually-minded. It is all in growth, and growth has its bitter and incapable periods—witness the bitter fruit, and the helpless babe.—Yours,

MARY S. G. NICHOLS.

Preparation of Inquirers for Spiritual Intercourse.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Under the heading I have given to this letter, I have the impression that earnest workers in this cause might, as the result of their experience, contribute to your columns many valuable practical suggestions. I eagerly offer my mite to this object, respectfully deferring to your pleasure as to the publication of the same.

The "graduation of phenomena," it seems to me, is a matter entirely for the education of Spiritualists, i.e., those who believe in, and seek to cultivate communion with the spirit-world. So far as the purely uninitiated are concerned, the discussion of that question, it seems to me, can serve no practical purpose whatever.

Your readers will probably be surprised at my rushing upon your columns in this way; it is, however, but natural that those who are prominently and persistently labouring to promote a knowledge of Spiritualism, should desire to make known fully and comprehensively their views and opinions, as taught by much observation and experience. Besides, are we not all "lights," from a farthing rushlight to a flaming torch, and should we not contribute all the light we can to the columns of a paper which seeks to be a focus for the concentration of as much "light" as possible upon all spiritual matters?

Concerning the subject under consideration then, sir, I have done my best to make it clear that no "graduation of phenomena" can prepare or qualify inquiries for spiritual intercourse. The preparation required is of a purely subjective nature; in the absence of this no objective phenomena will produce the required result. Hence I repeat that phenomena presented to unspiritual persons will be entirely thrown away. I would earnestly advise Spiritualists to cease wasting their time and resources on that unprofitable object. I contend that no objective phenomena, independently, can produce a substantial spiritual result. The practical purpose and value of phenomena are solely to quicken, strengthen, and give definite form and fashion to existing subjective states. The effect of objective phenomena is to bring to light the subjective states of those who view them. The inference from this is, that the preparation required relates exclusively to the subjective condition of the individual.

The real object, then, being defined, in what way shall it be accomplished? In the first place, I hold that the utmost publicity should be given to all the facts of Spiritualism—the full truth should be published to the world. This is a very different thing from the "proselytising" referred to by "M. A. (Oxon.)," a few weeks ago. I have never attempted to make a "proselyte," yet I distinctly aim to publish the full truth of Spiritualism to all the world, and to afford every individual every facility for knowing all that is to be known about this subject. I cannot imagine Spiritualists placing any restriction upon individual testimony to, or a public proclamation of, all the facts and teachings of Spiritualism. I have heard it said that Spiritualism is not for everybody, but I hold that it is for everybody, although "everybody" is far from being prepared or willing to receive it. But I hold that all that Spiritualism offers is everybody's property, everybody has an interest therein; and it must be made known, not a little of it, but the whole of it, to every human being.

For my own part, I embrace every opportunity to give it the widest publicity. The other day an overwhelming impression came upon me to write a letter on "Spiritualism" to the Daily Telegraph. I did so; it was not published (of course), but the chance of reaching a quarter of a million readers was worth the experiment. Let every worker establish a sort of "Secular Press Bureau" on his own account. What we have to recognise is, that everywhere there are minds ripe and ready to receive the truth, this fact being a constant stimulus to myself—on account thereof, I feel impatient to introduce Spiritualism into every town and village.

In the second place, the utmost care must be observed in the selection of those who are to compose the "circle" where intercourse with the spirit-world is sought. Here there cannot be too severe a restriction. The sitters must be, as I have before said, of a proper disposition, of a right spirit. They must be teachable in mind, gentle in temper, moral in character, and spiritually aspiring. If it be asked, what about those who are not of this character, I answer they must become such before they can be admitted to spiritual intercourse. Those who hug their beliefs and opinions as the "heathen" do their idols, must cultivate a free and open mind; those who are "inveterate" sceptics must learn to love truth for its own sake; those who indulge in immoral practices and bad habits must cultivate purity and self-sacrifice; and those who are involved in materiality must realise to some extent their spiritual needs. The fact is, the preparation of the people for spiritual intercourse consists mainly in what they must become before they are qualified for it. As to genuine "inquirers," they should receive all they are inquiring after, for inquiry is the desideratum. I think, sir, I have said sufficient for the present on this topic.

Before closing my letter I should like to say how much interested I am in Mr. Haweis's discourse. But what will be the fate of that gentleman? When Canon Wilberforce delivered his address at the Church Congress, I wondered whether he would be "suspended" or not! It is very attractive to me to be able to preach Spiritualism and still occupy the pulpit, but I am afraid I shall not soon regain that enviable position. If these good clergymen can still retain their pulpits and their emoluments whilst preaching Spiritualism, I hope they won't forget to throw a crust to a poor brother who is not only cast out from the ministerial fold, but therewith completely stripped of all its social and pecuniary advantages, and all this purely for believing in Spiritualism!

However, in being compelled to go forth "with-out purse or scrip," I suppose I am more truly a successor of those who said, "Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have I give thee."—I remain, sir, yours very truly,

CHARLES WARE.

PROGRESS ON THE CONTINENT.

The following are translated from the Revue Spirite of June:—

SPANISH CLERICALISM.—The Union Democratica of Albacete says that the officiating priest of Penas de San Pedro has refused to baptise an infant because its proposed godmother, in whose arms it was brought, was a declared Spiritualist. The civil authorities of Albacete do not approve of this, and have taken some action in the case.

PROGRESS IN RUSSIA.—Prince Adeka writes of Mrs. Kate Fox Jencken's visit to St. Petersburg. Professor Wagner has reported some of her sances in the Press. Boutlerof has arranged to give lectures upon the subject. M. Aksakof has conducted sances at the office of the Rebus for scientists and physicians under conditions which protected the medium from the disturbing and negating influences of those who wanted to witness novel phenomena rather than study their causes, and who perhaps did not want to have their existing notions disturbed. Experimental sances, conducted by such scientists as Boutlerof, Wagner, and Aksakof, with such a medium as Mrs. K. Fox Jencken, must be of the highest value, and we look forward for their report with interest. Altogether we think the year 1883 will be a memorable one to the Spiritualists of Russia.

SPIRITUAL FEDERATIONS.—A federation has been formed between the societies of Spiritualists of France and of Belgium. Now those of Spain and Italy propose to join. This has stimulated the Spiritualists of Lyons and its vicinity to confederate. A meeting with this object was held at the Elysée, Lyons, last month, to which M. Leymarie was invited from Paris to assist. Above 1,200 subscribing adherents were present. M. Leymarie, in his address, at the conclusion of the business, dwelt upon the opposition they must expect to meet with, on the one hand from the Materialists, because Spiritualism demonstrates that life does not end here on earth, and on the other, from the clericals of every denomination, because, say they, the devil is at the bottom of it; the truth being that it teaches men their relation to God without clerical intervention.

Incidentally, he called attention to a recent book by M. Simon, on China. M. Simon had lived and travelled in that vast country for twenty years. He informs us that the Chinese have, for ages, had systems of communicating with the spiritual world; they hold their ancestors in reverence, and seek their approbation and counsel. Through the prevalence of this spiritual belief the Chinese have settled long ago most of the problems which embarrass our law makers and social economists. Believing that there is an after existence in which a happy advancement succeeds to a right life on earth, the charities and mutual good are cultivated, and there is little need for the employment of policemen and clericals.

M. Leymarie expressed his anticipation of a great European federation of Spiritualists; for the knowledge of Spiritualism was extending in every nation. "Spiritual belief and doctrine," he concluded, "advancing hand in hand with the spirit of progress, must modify the religion of the future, make it truly a religion of peace—peace universally, because there will be a universal interest in making it a reality."

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

CAVENDISH ROOMS, 51 AND 53, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

The controls of Mr. Morse undertook, on Sunday last, to answer the question—"For which: Heaven or Earth?" and to determine, from their standpoint of knowledge of both conditions, whether, as a regulating principle of life here, the concerns of the world as we know it, or of a more or less fabled heaven, should receive preferential regard and really influential consideration.

The unquestionable fact that the prevailing so-called religious tendency would be to urge the immediate transfer of our affections to "things above," not only did not deter these always frank and courageous teachers from affirming the contrary proposition, but gave special occasion for an instructive explanation of their reasons for that contention. Such, however, is the force of prejudice in favour of the regulation methods of working out our own salvation by a concentrated gaze upon the future, that we must hasten, if our mouths are not to be closed before we can utter another word upon the subject, to say that, in electing to recommend a sustained and diligent, if not exclusive, attention to the duties and obligations of earth-life, the controls have in view the unassailable truth of the continuity of individuality, and the sequence of its conditions. The argument and the recommendation are then alike acceptable and convincing. As a concession, one may, indeed, be permitted to say, "Live for Heaven," certainly; but that must mean living up to Heaven, and must regard this stage of life, with all its incumbent and relative duties, as already the vestibule of Heaven. This is, surely, most wholesome theory, and justly described as the very essence of the practical teaching of Spiritualism, which in no way involves any anticipatory discredit or contempt for the higher life, but rather its diligent cultivation here—in the form of the discharge of present duties—as a necessary precedent condition for its prompt realisation there; so true is it that—

"Where our duty's task is wrought
In unison with God's great thought;
The near and future blend in one."

The two worlds, or states, should be understood as united, for there is no Heaven in the future that does not arise out of Heaven here and to-day.

Upon this foundation, which seems, when rightly understood, to conciliate all views, there is fair prospect for the introduction of a common sentiment and combined action. And it must be remembered that whatever there is of value in the world is the result of the associated work of human mind and human muscle—not of religious dogma, nor of blissful expectations. Strip the pursuits of art, of science, of philosophical speculation, and of every form of toil and bubble, of the veneer of pretence, and the pursuit of happiness may be advanced as an alternative phrase. But happiness is impossible outside of the recognition of the current conditions of life, of our obligations towards earth and its beauties, and earth and its duties; while the hopes and fears which are commonly directed exclusively to another and frequently fanciful form of being, are potent enemies alike of this and of that. We are thus brought to a comprehensive appreciation of the real needs of the present, as centred in earth; and of the abiding issues of life as developed in Heaven, and can agree with W. J. Fox that—

"Not for self-inflicted pain,
Borne to purchase heavenly gain,
Did God make man;
But for wisdom, happiness,
Blessed life, and life to bless,
Love, the soul of Deity,
And progress through eternity,
Did God make man."

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

The Harbinger of Light returns to the subject of psychopathic healing, and the mysterious influence of faith. It sets itself to show that faith is not an essential pre-requisite. If my critic will refer to "LIGHT," Nos. 106-107, he will find that I never said that it can be so regarded save in a very small proportion of cases. I specially described it as "a factor to which it is hard to assign an exact value," though in a few cases, such as those recorded in the Gospels, and that of Mrs. Skelton, which I specially adverted to, the power of faith "in the action of a governing and controlling spirit from without" seemed to be "a necessary pre-requisite." These cases, I repeat, are but a small proportion of the mass, and my observation applied to them alone. The question is easily arguable. A medium comes to an absolute disbeliever in the existence of spirit, and says, "You are suffering from cancer. I, as a medium for spirit-power, can cure you." "I do not believe in you or your spirits," is the rejoinder. "There are no such beings, and you are an impostor." Does the Harbinger contend that "a positive vital fluid transmitted by the operator" would have any effect on that unresponsive body? Mesmeric healing might conceivably have some slight influence, but healing by spirit-power transmitted through the person of the medium would have small chance, compared with that which it would have in the case of a recipient whose faith was active and energetic.

The cases adduced in support of the editorial contention that faith is not essential to healing are all cases of mesmerism. Undoubtedly faith is no necessary pre-requisite there; but there is no necessary interference of external spiritual agency. I quote one of the cases referred to:—

A. C. was a neighbour who had suffered for several weeks from sciatica, never free from pain save when asleep, and only sleeping when exhausted nature compelled it. We magnetised his leg and relieved the pain at the first operation, but it returned about two hours after. On the second day the relief lasted four hours; the third six or seven; and so on progressively until we had nearly bridged the twenty-four hours. Ten a.m. was the hour for him to attend, and on the morning we refer to he did not put in an appearance punctually, and having an appointment in town at eleven, we magnetised a glass of water by making steadily passes over it with the hand, and bringing it to an assistant told him to inform Mr. C. that we could not wait, but had left the contents of the glass for him to drink. As we were leaving the premises we encountered Mr. C., and delivering the message to him returned and handed him the tumbler without saying one word to indicate what was the nature of its contents. He drank it as desired, and then asked what it was; we replied, water. He then asked, "What did you put in it?" Though scarcely correct, save in a material sense, we answered, "Nothing;" and then asked why. He replied that it tasted different from ordinary water, "as though it had a tasteless oil in it." Whilst speaking he suddenly placed his hand on his hip, and on being asked what was the matter, he replied that he felt "like warm water running down the part," and a subsidence of the pain. Then, and not till then, was he informed the water was magnetised.

"Letters from a Mystic in the Present Day," is a little book full of suggestions for thought, rather than of elaborate argumentation. The letters, or extracts rather, are some addressed to friends by the anonymous author, who occupies, I presume, some position that qualifies him to speak as a teacher, and were written without thought of publication. They are all the fresher for the absence of constraint, and deal very suggestively with various problems and perplexities of the inner life. The point of view is "the immediate rather than the mediate relations of the life-giving Spirit with man," and the end in many of them is to "awaken the consciousness of our actual union with God and with one another." This—the hope of union with God—is one of the central truths of universal religion, preserved and insisted on alike in the most Evangelical section of the Church of England, in the changeless Churches of Rome and the East, and (as Mr. Sinnett shows in his most recent book) by the Buddhist in his aspirations after Nirvana.

Respecting the subject already alluded to—the answer to the prayer of faith—our "Present-day Mystic" writes:—"With regard to miraculous (so-called) answers to prayer, in the shape of healing, &c., do you not think they present themselves rather as expressions of intimate fellowship with the mind of God than as evidence to convince the gainsayers or inquirers? I do not see that such miracles can do any more in this respect than scientific discoveries have done—viz., assure us of a beneficent mind behind physical nature. . . . I am inclined to think that the spiritual aspect of things can never be so put into words that an objector can be intellectually convinced of the truth of a spiritual perception, for spiritual perceptions are matters of interpretation appealing to the sympathetic instinct, not to scientific proof. Consequently I should rather sympathise with a scientific man shrinking from so-called miracles; they cut right across his lines of pursuit, and tumble all his perceptions into confusion. They belong to the path of the Spiritualist rather than to that of the Scientist, and the latter had better leave them alone until he is prepared to enter that plane of inquiry or perception on which they have an orderly setting, where they will be recognised as belonging to the methods and order of another series of laws."

The latter part of this wise reflection is one to which all who concern themselves in any way with the things of spirit are finally driven. "Spiritual things are spiritually discerned" obviously; but, in a far wider sense, a dwarfing course of minute investigation into some one of the properties of matter, or some cramped question of physics, has a tendency to pin the mind down, to prison it within a groove, and to render it incapable of appreciating such a view as that of our mystic's, or such conceptions, vast and far reaching, as those embodied in "Esoteric Buddhism." Such minds would not intelligently question and seek into the truth of these mental concepts, they would simply be unable to understand them, or to grasp their real value. There are exceptions (let us be thankful!), but this is the rule, and to refuse to recognise it is to run one's argumentative head against a brick wall.

As to the proof given by certain answers to prayer of any "intimate relation between the mind of man and the mind of God," or even of "a beneficent mind behind nature," I am not so sure. If all prayers were answered, I fear the "beneficent mind" would cause a sad confusion. If only those are answered where, hypothetically, the mind of the suppliant is "in coincidence with" the mind of the Supreme Ruler, the result would presumably have been the same without the prayer; or, at any rate, the evidence on which the answer is assumed is scientifically weak. It is interesting to contrast with this exception the ideas of the esoteric Buddhist, as set forth by Mr. Sinnett. I speak with all reserve (for I have not mastered in its entirety the magnificent conception of which he is the lucid exponent), but I can find no room in that scheme for any Personal God at all. I see nothing but the reign of inflexible law, the endless evolution of progressive existence. I can hear nothing but the rhythmical grinding of the mill which, so far as I can see, has set itself a-going, and which, for aught that I can tell, will grind—tho' it be not a "mill of God"—"exceeding small" and quite pitilessly to the bitter end. Majestic; but quite loveless! Cosmical in its proportions is the conception, but one shrinks and looks about timidly for the "God to whom all flesh comes"—the God "that heareth prayer."

Truth devotes fifteen columns to a review of the Labouchere-Bishop incident. In the midst of a mass of familiar and irrelevant matter, there are some allegations as to Mr. Bishop's antecedents, and especially as to his "pin-trick" at Liverpool, which he will find it well to deal with, and which may indefinitely prolong a tiresome wrangle. With these I have nothing to do. But as to the thought-reading experiment at St. James's Hall, nothing that I have subsequently read about it causes me to alter my expressed opinion. At the same time it is right to bear in mind that Bishop is stated to have read four figures out of five on a bank note in the possession of Sir John Lubbock in the presence of Canon Basil Wilberforce, at the Deanery, Southampton. That is to me much more credible than the subsequent story. The necessary conditions were (presumably) not so conspicuously wanting as they were at St. James's Hall. It remains to be desired that the matter should be tested by a series of careful experiments. One is not enough; and the disorderly elements must be got rid of before any value can be attached to what is done.

Such an opportunity seems to be supplied by a proposal made by Mr. Bishop in the Times of the 25th. He proposes to write to each of the fifty unimpeachable witnesses named by Mr. Labouchere, requesting him to conceal a bank-note, the number of which he has committed to memory. He "will then call on each one in turn and endeavour to ascertain before responsible witnesses the number of the bank-note, which shall be known only to the subject of the experiment." This seems to me good and sufficient. The pity is that such an experiment was not tried before. Mr. Bishop may possess the power he claims—there is some good evidence that he does—but he has so mixed up the arts of the conjurer and the showman's patter with what he does, that he has only himself to thank if scepticism prevails respecting him.

SCENES FROM BEYOND THE VEIL.

[During the last two or three weeks an announcement has appeared in our columns with reference to the proposed publication in this country of a new work from the pen of Mrs. Hardinge Britten, whose talents and reputation in the literary world are already too well known to the readers of "LIGHT" to require any special reference on our part. We, however, gladly avail ourselves of the opportunity which Mrs. Britten has very kindly afforded us of making one or two extracts from the MSS. copy of the book, which is to be entitled, "Spirits and their Work in Every Country of the Earth; or, Nineteenth Century Miracles." We have dipped into the various chapters with an ever-growing sense of their deep and absorbing interest, and a conviction that the volume will be a most important addition to the literature of modern Spiritualism. The following extract is a fair sample of the contents of the book, which contains a very large number of similar original narratives, and we have no hesitation whatever in commending the book most heartily to the attention of our readers.—Ed. "LIGHT."]

Some ten years ago there resided in New York, U.S.A., an aged lady of German birth, the widow of an eminent American merchant, by name, Madame Walter. This lady having become deeply interested in Spiritualism, communicated to Mrs. Hardinge Britten the particulars of her own early experience, at a period of her life when she had been a patient of the renowned German physician, philosopher, and writer, Dr. Justus Kerner. The circumstances of her case were so remarkable that Dr. Kerner had noted them down with a view of incorporating them with other narratives of a kindred character, in a forthcoming volume. At Madame Walter's earnest request, her experiences, which seemed to her at that time too sacred to be entrusted to a cold materialistic world, were simply recorded in MSS., but not published. At the time when the strange tale was communicated to Mrs. Britten, the narrator deemed it her solemn duty to offer her record, as a contribution to an age better prepared than formerly to receive it. It need only be added that in addition to the high and unimpeachable character of the venerable lady from whom Mrs. Britten received the history orally, she is also in possession of Dr. Kerner's MSS., from which she has already drawn some details for her published sketches, and which she now deems worthy of being presented in more complete form.

Dr. Kerner stated that it was in the year 1827 that a medical friend of his, residing in the neighbourhood of Weinsberg, expressed a wish that he, Dr. Kerner, would take charge of a singular and interesting patient, a young lady who had been placed under his care for medical treatment.

To this proposition Dr. Kerner assented, and thus he became acquainted with Mdlle. Olga Schwartzberg, the daughter of the Baroness M—, of Vienna.

At the age of twenty, Mdlle. Olga had become the victim of a severe nervous and epigastric disorder, which had determined her mother to send her to Weinsberg, to the care of her trusty family physician.

The mother herself was a gay, heartless, fashionable widow, who had just contracted a second marriage with an immensely wealthy, but very aged man, the Baron M—, who had become captivated with the fair widow's remarkable personal attractions.

Under the treatment of Drs. Kerner and Moran, Mdlle. Olga not only began to recover her health, but she displayed, to a wonderful degree, the faculty of clairvoyance, and, by the magnetic passes administered to her, became a somnambulist of extraordinary lucidity.

In the magnetic sleep she could speak in several foreign tongues she had not studied; play on any instrument presented to her, though entirely unacquainted with music, and discourse most eloquently on various scientific subjects. Besides these interesting results of the sleep waking condition, Mdlle. Olga, in her normal state, could see, and accurately describe, the spirits of many deceased persons known to those around her, yet wholly strange to herself. Notwithstanding the peculiar excellence and accuracy of these descriptions, Mdlle. Olga treated the whole subject of spiritual existence with the utmost scorn and derision, and insisted on attributing the apparitions she perceived to the reflex action of the minds of those with whom she came in contact.

As this young lady had been brought up by a worldly-minded, atheistic mother, Dr. Kerner was at no loss to account for her total disbelief in immortality, and her contempt of all religious ideas; still it pained him to perceive that her rare gifts of seership made no other impression on her mind than to furnish food for ridicule, and denial of spiritual agency.

It was on a certain night in October, 1827, that Mdlle. Olga was left by her physician in a peaceful magnetic sleep, her maid Anna Matterlich occupying a couch in an adjoining apartment, to restrain—as her mistress gaily alleged—any undue flights of her somnambulant wanderings "beyond the confines of earth."

At a very early hour the next morning, Dr. Kerner was summoned in haste to attend his patient, and he then received from her pale lips the following astounding statement:—

"Dr. Kerner," she said, "the sleep in which you left me must have been of very short duration, for the moment after your departure I became so wide awake that I heard and could have counted the number of your retreating footsteps. At the instant that you closed the door behind you, I felt irresistibly impelled to rise from my bed, throw on a dressing gown, and seat myself by my writing table. Whilst I sat, abstractedly gazing at the still blazing fire, to my unspeakable astonishment, my door was opened noiselessly and my mother entered the room, and without attempting to salute me, took a chair, and sat down by the fire on the opposite side to myself.

"If I was astonished at her unexpected appearance, I was still more so at the extraordinary change manifested in her person.

"Her dress—the splendid lace in which she was married to the Baron M—gave me the idea of a cold so intense that it froze my very marrow to look at her; indeed, I felt, though she did not complain, or shiver, that she was perishing with cold. I had always been accustomed to hear my mother spoken of as a very beautiful woman, and I had often gazed at her myself with admiring wonder, but oh! what a contrast did she now present to the loveliness which had so fascinated all beholders! Her hair was loose and hanging around her shoulders in disorder, but to my amazement I perceived that it was nearly all false, and from its lack of arrangement failed to conceal the grey locks which it was designed to hide. One cheek was coarsely patched with rouge, whilst the other was deadly pale. A set of false teeth was in her hand, and her neck and arms were only half smeared with enamel.

"I had never seen my mother at her toilette, and these disclosures fairly overwhelmed me, yet all this was forgotten, totally overlooked, whilst gazing on the unutterable expression of woe which marked every lineament of that wretched face. I had never seen despair, rage, and remorse so awfully depicted on a human countenance, nor did I deem it possible that those passions could find such a fearfully vivid expression.

"I seemed to see, moreover,—and wonderful it was for me to perceive it,—my mother's entire past history, all written,—I could not tell how or where,—yet impressed clearly upon her, and obvious to every eye. And, oh Heaven! may I never again witness the naked deformity of an ill-spent life, thus indelibly imprinted on the form!

"Aghast and speechless, I listened in silence, whilst my mother spoke to me; but her very tones were changed, and instead of the soft silvery accents of other days, her voice was hollow and faint, and seemed to come from an illimitable distance off, and in no way to proceed from the forlorn figure that sat before me. It said: 'Olga! I have come to tell you of a very, very terrible dream I have had, a dream you ought to know, and one which, if I had realised before, I should have been happier—happier now!' She sighed;—and oh what a sigh of anguish was that!—then motioning me to the writing table by my side, she bade me take down the words she was going to speak.

"Mechanically I obeyed her, when she continued as follows, speaking so slowly and with so many pauses, that, though I never seemed to possess the courage to address her, I was enabled to transcribe her words faster than she uttered them:—

"I was dressing, as you see, to go to court, when a sudden faintness seized me, memory fled, and consciousness only returned in the form of this horrible dream."

"Here a shudder of agony seemed to shake her frame, and after a long pause she said:

"I found myself on the brink of a dreary, high cliff, overhanging a wild and stormy sea. The air was thicker and heavier than night; yet it was not night. All was lonely, wild, black, and dreary. It seemed as if I had stood in that awful solitude for ages, yet why or how I came there, I knew not."

"Suddenly, the ground rocked and parted beneath my feet. Shrieking in mortal terror, I caught at the earth, blades of grass, the very motes in the air, to stay my fall, but all in vain. Down—down—I was hurled! oh, how long I was in falling! Surely I must have spent years in that awful descent, for the whole of my past life, even to its minutest details, passed in solemn march before me as I fell. Not the vivid flashes of sudden remembrance, but the stately panorama of every year, hour, and minute unrolled itself before me as clearly as in the time when each event was enacted. I saw my own pale mother sinking into an early grave, but the bitter causes of that untimely death came with her: my disobedience, ingratitude, and desertion. Every unkind word or act of folly I had committed against her was engraved on the funeral pall from which her faded form seemed to emerge.

"I saw dim effigies of young, timid hearts that my idle coquetries had broken. I saw the charms of beauty and intellect with which God had endowed me, first adorning, then disfiguring my own phantom likeness, with the semblance of reptiles and loathsome animals. I saw faces of many a weary drudge whom I had sacrificed to my service; and those who had bowed to me and cringed before me, now reviled me and pointed with foul grimaces to my unfinished toilette.

"All this and more, more than tongue can speak, I saw, and knew, and felt, during that tremendous fall.

"I tell you, girl, a thousand years must have passed in that downward flight. At length I landed—landed on a distant shore, where thick haze clouded at first my straining vision, and the cold winds swept around me with such a piercing, icy chill as I never dreamed to exist before.

"As I shrank and shivered in their tempestuous cruelty, myriads of ragged forms flitted before me, and I knew they were wretched creatures whom I had passed by unnoticed in my town drives, and then I wept to think I had never done anything to alleviate their misery. They mocked at me now, and then they passed away. I would have helped them, but the bitter blast sighed out, 'Too late! Too late!'

"Lies I had spoken, and trivial follies long since forgotten, seemed now to assume tangible shapes, and rose up to meet me so palpably that I felt with shame and horror they were fastening themselves upon my form—my very dress, and would be seen and known by all beholders.

"I strove to hide myself for very shame, but millions of eyes were upon me, and all seemed to read me through and through.

"Then arose the wild and agonising wish, since I could not conceal my true self, that I were changed.

"I screamed aloud a frantic prayer to return to earth and lead a new life; do something—anything to begin life over again, and be a better, truer, and purer woman; but again the bitter winds sighed out the doleful cry, 'Too late! Too late!' In my despair I cried to those who surrounded me that I was not fit to be seen. I must and would be something better; and then I remembered what the priests had taught; how they had preached that the blood of Christ would cleanse the worst of sinners, and redeem all who believed in Him from the penalty so justly due to ill-spent lives. I had never believed this; I had never been taught to believe, but I would do so now, and then with frantic haste I sped on to find a priest. With the wish came the realisation. A celebrated minister of the Christian Church, long dead and gone, started up suddenly in my path alive again, and offered me a crucifix. But, oh, horror! As I gazed upon this man I saw he was worse than I was. He was a hypocrite, a base deceiver, and his changing form was marred by the wild, despairing images of thousands of shipwrecked souls whom his false teachings had misled. Still a shadowy hope was left. I would cling to the crucifix. Pictures of faithful believers thus redeemed, flitted before my eyes; but even as with outstretched arms I strove to clasp the image, it spoke, and in sweet, though relentless tones it said: 'Not everyone who saith unto me, Lord, Lord! but he who doeth the will of my Father who is in Heaven, he shall be saved.' Then I shrieked out: 'Is there then no salvation?' The answer came: 'Work out thine own salvation.' 'But how?' 'In action.'

"But," I cried again, "I am dead, there is no hope, no repentance after death." "There is no death," answered the voice; so still, so soft, yet so full of power, that it seemed to fill the spaces of infinity. Confused and overwhelmed, yet still aroused and stirred by the strange new thought that there might be progress even beyond the grave, I asked: "Where then is hell?" No answer came, but yet I felt that answer, and it impelled me to look around through the murky air, on the bleak and barren prospect, and the dreary stunted forms of beings on whose faces I read images of mis-spent lives like my own. Then I cried, "Lo, I am in hell, and I myself have made it!"

"Then I thought, but did not dare to ask, of Heaven.

"Thought in spirit life is action, reality, and with the thought came a view! Oh, that I could speak of the radiant visions that one brief glance presented!

"The brightest and highest flights of ideality on earth fall short, far short of that blooming, sunlit land, and the happy, lovely people who inhabit it. And yet I saw what they had been, as clearly as I saw the evil lives of my associates. Some had been crippled, blind, starved, worked to death, or worn out with cares and toils, but all had been true and faithful unto death, and good to one another. All those that dwell in those heavenly spheres, those lands of light and beauty, that even to look at for a single instant is worth a thousand years of suffering, had been kind, patient, brave, or helpful.

"Oh, what a glory it was to look upon the good! Oh, that I had been good, ever so little! Oh, that I had left some record behind, to bless mankind! that single blessing would have saved me! But whilst I sighed in heaviness, with Milton's fallen angel, 'Me miserable!' the sweet, soft voice breathed in my ear: 'Up and be doing! prepare, and commence thy life anew. Work out thine own salvation. Arise, and go to thy Father.' I thought—for it was but a dream, Olga—I thought, and said, I will arise; and I did go, and I came here, as the first fruit of my new life and new resolution, for I found, that is, I thought I found, that the only way to help myself was by helping others, and so I came hither to warn my child; to tell her, that not in church, in pulpit, or in the good deeds of another, does the path to Heaven lie, but in her own strivings after good; in her deeds to her fellow mortals; in pure thoughts, good acts, kind words, and the motives for good, which move us through every second of our mortal pilgrimage. Heaven and hell are states, my child. No foot can tread the path by which we reach them, but our own; no mouthing hypocrite can teach us how to find the way, or save, or guide us, only the impulses to good and truth, which God has given to every human soul, if we would but heed them. These are our saviours, Olga. Arise! and save thyself!"

"She ceased, and gaining self-possession from the cessation of the agonising tones that had so long rung in my ear, I cried out:—

"Oh, mother! tell me one thing more. In the name of Heaven, tell me how and when you came here!"

"Raising my eyes as I spoke, I sought to meet her glance, but I gazed on vacancy. The empty chair alone remained; the pen, ink, and vel writing inscribed with the fearful tale, were the only mementoes that remained of that awful interview!"

The lady concluded her narrative by adding, that after the disappearance of the apparition, she remembered no more, until she found Dr. Kerner and her maid bending anxiously over her. As a sequel to this terrible vision, Dr. Kerner stated that the Baroness M.—died at Vienna on the very night in that the Baroness had been found at her toilette half dressed, but covered with blood. The sudden rupture of a blood vessel had robbed her of life, in the very act of preparing to ensnare all hearts in the meshes of her unreal charms.

The appearance of the corpse in all respects corresponded to the apparition witnessed by her daughter, even to the set of false teeth still clutched in the hand of the mute but eloquent dead. It need only be added that to the last day of her earthly life Madame Walter's terrible vision bore fruits in her chastened spirit, by inciting her to ceaseless acts of benevolence, holy thoughts, and words of tender sympathy, which made all who knew her in life, and remembered her after death, "rise up and called her blessed."

REVIEW.

THIRD NOTICE.

There is a sense in which all this doctrine may be termed a transcendental materialism, and in which it even announces itself as such. It is after some hesitation that we transcribe the passages which make this conclusion unmistakable. It may not be easy to explain to those who have not read the book that its main purpose—the exposition of the principles of kosmical and human evolution—is not really affected by abstract statements of this character. The metaphysical basis might be conceived otherwise, and yet what is positive, definite, and practical, would remain almost exactly as expounded, at least in formal outline. Nevertheless, the criticism we have to make on this part of the work, if well-founded, will not be unimportant. For if a perfect anatomy is combined with a defective chemistry, we shall indeed have an admirable skeleton, but a misleading biology. Metaphysics cannot be accepted upon authority; least of all when we find propositions of this nature put forward without any visible appreciation of the grounds which must lead one very important school of thought to reject them.

Occult science, we are told, "contemplates no principle in nature as wholly immaterial," the "clue to the mystery involved" lying "in the fact, directly cognizable by occult experts, that matter exists in other states besides those which are cognizable by the five senses." So far we are not much disturbed. Given the idealist conception of "matter" as objective manifestation, then the whole universe as open to any perceptive faculty whatever can be said to be material, in a sense that may be accepted, or at least allowed to pass. "Occult Science is wholly free from the logical error of attributing material results to immaterial causes." Force and primordial matter are in this book identified; and as force operates changes, that proposition also might stand, if only we put out of sight the law of the direction of force. As a distinguished man of science has lately demonstrated,* the direction of motion is not given in the conception of motion itself. Exception may be taken to the form of statement of what is in reality the theory of Boecovich, adopted by Faraday, Ampère, Fechner, and other physicists, which regards "matter" as reducible to centres of force. The "Adept" position is probably more nearly that of Schopenhauer, to whom all natural forces were forms of the universal energy which in conscious manifestation we call Will, and all the rest mere representation or appearance (Vorstellung), than that of any other modern philosopher. Then in the chapter on "The Universe," at p. 176, we read, "The one eternal, imperishable thing in the universe which universal pralayas themselves pass over without destroying, is that which may be regarded indifferently as space, duration, matter, or motion; not as something having these four attributes, but as something which is these four things at once and always. And evolution takes its rise in the atomic polarity which motion engenders." Now here are the four most general conceptions applicable to phenomena, abstracted from all differentiations, given an united hypostasis, and presented as the final truth and substratum of all things. Surely it must be apparent that these are first forms only, without life or law in themselves. Or if we have to read life and law into the statement, then these are the supreme facts, and Time, Space, &c., are their primary forms, or expressions in manifestation. In what follows, the active and passive (corresponding to the male and female) principles are distinguished, the first being described as the spiritual, the expansive, the life-giving; the second as the material, limitative, or contractive, fecundative. That is a very old statement. We find it at the outset of Jacob Böhm's mysticism, and it has received a philosophical development from the subtle and penetrating genius of Schelling. And perhaps the following, from the latter's "Philosophy of Nature," may help us to the real meaning of the passage we have quoted from Mr. Sinnett's book: "The expanding force must be regarded as the first positive factor, for it engenders the idea of spatiality and extension, or rather it is itself a self-extension. . . . Now opposite to this positive activity stands the negative, that process which circumscribes, limits, arrests, and by these very means determines and forms. To this activity corresponds time." But that is very different from positing space and time themselves—the forms of consciousness—as ultimate and absolute realities. The fault that the idealist must find with Mr. Sinnett's statement is, not that it leaves too little during the Maha-Pralaya, but that it leaves too much. The Maha-Pralaya, as the former understands it, is the cessation of all objectivity, and he could never consent to substantialise the most abstract forms of objectivity. The philosopher of this school only smiles when he is told that there is no personal God, as First Cause, in the manifested universe; though that there are "Gods many and Lords many" as "leaders" (in Platonic phrase) of the time cycles, or world manifestations, is a truth which Esoteric Buddhism seems to restore. As well might you think it necessary to tell us that the substance is not in the shadow, or that the less cannot contain the greater. "All existences" (phenomena) "are non-Ego," said Gautama; a proposition which modern idealism should be at no loss to interpret.* "I have swept the heavens with my telescope, and have not found God," said Laplace. And really we are told much the same of the Dhyani Chohans and of the yet higher potentates of universal space. Our Adept teachers might have been content with saying through Mr. Sinnett, "Your personal God has no place or function in the objective universe; it is that alone we are concerned with, though with that as including an immensity which to your present senses and faculties is non-objective. We will shew you Law alone reigning over and fulfilling itself in every order of phenomenal existence, and we will thus account for all change and all manifestation; exhibiting within the limits of possible objectivity the principles of its evolution, the law of cycles, and the horoscope of time itself. We will do all that, and that is all the highest intelligences can express and explain; but concerning the unfathomable mystery of absolute subjectivity, or Being, we are silent." But we have no warrant in this book for crediting them with any such reserve. Their position is rather that of another French philosopher, who speaking of God, said, "Je n'ai pas besoin de cette hypothèse." And yet on their own showing they do need it. At the end of a planetary chain pralaya, we are told, it is living intelligence that imparts the impulse of evolution to the re-awakening worlds. These intelligences are the Planetary Spirits, themselves the offsprings of the last planetary manvantara. We are not mistaking them for creative Gods, but only calling attention to the fact that intelligent action has to be postulated to start the planetary system afresh. But how about the revival of the whole universe after a Maha-Pralaya? There are no Planetary Spirits, or any conceivable intelligences, left during the Night of Brahm: or if there are we do not hear of them. Of course, by analogy there ought to be; and equally by analogy are we compelled to suppose that if intelligent action is required to give the impulse to a planetary system, a fortiori, or at least with parity of reason, must it be needed for the similar purpose on the grander scale. There is no absolute beginning in time in this philosophy; so that living intelligence may be indifferently regarded as originating and as resulting. The Dhyani Chohans of a planetary manvantara are evolved, no doubt, from a previous one; but then there were other Dhyani Chohans to start the process, and so on ad infinitum. Of eternity as anything else than infinite time there is no hint or idea. And in a cosmogony that is quite right, since all manifestation is under the form of time, itself the great principle of Maya.

A complete philosophy which adopted the analogical method at all would be thorough-going with its analogies; but that cannot be quite said here. If man is the microcosm, his individual subjectivity must correspond with the Absolute Subjectivity of the universe. It is just that consideration which, without attempting to define or philosophise further, enables the follower of the analogical method to hold fast by the idea of God. And for our own part we do hold fast by it with a faith which no formula can express. We may believe in the Night of Brahm—to which also analogy conducts us—the retraction of all manifest existence into the pure Subjectivity, without accepting an abstract material pulsation as the last word of eternal truth. If the profanity of a grotesque parallel may be pardoned, that conception reminds us irresistibly of the Cheshire Cat in "Alice," of which nothing remained but the grin. That at every minute, by the simplest and most necessary acts of organic life, the expiration and inspiration of breath, we do really represent the fortgoing and return of worlds and systems, is an idea we may reasonably entertain. But it marks the process, not the suspension of the process. The Maha-Pralaya would thus correspond to a period during which the breath is held, not to any such motion or pulsation in time and space as above denoted. And it is curious how we get a better hint of the true analogy in one of the early physical processes of the Yoga discipline. The first condition of developing a more interior consciousness is to hold the breath; a feat which practice is said to prolong for almost incredible intervals. If analogy is to be taken as our guide (and we have a right to demand that it shall be faithfully and exactly carried out), we should infer that behind the objective inactivity of a Maha-Pralaya is the most transcendent, though to us inconceivable, life.

So when we are told by Mr. Sinnett that occult science "contemplates no principle as wholly immaterial," we must deal with this proposition somewhat as Leibnitz dealt with another famous formula: "Nihil est in intellectu quod non prius fuerit in sensu"—"nisi intellectus ipse." To say that Law, the logic of nature, which on ultimate dissection turns out to be the truth of nature itself, is in any sense "material," would of course be pure nonsense; and to speak of law as inherent in nature is a mere evasion. As we advance towards the scientific goal, we come to understand that materialism is the last enemy that shall be overcome. But here, in opposition to one school of idealists, we may remark that what saves a theory from materialism is not the recognition of consciousness as giving unity to the universe, but the conception of law as that unity itself. It is in Kosmic Ideation, or the connected logic of forms, that we must look for the truth behind manifestation. For to make the world intelligible is to find the perfect manifestation of reason; to reduce all to form, the sensuous residuum being quite unreal in presence of this. Occult science has anticipated our latest and highest generalisations in the discovery that magnitudes, whether of time or space, are absolutely indifferent. The form, the law, stands out as the same in the vastest aggregates and in the minutest visible. The leaf is the miniature of the tree; the day is a little year; man himself is a microcosm. Nor when we turn to the grander scale of things, to Maha-Manvantaras and Pralayas, for instance, is reason baffled when imagination has to retire. Reason is not embarrassed by magnitudes. She knows them to be merely relative; vain and impotent attempts to escape her jurisdiction. Materialism, on the other hand, relies on fortuitous evolution, on natural selection as determined solely by environment. It cannot postulate law ab initio, or recognise the perfect a priori logic of nature, which in reflection is conscious mind. Every philosophy which does recognise an absolute law or order of manifestation, ipso facto acknowledges an universal mind or reason as the subjective truth of all that appears in time. It may, indeed, refuse to personify this conception; that is, to introduce into it the duality of subject and object, and that for two obvious philosophical reasons. For in the first place, we can never think a conscious subject except as determined and limited by the object of consciousness. Now if it is self-determined, as an Absolute Subject must be, then is the object itself the subject, there is no distinction between Ego and non-Ego, and the duality which every personal consciousness we can ever know or imagine must contain, is sublated. We suppose it will be admitted that Plotinus and Fichte are not bad representatives of ancient and modern idealism respectively, and this argument has been elaborately worked out by both of them. And in the second place, as little can we think this diremption of subject and object except as under the form of time, which is again a limitation. All consciousness is manifestation, and time is not a condition of being, but of existence or manifestation. That is what Hegel meant when he said that "in nature all forms are contemporaneous: only Spirit [consciousness] has a history." When, for instance, we speak of all effects being included, or pre-existing, in their causes, we transfer the category of existence from the order of time to the order of eternity; and are repeating, in modern phrase, what Plato said of the "impartible union" in "the One." The perfect and ineffable law of this connection is really the unity of mind, or is Reason itself. All true science tends to transcendentalism; for its aim and ideal are to exhibit logic in the universe, which would be vain and impossible if all that appears as process had not an eternal and most real subsistence as idea. Ideas are the only truth of things, and can they perish in a Pralaya? If they did, could there ever be another manvantara? "Thought is baffled," we are told, "say even the adepts, in speculating as to how many of our solar pralayas must come before the great kosmic night in which the whole universe, in its collective enormity, obeys what is manifestly the universal law of activity and repose, and with all its myriad systems passes itself into pralaya. But even that tremendous result, says esoteric science, must surely come." And what then, we will not say remains, but is? Shall we reply, all that in differentiation ever truly is—the Intelligible World of Plato? Mr. Sinnett, at least, should not forbid us so to speak, since he expressly asserts the correspondence of the Adept system with the Platonic philosophy. Did space permit it would be interesting to pursue that comparison. Certainly, one characteristic idea in both seems the same; involution precedes evolution. But in Plato, at every downward stage we see a departure from transcendent divinity; and the higher principles latent in man are represented by the successive orders of the gods; thus we are linked to all throughout the series; and these divine hypostases compose a most real theocracy. In Plato, man is never without his god, though he is not an immediate relation with the Great First Cause, as modern theology, borrowing its conceptions from a particularly unphilosophic and unideal race, supposes. It is probable that we have a great deal of misunderstanding to get over, and much further information to obtain, before we know what Esoteric Buddhism really teaches of the relation of humanity at any given stage to the divine beings who already represent in conscious life the next principle of evolution. But it would be equally ungrateful and unreasonable to complain of Mr. Sinnett. On the contrary, we have nothing but admiration for the singular lucidity and conciseness with which he has achieved a task of extraordinary difficulty. He has written a book within the most readable limits, which for grasp of the subject and excellence of literary exposition is excelled by none and equalled by very few with which we are acquainted.

THOUGHT TRANSFERENCE.

The following letter appeared in the Standard newspaper for June 22nd:—

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE 'STANDARD.'

"SIR,—As the question whether one person can read another person's thoughts is exciting some public interest just now, will you permit me to give you a remarkable instance of it of which I myself was, so to speak, the 'subject.' Some forty years ago a noted charlatan, one Marcillac, was exhibiting a somnambulist, the well-known Alexis, whose powers of divination while under the influence of mesmerism were very extraordinary. Here is how, in the instance to which I refer, they were tested. "My father wrote the words Daniel O'Connell on a sheet of note paper, and pasted it at the back of a picture in our drawing-room, and taking me with him, and accompanied by E. A. Osborn, the pianist,—who is, I believe, still living and residing in London—went to Alexis. The latter having been mesmerised, my father was put in communication with him by giving him his hand, but the clairvoyant evidently did not see very clearly. He described the room, the picture, and the sheet of note-paper but stumbled at the spelling. He kept on repeating 'D O C,' 'D O C.' With a boy's impulse I exclaimed 'No, not O, at all.' Whereon Marcillac asked if I knew the word, and being answered in the affirmative, put my hand into that of Alexis, when he immediately uttered, 'Daniel O'Connell.' It strikes me that if the Thought-reader now engrossing public attention can do this, he will have established his claim. Let Mr. Labouchere write a complimentary sentence about, let us say, Lord Randolph Churchill; let him place it in the pocket of any member of Parliament whom Mr. Bishop may designate, and then let Mr. Bishop write out that sentence. If he does that even the senior member for Northampton must be convinced. But if he does not, the verdict must go against him.

"I have seen frequent cases of Thought-reading by people under mesmeric influence; but though there be occasions between very close and intimate friends or relatives when, as Tennyson puts it,

"Thought leaps out to wed with Thought,
Ere Thought can wed itself with speech,"

I utterly disbelieve that one man in a normal condition can tell a number by putting his hand on the shoulder of another man who thinks of it, and any man claiming that power and shrinking from putting it to a decisive test lays himself open to the charge of imposture.

"I am, sir, your obedient servant,

IMPORTANT NOTICES.

REMOVAL OF OFFICES.

In consequence of the property in which 4, New Bridge-street was included, having changed hands, and the intention of the new proprietor to make structural alterations, we have been obliged to leave, and therefore have to announce for the information of friends and subscribers that our Temporary Offices are now at 38, Great Russell-street, W.C. (entrance in Woburn-street), to which address all communications should be sent until further notice.

Consequent upon our removal to 38, Great Russell-street, we fear delay has occurred with respect to a few communications, especially those sent to our old address. We have not, since our removal, received any letters so addressed, and on inquiry at the post office we hear there are letters and book-packets awaiting certain formalities for delivery. Correspondents may, therefore, attribute any delay which may occur in answering their inquiries to this cause.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS READING ROOM

MR. HAWES' SERMON ON SPIRITUALISM IN PAMPHLET FORM.

The demand for this up to the present time has not been sufficient to justify us in proceeding with the work, and in ordinary circumstances we should at once abandon the idea. As, however, the missing letters may place a different aspect on the matter, we have determined to keep the sermon in type for one week longer, after which time if no material advance is made in the number of copies ordered we shall forthwith abandon the scheme. The price is fixed so low that we shall require to print at least 5,000 to cover expenses. At present 500 only have been ordered. Communications on this subject should be addressed to the Manager of "LIGHT," 38, Great Russell-street, W.C.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Owing to pressure on our space many communications stand over. Letters, &c., from Mrs. Penny, G. Damiani, Rev. C. Ware, Northumbria, A. D., and others are in type, and will appear next week.

S.—Your argument does not apply. The proceeds of the entertainment went to the Hospital Funds.

E. K.—The incident you send has already appeared. Many thanks for drawing our attention to it.

THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

Sermon by the Rev. H. R. HAWES, M.A., at St. James's Church, Westmoreland-street, on Sunday morning, June 24th.*

Immortality.

Most of you know that I am going to speak this morning on some of the modern aspects of the immortality of the soul, and you will infer, and you will infer rightly, that I am going to try and place that belief upon a scientific basis. The question is eternally interesting and recurrent. It is a question which most of the religions of the world have tried to answer, and every religion has had influence and retained influence in proportion as it has given some satisfactory account of man's spiritual nature, and given some satisfactory hopes of immortality. What are we? Where do we come from? Where are we going to? If you will think of what men have written and said upon the subject, you will find that there has been a constant disposition to believe that this life is not all; that we are not mere earthworms, a little more subtly organised; that we have spiritual affinities; that we converse with principalities and powers; that we have some control over the formation of that spiritual nature which is to survive the shock of death; that we have in our own hands very much the general character which the next stage of being shall assume; and, above all things, that such a state of being really does await sentient, intelligent, self-conscious beings like ourselves.

Why We Believe In It.

Why do you believe in the immortality of the soul? or, to put it in another way, the survival of you yourself after your body has been lowered in the coffin into the grave? Why do you believe that you do not go out like a candle then?

Some people say they have a consciousness of their own immortality. But you cannot have a consciousness of anything except what is present, what is going on. You may have a consciousness of a certain divine sensibility, and you may infer from that divine sensibility, or that intuition, that you are spiritual, and that the spiritual in you will survive the shock of death. You may infer that from the divine sensibility, as you may infer from a physical feeling of hunger that there is something in the world calculated to satisfy that hunger; and you will be right.

Or you may say that your own intuitions upon the subject are strengthened by the general intuitions and consent of other people; that you find a very wide belief prevalent, and that it almost amounts to a generic consciousness of the race,—this consciousness of a divine sensibility from which you infer the permanence of your spiritual nature, the immortality of your soul. You will be right there, too. It is true that deeply embedded in the very constitution of our nature there is this kind of hungering and thirsting after what cannot pass away, this deep conviction that we ourselves, fundamentally, in our essence, cannot cease. Well, suppose this is so. There will be individual consciousness of a divine sensibility, and there will be the generic consciousness of the race, and you may say that this is a sort of argument for the survival of the spirit. You will be right there; it is a sort of argument.

Or you may say it is a hypothesis, a supposition which explains many facts; that this world would be so irrationally constituted were this little life all; that there are so many unfinished lives that the whole course of the world and the moral organisation of society would be chaotic; that so many things are left unexplained if you limit us to this life, and that if you introduce the survival of the spirit you at once introduce harmony into this chaos, you introduce a principle which will reconcile us to many things, many contradictions, many apparent injustices—to the passing away of people in the prime of life with their work unfinished, and their great ideas unfulfilled, and their hopes that never came to anything; people who have always seemed to be under a cloud in this world for no particular reason, victims of their own organisation, seemingly hampered, the immortal part of them, with that over which they have not had sufficient control. All kinds of thoughts come into the mind suggesting that if there is a development, a continuance, there may be an explanation. You revolt from a world irrationally constituted as this world would be in a moral and spiritual universe; you revolt from the idea that there is no conclusion to all these beginnings, and you may be right there.

Others believe in the immortality of the soul, or in what they call their own resurrection. They say that Christ rose, and because Christ rose, therefore they will rise. Well, I have often pointed out that this is not a very sound argument. It is used by St. Paul as a kind of argument. He says, "As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive." Of course our connection with Adam is a physical one, but our connection with Christ is a spiritual one. When you say a spiritual connection you do not know quite what you mean, but you mean, at all events, something which is not a bodily connection. Then the more unlike us you make out Jesus Christ to be, the less likely is it that the argument will hold sound that because Jesus Christ rose, therefore we shall rise. It is rather an analogy, it is an illustration, it is a devout hope, more than an argument. I have often showed that at considerable length in this pulpit.

The Higher Christian Argument.

Then you may take your stand on higher ground, and say, "We believe we shall survive death because of what Jesus Christ has told us about God; we believe that His deliverance concerning the character of God and God's love for us is a real, true deliverance upon the matter; that if God really does love us, He takes care of us; that He has placed us in the seed time of the earth for the harvest of eternity, that He will never leave us, nor forsake us; that He holds us all in the hollow of His hands, and that His everlasting arms are round about us for ever." Well, if you take that ground I am with you. Yes, if Jesus Christ gave a true message concerning the love of God for man then we are immortal, then we shall survive, we shall not be snuffed out like a candle, we shall not perish when we are put into the grave. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us that we should be called the sons of God." "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is." And we know as St. Paul says, "If our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." "While we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal." So, if you take that ground I am with you; I say that is a good argument; it is an argument for those that believe, for those who are already Christians.

Tendency of the Age.

Now you might think that as a Christian preacher I might rest there, that I might round off my sermon with those texts; and it would be well, only we live in an age when new thoughts and feelings are coming up. Every age has its own difficulties; every age has its way of re-stating the old questions; every age requires its own particular arguments; and every age has its own intellectual and moral characteristics. And what are the mental and moral characteristics of this age? A desire to have the foot planted upon an intellectual rock as well as a barque floated upon an emotional ocean. The tendency of this age is to trace a connection between cause and effect, to correlate all the different phenomena of nature. When anything new is pointed out the first thing which we ask is: What is its connection with that which went before? What is its general relation to a harmonious whole? And we must answer these questions. We must answer them not only in the field of history so as to make the historical personages of whom we read cohere, but we must answer them in the realm of philosophy, we must answer them also in the realm of science, we must answer them also in the realm of religion. Religion must not be an excrescence, however lofty, sublime, and spiritual. Religion and our theological belief must be welded into the very substance of our religious life and experience. That is what the present age does insist upon. Now the ancients did not trouble themselves with all that. They were quite content to rest upon authority, upon affirmation, upon analogy, and upon imagery; upon a show of emotional argument, even upon a propitious hope; they were inclined to believe what they wanted to believe. We want something more than that in religion. We do not want to believe what we should like; we will not believe merely what is agreeable; we want to know what is true, and if not what is absolutely, certainly true, what is possible and probable about our own souls, about our own bodies, and the survival of the spiritual principle. How can these things be? In the silence of your chambers this little sentence rings again and again in your ears: "How can my soul exist without my body? Has it any separate existence?"

Immortality Stated.

Now let us put the matter clearly. What is it you do want? What kind of immortality do you really desire? Is it the immortality of the race, that other people will go on propagating the race to the end of time, whilst you will be dead? Well, that is one satisfaction, perhaps, to some people. Do you want the immortality of your thought, so that after you are dead people will read your books? Well, that may be a melancholy consolation, but you will know nothing about it. Do you want the survival of virtue? Well, that is refreshing, to think that the world is going to get better by-and-by, for it is bad enough now, but then you won't be there to take any account of it. Do you want to think that the atoms of your body will be taken up into cabbages and trees and flowers and plants, and so forth, so that you will go on circling through the various phases of vegetable and animal life long after you know nothing about it? Well, you may get what comfort you can out of that reflection.

No, my friend, what you really want is to feel that the dead are alive for evermore, that when you seem to die you do not really die. What you want is for your own personality to survive, not necessarily the same as it was in this world, any more than you at thirty are the same as you were when a boy or a girl. Of course there has been development and change. All the particles of the body have changed; your character has changed, as also have your associations, and your friendships. In one sense you are not the same, and in another sense you are the same. What is meant is that there has been no breach of continuity, and there has been a steady development through the various phases, but that has landed you where you are in the body, in flesh, in time, and you hope by-and-by to be landed somewhere without a breach in continuity; you hope to go on developing, to start anew, to go on through another progressive phase. This is what you mean by the survival of your soul.

What says Science.

What does science say to all this? Early in this century and from time to time science has said, "That is all a dream." Science is a little more careful now than it used to be. Only a few years ago it was speaking very confidently, and saying, "There is nothing but matter and force in the body; you are subtly organised; you are clever machines, the product of matter and force; but by-and-by the collected atoms fall to pieces, and you cannot hope to survive, because you are the product of matter and force." Well, what did we say? We said, "Can you get the phenomena of mind out of matter and force?" Then the scientific people went back to their laboratories, and tried to get the phenomena of mind, consciousness, thought, feeling, and all the rest of it, out of matter and force subtly organised, but they found they could not get it.

Tyndall and Huxley.

Then I think about ten years ago what I may call the tide of materialism began to turn, and Professor Tyndall spoke some remarkable words at one of the scientific gatherings, where he admitted that if you wanted to get consciousness, mind, the phenomena of mind, what you call soul, and intelligence out of matter and force, you would have radically to change your conception of matter and force; then you might get a promise and potency of life out of it. Well, of course, if you put into matter what you want to get out of it, you may get it out. It is the old hat trick. You may put all sorts of things into it and take them out again. That is as simple as possible. So, if you radically change your conceptions of matter—that is, if you assume all of a sudden that matter is quite different, or if you put into it something quite different from what you supposed to be there before, you can get the promise and potency of life out of it.

Then Professor Huxley gave a little warning note. It was not his business to build up mind or spirit, or to deal with theologians who had dealt so roughly with him; but Professor Huxley is a very cautious man, he is a very large-minded man, a very wise man, a very good man, a very deep and earnest-minded man, and what did he say? He said he declined to assert for a moment with some materialists that there was nothing in the universe but matter and force. Then what did Büchner, the great German materialist, say? He confessed that before you could get consciousness and mind out of matter and force you want an "x"—that mind is matter and force plus an unknown "x." What did Professor Bain say? That we might conceive, no doubt, of mind and intelligence existing apart from a brain and nervous system in some manner that is difficult for us to imagine, because we have never had any experience of it scientifically. The conception that mind might exist apart from the brain and nervous system was not, he said, an irrational one. With all these great scientific utterances the turn of the tide came, and science ceased to fight actively against what we may call Spiritualism, not modern Spiritualism, but the spiritual existence of mind and consciousness.

Three Spiritual Propositions.

What we want is to place the possibility of our survival on a scientific basis. As science has ceased to fight against it, can science fight on our side for it? This morning I will give myself up to two or three spiritual contemplations in your presence, contemplations which will be found to be grounded upon scientific fact. The first is this—hold it well in your minds—the absolute distinctness between mind and matter; between the phenomena of thought, feeling and consciousness, and bones, blood, flesh, nervous system—the absolute distinctness of the two. Secondly, the intimate connection between thought, mind, &c., and matter, brain, nervous system; and lastly, the possible further connection between mind and thought and invisible, or unseen, matter. We know that mind is connected with seen matter; we know that thought is connected with the brain, which is seen matter; but then we shall try to shew that there is an invisible universe, that there are invisible forms of matter, and we shall assume the probability and rationality of conceiving that the mind, as it is associated with seen matter, may also have a better association with invisible matter—what I may call the invisible incarnation of personality. If we can place these things upon a scientific basis, what comfort we shall have found for all who have lost dear friends, for all who sometimes think, "Science must be right when it tells us there is no life beyond the grave!" What comfort you will have for yourself! How you will look not only with calmness upon your approaching dissolution, which must take place in a few weeks, a few months, a few years. The longest life, how short it is! The moons wane, and the suns rise and fall, and your little life is passing away like the sand in the hour glass. You are drifting on the bosom of the great flood into the ocean of eternity; but you are not drifting to a homeless shore; you are going to a home that shall not be without a Father, that shall not be even without a body, it may be, or without consciousness; you are not going down into annihilation; and when you feel this you have won a calmness and a hope that is full of immortality.

Distinctness of Mind and Matter.

First, there is the distinctness of mind and matter for you to consider. There is a union, a seen union, between mind and matter now. You know that the trick of the materialist was to confound mind and matter altogether, or to say that matter was, at all events, certain, and that mind was not very certain. Contemplate the absolute distinctness between the two. What do you know of them? All you know is that the phenomena of mind and matter arise simultaneously, that with every thought there is a change or vibration of molecules in the brain. The phenomena arise simultaneously and they cease. But you cannot pass from one to the other. You cannot express mind in the terms of matter, you cannot express matter in the terms of mind. As Buchner says, mind is matter and force plus x. You cannot tell how vibration becomes sensation. There is no likeness between cause and effect, and all that you are directly conversant with is the effect; you do not know anything about the cause. Even the wood of this pulpit that I strike is utterly unlike the sensation which it gives my hand when I strike it. There is no likeness whatever between the wood pulpit and the emotion conveyed to my brain through the sting which my hand receives; the two things are perfectly distinct: one is matter, the other is sensation. So it is with love, mind, thought, and imagination. You cannot put them in scales and weigh them; you cannot measure them; you cannot cut them up; you cannot discover what they are by cutting up a dead body or cutting up a living body. It was said that they resided in the grey nerve matter, but that, after all, is only a growth, an envelope, an avenue. It is absolutely distinct from the inner penetralia. What do our scientific men say about this? What does John Stuart Mill say about it? "These are his words: 'Feeling and thought are not only different from what we call inanimate matter, they are at the opposite pole of existence.'" What does Huxley say? He is very spiritualistic indeed upon this question; he says: "Our sensations are, in the strictest sense, immaterial entities. There is no likeness between the cause of them and the effect." So that Huxley calls a sensation, the sting which my hand receives,—that is, the impression made upon the brain which causes me to feel the sting through the sensory nerves,—a spiritual entity, an immaterial entity. Professor Allman, President of the British Association, says: "Between thought and the physical phenomena of matter there is not only no analogy, but no conceivable analogy." And what does Huxley say again? "Matter and force are, so far as we know, mere names for certain forms of consciousness; so that it will be almost truer to say that matter is a form of mind than that mind is a form of matter." What does John Stuart Mill say about the connection between the brain and thought? Does he think that that connection is necessary, or that it is accidental and simultaneous? Mill says: "The relation of thought to the material brain is no metaphysical necessity, but simply a constant co-existence within the limit of observation." As far as we observe matters, we see that thought is always connected with the brain and nervous system, but it is not a metaphysical necessity; or, as Bain said, there may be cases for aught we know where thought might have existed without the brain and nervous system, only we have no experience of it, therefore we cannot say that it is. "The uniform existence of one fact with another does not make the one fact a part of the other." So says Mill.

Now when you come to the mind, are you doubtful about the existence of mind? You may be doubtful about the existence of matter. I confess, you do not know what matter is; you do not know why it is, or how it is; but you do know what is going on now; you do know that you have a consciousness that there is a man in the pulpit who is perhaps uttering a dark saying, if not upon the harp without the harp; you do know that there is someone in the pulpit saying somewhat which perhaps you understand, and a good deal which he cannot make intelligible to you; you have a direct consciousness of that, you know that this is so; and thought, feeling, mind is the only thing that you have a direct consciousness of. You can be more certain of it than matter—but in any case the two are distinct.

Unseen Matter.

Well, you have certain experiences, you feel certain things, you are the subject of certain emotions, certain thoughts—are these connected with matter? You know that they are. Are they connected with seen matter? You know that the brain is visible, and they are connected with that and the spinal cord. Are they connected with unseen matter? You suspect that they are, for you hear of such things as nerve force, which must be assumed, which cannot be proved. You hear of the body having magnetic properties which cannot altogether be analysed. You fancy that the molecules in the brain when they celebrate thought, as scientific people say, are really connected not only with the growth of matter but with subtle nerve force, with invisible and unanalysable fluids, which you infer with a tolerable amount of certainty. Thus you are brought to the very borders of the invisible universe, the unseen world. How can you say that your poor little five senses tell you all that can be about this wonderful universe? Why, my friend, if you had but one sense less you would be prepared to deny that there was any such thing as sound, and if you had but another sense less you might deny that there was any such thing as seeing; you might say that the only thing in the world was that which you could touch or taste, and when people talked about seeing and hearing you would say they talked sheer nonsense, for you had no experience of these things. You have your five little senses, but what a little way they go! How imperfect is your eyesight! The telescope convicts you of limitedness in one direction, the microscope shows you your limitedness in another direction. And how limited is your hearing! You can hear some sounds, but do you think you hear everything that might be heard? Do you not think that there are many sounds in the universe which you cannot hear because your ear is too defective? Why, a cat can hear more than you; it can hear higher sounds than you; and many dogs can hear further than you, and the savage man who has cultivated his hearing can hear better than the civilised man who has not cultivated it in relation to long distances. If your hearing were more perfect you might be cognisant of the humming of a forest as a mighty roar; you might hear infinitesimal sounds which now never reach the ear. If the eye were better you might see wonderful visions; you might see, for instance, the particles of odour that flow from the rose on a summer's evening as you walked in the garden. The whole space between you and the rose tree is filled with particles of matter inconceivably attenuated and subtle, and if the eye were better you might see these particles like a radiant prismatic mist floating between you and the rose. And when you apply the "keeper" to the magnet, or when you setup an electric action, were your eye not so gross, so much holden, you might in many subtle forms see beautiful arcs and radiations of electric vibration in bright waves, circling in the most lovely curves. You cannot see that, you see the effect; you do not see even that material manifestation of the vibrating waves of magnetic and electric action. Yet we are surrounded by people who say, "Tell us of things which are palpable to the five senses." I look out of my body through these five little windows, and in my self-conceit I say, "There is nothing in God's Universe but what I can see out of these five little windows; He could not make a sixth; He could not make a seventh; He has no power to shew more than this, nor shall I ever be in any state, or come into any condition, in which I shall converse with things more spiritual than what I can touch, and taste, and see, and handle."

Mind and Unseen Matter.

Have I not taken you to the threshold of the invisible world? Is it not possible that you may even at this moment be surrounded with principalities and powers, as the Apostle says; that there may be existences and phenomena in this air, in the church, in the interstellar spaces, which, if your eyes were not holden, and your ears were not dull, and your perceptions were not gross, might be unfolded to you in a marvellous additional universe, an unseen universe suddenly becoming seen and palpable to you because you had some sixth sense given to you, or some slightly heightened, or modified, form of your senses as they are?

Now we come to the possible alliance of mind with this subtle form of matter. You are bound to believe in subtle forms of matter because you infer them from actual scientific experiment. You have every form of matter, from granite to gas; but when you have got gas you have not got beyond matter; yet you often take no cognisance of gas; certain gases are so fine that you may pass your hand through them without knowing it. So Tyndall has shown us that the whole of the interstellar space which he calls the luminiferous ether, between ourselves and the distant stars, is filled with matter capable of taking vibrations such as the vibrations of light. The whole interstellar space is one mass of matter, yet because you are so grossly constituted now in the body you cannot detect it or analyse it; so that we have every conceivable form of refined matter, in gas, in odours which spring from plants, in radiant matter, in ether. Now is it not possible that the spirit may converse with these subtle forms of matter? Now while we are in the body it is not possible that there may be an inner body of life within a life in every one of us, which we call our soul? You say that is an old theological conception. Well, it is, but it is brought in these days into strikingly scientific relief by such books as the "Unseen Universe." Did you ever look at that book in which Professors Tait and Ralfour Stewart shew that as the sun's light is only operative upon a very small part of the material universe, as far as we know it,—whilst the heat and light are carried into immensities of space, we know not whither, only we know that they do not go out, that they must by scientific law change into something, be received into some universe, be stored up there, for they cannot die, cannot cease to be—so our molecular vibrations of thought are stored partly in the physical memory of the physical and seen brain, whilst part of the energy which goes to move the molecules of the brain and make it a vehicle of thought, passes into the inner body, the inner spiritual brain, so that we have the rudiments of a spiritual nature within us, ill-developed now, rudimentary. Well! that spiritual nature, that soul, is constantly being built up by the energies that pass first into the seen brain, and then pass into the unseen universe, within every man, woman, and child.

These things, perhaps, may be too subtle to preach in a pulpit, but I am persuaded that I am speaking to many who have had these thoughts, and are familiar with the general notion that you are building up every day and hour by your thoughts and feelings and experiences an invisible, endless life within you, which is now rudimentary, but which by-and-by will break out and be the real survival of your real self, just as the grub that crawls on the earth and then rolls itself up and makes itself into a cocoon, is really a preparing and a maturing in a rudimentary manner for that bright creature, that butterfly, that ψυχή, that soul, which is the bright emblem of man's own immortality.

Recurrence of Testimony.

It is strange when you look down history, how this body, within a body, has haunted men; how it has come out in every possible form in theology and religion; how it has interested the minds of poets as well as theologians; how St. Paul alludes to it, who himself was a poet, a rhetorician, an eloquent man, and a devoutly spiritual person as well. Paul speaks of the natural body and the spiritual body. Tertullian says the soul hath the human form the same as its body, only it is subtle, ethereal, and delicate. And one of the modern German scientists, Ulrich, says the soul is a refined, continuous, subtle substance, permeating the whole material structure of the body, retaining the grade of spiritual being because it has attained to the grade of conscious, intelligent existence. If I had here the "Unseen Universe" I would go through the theory of the authors as to the way in which the soul within is storing up will power, and thought, and feeling, and developing consciousness, personality, behind the growth of the material brain and body. Swedenborg later on shewed the same thing in a certain masterly passage, which, as usual, whenever I have anything particularly interesting to read, I have left at home.

Relation to Christianity.

Now you will ask me, "What is the connection of all this with Christianity?" And it is legitimate that you should ask the question. In brief, Christianity affirms the thing that I have been laying before you. The modern spirit wishes for a reasonable ground apart from revelation. Is not that the key note of the sermon that I have been preaching this morning? Let us take away to-day from the midst of some subtlety something solid in our meditation.

Remember I have been pleading for the spirituality of man's nature and the survival of his personality. How have I pleaded for it? Let me sum up briefly and clearly, so that it may lodge in your physical memories.

First, I pointed out the alliance between seen matter and mind: that is proved. Then I shewed you the distinctness of mind and matter: that is proved. Then I shewed you that mind and matter were separated at death: that is most certainly proved; and I inferred a certain affinity between mind and unseen matter actually now existing: that was next door to proved. Then I inferred a probable, superior vehicle for mind which might be found in the universe of unseen matter.

How shall life be carried up and on? How will you bridge over the gap between the body and its next vehicle? Why, you must carry the soul's life on by evolution and continuity, and the principle of the conservation of force. If all particles of the body exist after the body exists, how do you suppose that such a thing as mind, if mind works out a crystallised personality—how can you believe that the higher will not also survive? If the lower survives in changed forms, the higher may also survive in changed forms. The principle of evolution, of continuity, of conservation of force, shews that nothing dies. If nothing dies in the physical world, and if the unseen world, the world of thought, of feeling, of hope, of fear, of consciousness, is as real as the causes of it, or those things which appear to some the causes of it; if physical things last, why should you suppose the higher victories of life, consciousness, thought, feeling, should not also last?

Personality (weigh, I pray you, these closing sentences) is the ultimate production of conscious spirit. Personality is the highest stage of this plane of being which has been achieved by evolution. We follow it on into a more appropriate sphere of existence, to find it at last organised and at home in the unseen universe.

The one further step to be made to-day should be made in the direction of the actual demonstrated alliance of mind with unseen matter. Have we any evidence that mind is so allied or ever has been proved to be so allied?

Modern Spiritualism ought to answer that question if it can. Have you any evidence that mind actually has been allied with forms of unseen matter? There lies, you see, the whole theological importance of modern Spiritualism. If modern Spiritualism can shew one single instance of mind, of intelligence, actually present unconnected with the brain and nervous system, then you see modern Spiritualism will supply the link between fact and faith, which will give us a sure standing ground in the unseen universe. It does not so much matter what these creatures at séances are if they are; it does not matter whether they are sprites, or devils, or fools, or idiots, or the dead that rap tables, or what not, and get out messages; the point is whether they are there.

If they are there, mind, intelligence of some kind is there, and if, mind, intelligence of some kind is there without brain and nervous system, it is allied to some subtle form of invisible matter; at all events, it exists apart from brain and nervous system, and that is all you want. You do not care so much whether the next world or the universe is filled with a variety of beings, good, bad, or indifferent; what you want to know is, are there any beings there at all. If they are, then there is no reason why you should not be such a spiritual being with capacities for survival, with capacities existing apart from brain and nervous system, allied to some infinitely subtle form of matter which will enable you to begin your progress in some new and more highly spiritualised career.

So in the light of science itself faith will become the very "substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen," while we look not to the things which are seen only, but to the things which are not seen, for the things which are seen are temporal, will decay and fall into the grave and become disintegrated; but the things which are not seen, capable of taking on for ever and for evermore the invisible as well as these visible particles of matter,—are eternal.

A SPIRITUAL BAPTISM.

A very interesting ceremony took place at Lilian Villa, Hendon, the residence of Thomas Everitt, Esq., on Thursday, the 19th inst., in which the highest and noblest significance of the great new spiritual dispensation was clearly manifested.

The occasion was the naming of the infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Kreuger—the latter née Rosa Everitt—by spirit influence, through the mediumship of Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten. Notwithstanding the prevalence of a thunderstorm, at four o'clock p.m., a select party of ladies and gentlemen—most of whom had been present at the same place some twelve months before, on the occasion of Mr. and Mrs. Kreuger's nuptials—assembled to welcome the divine spark of life that had become a living creature, and now waited the benediction of the angels to give her a name and place amongst men. After the reading of a few selections from the Bible by Mr. Everitt, the spirit friends, who had assembled in far greater numbers than the mortals present, proceeded, through the writer's lips, to address the parents of the precious little one, upon the momentous responsibilities they had assumed "in launching upon the ocean of eternity, a living soul, who—for ban or blessing, weal or woe—was destined to make a mark upon the ages which no time could efface."

After describing in language which wise and far-seeing spirits alone could have prompted, the relations between parents and children, it was announced that two spirit godfathers were present, who would undertake in solemn reality that watch and ward over the life pilgrimage of the child which mortals were so prompt to promise, but often so lax in performing.

One of the sponsors had been on earth a gentleman slightly known to, but much interested in, the family; the other was the exalted spirit of the good Emanuel Swedenborg, who desired to adopt this babe, to testify the deep interest he felt in the noble work rendered to the cause of humanity through the peerless mediumship of the grandmother, Mrs. Everitt.

After dedicating the little one to the world of uses, by the names of Madeleine Olga Paulovna Kreuger, the spirit sponsors added, of their own accord, the title of "SYN," a name by which, they said, she was already known in the spheres, and one which indicated the powers and functions with which her Creator has specially endowed her. Sybil, on earth or in the spheres, will be a footprint on the boundary of both worlds; a link in the chain between men and angels, on which the life lightings will bring messages of eternal life and immortal blessing.

It should be added that, in place of water, as a sign of purification, fresh flowers were profusely scattered over the babe and those of the company nearest the speaker. After the ceremony, a bountiful cold collation was served. Many regrets were felt at the absence of Mr. S. C. Hall, whose venerable presence had graced the nuptials of the parents, but who was now in distant scenes. With this exception, no mental cloud overshadowed the delightful exercises of the day. The company lingered till far into the night under the spell of music within, and the anthem of the summer breezes chanting their hallicujahs of rejoicing in the tree tops which shaded the lovely dwelling without.

They separated at a late hour, feeling it was good to have been there, and leaving behind them the spell of a benediction, which must fall like a streak of sunlight across the path of "Sybil," and illuminate her way from time to eternity.—Written at request by the speaker of the occasion, Emma Hardinge Britten.

Buddhism and Christianity.

SIR,—I have often wished C.C.M.'s valuable contributions to "LIGHT" could be reprinted in a more permanent form. Might I, however, venture to think that in recalling our attention to the profound truths contained in Buddhist philosophy, C.C.M. has done himself an injustice in the impression which his writings, more especially his last essay on Esoteric Buddhism, produces upon his readers? I am quite sure C.C.M. desires as little as I do to disparage the teaching and the life of Jesus of Nazareth, and the change that Christianity has wrought upon the lives of men. But in his enthusiasm for the venerable Gautama, C.C.M. remarks in a recent number of "LIGHT," "The moral ideal of Buddhism is not only pure and beautiful, to a larger extent than in the case of any other religion it has been effective," and hence as the light thus offered is welcomed by our best intelligences we may confidently expect that the closing years of the nineteenth century will find Christianity on the wane and Buddhism brightening the hopes of humanity. That is, I think, a fair representation of the conclusions of C.C.M.'s able essay.

As C. C. M. remarks, "There is a growing disposition to judge religion by its fruits." Let us therefore inquire what is the effect of popular Buddhism on the lives and characters of its adherents. For this purpose no better country could be chosen than Mongolia, which is as typical of earnest, practical Buddhism as Ireland is of earnest, practical Roman Catholicism. Competent observers tell us that over a Mongol Buddhism exercises a complete sway. "Meet a Mongol on the road, and the probability is that he is saying his prayers and counting his beads as he rides along. Ask him where he is going and on what errand, and likely he will tell you he is going to some shrine to worship. . . . There is scarcely a single step in life, however insignificant, which he can take without consulting his priest. . . . It would be difficult to find another existence in which any religion has grasped a country so universally and completely as Buddhism has Mongolia. . . . The Mongols themselves say that before Buddhism came to them they were in ignorance and darkness, given up to deeds of superstition and cruelty, but now 'see,' they say, 'what has been brought about by our sacred books.'" The foregoing is quoted from that truly admirable and fascinating book "Among the Mongols," by the Rev. James Gilmour, M.A. For twelve years Mr. Gilmour lived among the Mongols, learning their language, conforming to their ways and gaining the largest acquaintance with their inner life that has probably been obtained by any European on record. And what does Mr. Gilmour tell us of the prospects of Buddhism as a new hope for humanity? He says that whilst Buddhism holds out the greatest inducements to virtue and the highest penalties to vice, it utterly fails to make men holy or virtuous, and has long given up the attempt. He goes on to remark on p. 153:—

"Mongol Buddhism and holiness have long ago parted company, and it seems impossible for men and women, living among and partaking in scenes of unblushing evil, to be at the same time experiencing in their souls the effectual consolations of their religion. This seems at first sight almost incredible, but I am convinced it is true, and perhaps no more serious charge could be brought against any religion than this, which holds true of Buddhism, that, notwithstanding many excellent doctrines that characterise it as a theory, its practical effect is to delude its votaries as to moral guilt; to scar their consciences as with a hot iron; to call the morbid righteous, and send men down to the grave with a lie in their right hand."

It may be urged that this is the prejudiced view of a Christian missionary. But readers of the work from which I have quoted will, I think, be struck with the evident sincerity and fairness which characterise Mr. Gilmour's entire narrative. He seems to possess a singularly calm and impartial attitude of mind, but even assuming his judgment is warped by a mental bias, the picture he gives us of the fruits of the Buddhist religion is a very dark and sad one. It may be said further that this only represents a debased and distorted Buddhism. Doubtless, the lives of Mongol, Chinese, and Hindu Buddhists are very different from the teachings of the venerable Gautama, but still, have we any right to expect that those doctrines will brighten the hopes of humanity in Europe when they have failed to ennoble humanity in Asia, backed up as they are in Mongol by a whole hierarchy of Lamas, most of whom are deeply versed in the sacred writings attributed to the founder of their creed!—Yours truly,

W. F. B.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

CAVENDISH ROOMS, 51 AND 53, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

The Controls of Mr. Morse introduced their lecture at these rooms on Sunday evening last, "Man: His Place and Purpose," by reminding us how old is the inquiry, "What is man that thou art mindful of him?" and of the large variety of views resulting from its consideration in the past. The pessimist idea, starting with innate universal depravity and developed in the darkness of despair, was peremptorily dismissed as the offspring of a fit of spiritual biliousness; the Controls were not prepared to define man as the "waste of God." They were indisposed likewise to fully accept the antithesis of this idea and to affirm with the optimist that all is good and grand, although, when you have pared away some of the too apparent surface uncleanness of the race, there is much to be said for the essence of this contention, and the true place of man is much more readily found in this direction than in any other. The obvious inconsistency, after such an expression of opinion, of placing man upon the materialistic pedestal, and of regarding him only as a superior animal, whose world is a cage, and death a prison-house, scarcely required the emphatic repudiation which it received. But the opportunity for putting in a good word for absolute freedom of inquiry, of opinion, and of expression of opinion, unaffected alike by the scare of conventional disapproval and other more demonstrative and forcible forms of persecution, was judiciously seized; and Spiritualists were reminded that they, of all men, whose faith is based upon their judgment of proven facts, should welcome the honest materialist whose mental aspirations only needed similar guidance. At any rate, the too popular method of unmitigated abuse of materialism will only, can only, stimulate its flood and flow; there are better ways than striking a man on the head with a hammer to convince him that iron is hard. The "place" of man is found, then, by recognising in him the embodiment of deific force; an individual representation of God in process of development, involving, at once a lofty position in this world, and an assurance of intimate relationship with Him for all eternity; a being whose permanent deterioration is as inconceivable as would be the black decay of the source itself of all soul existence. In speaking always thus of man, the Controls are expressing the judgment they have formed upon a review of all the facts within their cognisance, and they invite acceptance of the proposition by a consideration of the prevalence of a growing desire for better living, and of the common upward tendency of the individuals of the race, striving always after greater harmony of life and the repression of all the elements of discord. We were advised to think better of the being who can catch the sunbeam, chain, or direct the lightning force and flash, for whose dauntless mind the conquest of all difficulty and the regulated control of all Nature's forces is only a question of time.

What, then, shall be said for the second half of the subject—how describe man's "purpose"? Is it to eat and drink, to sleep and die: to minister only to his immediate necessities or animal desires: or, on the other hand, to cultivate a capacity for slander and abuse, and then to quarrel and fight with his fellows: to charter creeds, and to hang, draw and quarter those who cannot or will not accept them? God forbid! Following some, or perhaps all of these directions, has, under conditions, met purposes of a sort indeed; but they cannot be legitimately associated with the object of existence here. Nor, speaking strictly, can it be said that man fulfils the purpose of his being by simply laying himself out to help others, for until he has made himself great within himself, he can really bestow very little of greatness or goodness upon others. We may accept such efforts as an instalment of the duties of life; but the great purpose of being is to outwork the providence of God through a knowledge of Nature's laws and of the perfect harmony between God and man. Aiming thus high, it is incumbent upon each of us to respond worthily to our immortal destiny; to cultivate diligently every faculty of our common nature; and while remaining content to work out our "purpose" by stages of effort, securing one by one the now accessible advantages of knowledge and of the potency of divine realities, to look forward, with full assurance of ultimate success, to that greatest of all conquests, the scientific subjugation of Death itself.

The Controls concluded by inviting a large attendance for Sunday, the 1st of July, when, to close the second term of work through the Metropolitan Spiritual Lyceum, they will, for the first time, critically examine the laws and lessons of spirit-communion.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

It was De Morgan who defined metaphysics as "the science to which ignorance goes to learn its knowledge, and knowledge to learn its ignorance: on which all men agree that it is the key, but no two upon the way in which it is to be put into the lock." Mr. Haweis, in the course of the striking sermon reported in the last number of "LIGHT," came near the "things too subtle to preach in a pulpit," as he said, but he dealt with abstruse matters that are too commonly neglected by our public teachers. In elaborating the conception of an inter-relation between mind and unseen matter, he drew out that which is among the most luminous truths that are now being learned by Spiritualists. Man is engaged ceaselessly by the acts and habits of his daily life in building up a soul—a spiritual nature, rudimentary now and imperfect, but indestructible and susceptible of infinite development in the future. This is the real man, the immortal being: and it is on himself that the responsibility rests—primarily and principally—of his future state. He is the arbiter of his own destiny, the architect of his own future, the final judge of his own life. This is a truth heard too little from the pulpit; and yet how far-reaching is its import, how necessary the knowledge of it for us all, how all-pervading, how stringent its effect, when realised, on the whole domain of morals and of religion!

"Imperator" put it long ago to me in words that have never passed from my mind: "Man makes his own future, stamps his own character, suffers for his own sins, and must work out his own salvation." The greatest incentive that, to a life of holiness and purity; the greatest deterrent from vice and sin and sluggish idleness, if a man once believes that he sins against himself, and paralyses his chance of future happiness. It is a sign of the times that a doctrine so wholesome and so sweetly reasonable can find a place in the teaching of the Church of England without being supplemented and negated by that other doctrine which usually attends any admission of man's part in working out his own salvation. There is no doctrine more unanimously insisted on by spirit-teachers of all grades of development than this. If Mr. Haweis will refer to my "Higher Aspects of Spiritualism," he will find the idea elaborated in its relation to various social, moral, and religious questions that press now on public attention.

Mr. Haweis inquires whether "Modern Spiritualism can offer any evidence that mind actually has been allied with forms of unseen matter." "If Modern Spiritualism can shew one single instance of mind, of intelligence, actually unconnected with the brain and nervous system, then you see Modern Spiritualism will supply the link between facts and faith which will give us a sure standing ground in the unseen universe. It does not so much matter what these creatures at séances are, if they are. . . . The point is whether they are there." In so saying, Mr. Haweis, with his usual intuition, has put his finger on a most crucial point. If Modern Spiritualism could not answer that most pertinent question with an unhesitating affirmative, I for one should cease to trouble myself about its pretensions. In Section 7 of my "Higher Aspects of Spiritualism" I have drawn out the relation between Religion and Science as affected by Spiritualism, and have shewn how in its light faith yields to knowledge. And a very long time ago I formulated a definition from which I have never since felt any desire to recede. Believing that it is as real an error to claim too much for our facts, as it is to yield too much to the opponents of our faith, I insisted that Modern Spiritualism demonstrates the action of a force that open science does not recognise, and further that that force is governed, in certain demonstrable cases, by an intelligence apart from a human brain.

I take it that this position is what Mr. Haweis wants proved. He must have it proved for himself if he is to attain that measure of conviction which some of us have got; nothing will compensate for the absence of personal proof. But short of that the records of Spiritualism teem with evidence which should impress any mind not wilfully shut against it by prejudice, or warped by the dominance of a crotchet. I clear away a possible objection at starting by premising that I am not now dealing with the question whether in all cases, or even in any case, the communicating spirit is the individual that he pretends to be. I could say a good deal about that, and indeed have said a good deal about it in various places and connections. But that is not the point now. For the purposes of my argument it matters not if the personating spirit who pretends to be Shakespeare is palpably illiterate, or if in carrying out his impersonation he is so inconsistent and inconsequent as not to deceive an average child.

Is there any mind at work, "of sprite, or devil, or fool, or idiot," as Mr. Haweis forcibly puts it, that is provably not that of any person present, that is, in fact, apart from a brain and nervous system? The records of my own experience during the past decade are full of cases which are thoroughly applicable to this inquiry. I make bold to say that there are few Spiritualists so unfortunate as not to have in their own proper experience one case at least which will stand cross-examination, and which will prove so much as is now asked for. I am writing without means of furnishing references to the great mass of books which form the literature of Spiritualism. The Spiritual Magazine, the Spiritualist Newspaper, and Human Nature, to say nothing of numerous volumes such as Dale Owen's, Epes Sargent's, A. R. Wallace's, and many others, are dotted up and down through all their pages, with cases that demonstrate intelligence apart from a human brain.

I may be permitted to refer more particularly to my own books. In "Spirit Identity" will be found an elaborate disquisition on a very perplexing question which will furnish all that is needed for the consideration of that wider and much simpler question that now concerns us. My own personal experiences are summarised at pp. 49-67. As appendices to the arguments therein set forth, I have printed three cases where the evidence is, I think, unimpeachable of the conveying to my mind of information previously unknown to me, by an intelligence apart from a human brain or nervous system. (See App. iii., p. 103.) I especially direct attention to the second case there narrated, that of Abraham Florentine. In a later appendix (vi., p. 139) I have further recorded the communication to me of some precise facts which were quite outside of my own studies, and which assuredly were not latent in my mind. Once more, in "LIGHT" (vol. iii., No. 121, p. 198) I have narrated a recent experience to which I may direct the attention of my readers. This will suffice to prove the elementary proposition that intelligence exists apart from a human brain. It is well that attention should be concentrated on that point, for it is of great import, and it is, fortunately, not complicated by those considerations of extreme nicety, and, indeed, of perplexing difficulty which cluster round the question of the identity of communicating spirits. The proof to a candid mind is overwhelming. What are the conclusions to be drawn from the position so established? I have answered that question in my paper on "The Intelligent Operator at the other end of the line." (Spirit Identity, p. 59, et seq.) Mr. Haweis will have no difficulty in answering it for himself.

Outside of my own experiences I may refer to the scientific information contributed by a perfectly uneducated woman to Mr. Barkas, of Newcastle. He detailed in a recent lecture and he has published an account of the way in which technical answers of minute accuracy were written by the hand of this ignorant woman in response to questions of the most abstruse nature in various sciences, half-a-dozen or more, with which few highly educated persons have any such exact acquaintance. The medium was the wife of an ordinary working man, and by no conceivable method could have acquired the knowledge she so copiously displayed. I could multiply such cases ad nauseam, but Mr. Barkas's is a very remarkable case and abundantly demonstrates what I am now seeking to prove.

MAGNETISM, AND THE LAW IN FRANCE.

The Rappel (Paris) reports legal proceedings taken against M. le Moine, at Pontois, for unlawfully curing disease. The accused pleaded that many physicians had published the fact that diseases are curable by an invisible fluid passing off from the hands of some individuals, if not from all, more or less strongly, which fluid they call animal magnetism; that his practice is the application of this fluid, which includes the administration of magnetised water, that is, water over which he had held his hands a little while. Several witnesses gave, and more were ready to give, evidence as to the good effects of this treatment, for which they paid him very moderately. M. Charles Lachaud, of the Paris bar, appeared as M. le Moine's advocate. He explained the subject to the court, and cited a case where Drs. Mottet and Mesnet were allowed to magnetise a young man before a full bench of the Paris court, the defendant in which case was acquitted. The charge against M. le Moine was dismissed.

La Lumière (Paris) comments thus upon the report:—"Not many years ago a hairdresser was fined and imprisoned for treating diseases by means of magnetic passes and magnetised water. It was held to be illegally practising as a physician and as a pharmacist. For our own part, we think magnetised water better than all the compounds of the pharmacopoeia. Our law courts are at length, and not too soon, enlightened so far as to recognise the new science, and to hold harmless those who utilise it for the good of their fellow creatures."

A "GREEN LADY."

In the "Rambles of a Geologist," by Hugh Miller, author of "The Old Red Sandstone," &c., published after his death, together with "The Cruise of the Betsey," by Constable and Co., Edinburgh, and Hamilton Adams and Co., London, 1858, at p. 249, the celebrated geologist records the following extraordinary narrative:—

"One of the last objects which I saw as I turned to take a farewell look of the Bay of Gamrie," says Hugh Miller, "was the magnificent promontory of Troup Head, outlined in black, on a ground of deep grey, with its two terminal stacks standing apart in the sea, and straightway through one of those tricks of association, so powerful in raising, as if from the dead, buried memories of things . . . there started up in recollection the details of an ancient ghost story, of which I had not thought before for perhaps a quarter of a century. It had been touched, I suppose, in its obscure, unnoted corner by the apparition of the insulated stacks of Troup, seen dimly in the thickening twilight. For it so chanced that one of the main incidents of the story bears reference to an insulated sea-stack; and it is connected altogether, though I cannot fix its special locality, with this part of the coast. The story had long been in my mother's family, into which it had been brought by a great grandfather of the writer's, who quitted some of the seaport villages of Banffshire for the northern side of the Moray Frith, about the year 1718.

"The opening of the story, though it existed long ere the times of Sir Walter Scott or the Waverley Novels, bears some resemblance to the opening in the 'Monastery' of the story of 'The White Lady of Avenel.' The wife of a Banffshire proprietor of the minor class had been about six months dead, when one of her husband's ploughmen, returning on horseback from the smithy, in the twilight of an autumn evening, was accosted, on the banks of a stream, by a stranger lady, tall and slim, and wholly attired in green, with her face wrapped up in the hood of her mantle, who requested to be taken up behind him on the horse, and carried across. There was something in the tones of her voice that seemed to thrill through his very bones, and to insinuate itself in the form of a chill fluid between his skull and the scalp. The request, too, appeared a strange one; for the river was small and low, and could present no serious bar to the progress of the most timid traveller. But the man, unwilling ungallantly to offend a lady, turned his horse to the bank, and she sprang up lightly behind him. She was a personage, however, that could be better seen than felt. She came in contact with the ploughman's back, he said, as if she had been an ill-filled sack of wool; and when, on reaching the opposite side of the streamlet, she leaped down as lightly as she had mounted, and he turned fearfully round to catch a second glimpse of her, it was in the conviction that she was a creature considerably less earthy in texture than himself. She had opened, with two pale, thin arms, the enveloping hood, exhibiting a face equally pale and thin, which seemed marked, however, by the roguish, half-humorous expression of one who has just succeeded in playing off a good joke. 'My dead mistress!' exclaimed the ploughman. 'Yes, John, your mistress,' replied the ghost. 'But ride home, my bonny man, for it is growing late; you and I will be better acquainted ere long.' John accordingly rode home, and told his story.

"Next evening, about the same hour, as two of the laird's servant-maids were engaged in washing in an out-house, there came a light tap to the door. 'Come in,' said one of the maids; and the lady entered, dressed, as on the previous night, in green. She swept past them to the inner part of the washing-room; and, seating herself on a low bench, from which, ere her death, she used occasionally to superintend their employment, she began to question them, as if still in the body, about the progress of their work. The girls, however, were greatly too much frightened to make any reply. She then visited an old woman who had nursed the laird, and to whom she had been used to shew greatly more kindness than her husband. She now seemed as much interested in her welfare as ever. She inquired whether the laird was kind to her; and looking round her little smoky cottage regretted she should be so indifferently lodged, and that her cupboard, which was rather of the emptiest at the time, should not be more amply furnished. For nearly a twelvemonth, scarce a day passed in which she was not seen by some of the domestics; never, however, except on one occasion, after the sun had risen, or before it had set. The maids could see her in the grey of the morning, flitting like a shadow round their beds, or peering in upon them at night through the dark window-panes, or half-open doors. In the evening she would glide into the kitchen, or some of the out-houses—one of the most familiar and least dignified of her class that ever held intercourse with mankind,—and inquire of the girls how they had been employed during the day; often, however, without obtaining an answer, though from a cause different from that which had first tied their tongues. For they had become so regardless of her presence, viewing her simply as a troublesome mistress, who had no longer any claim to be heeded, that when she entered, and they had dropped their conversation, under the impression that their visitor was a creature of flesh and blood, like themselves, they would again resume it, remarking that the entrant was only 'the Green Lady.' Though always cadaverously pale and miserable-looking, she affected a joyous disposition, and was frequently heard to laugh, even when invisible. At one time, when provoked by the studied silence of a servant-girl, she flung a pillow at her head, which the girl caught up and returned; at another, she presented her first acquaintance, the ploughman, with what seemed to be a handful of silver coin, which he transferred to his pocket, but which, on hearing her laugh, he drew out, and found to be merely a handful of slate shivers. On yet another occasion, the man, when passing on horseback through a clump of wood, was repeatedly struck from behind the trees by little pellets of turf; and on riding into the thicket, he found that his assailant was the Green Lady. To her husband she never appeared, but he frequently heard the tones of her voice echoing from the lower apartments, and the faint peal of her cold, unnatural laugh.

"One day at noon, a year after her first appearance, the old nurse was surprised to see her enter the cottage; as all her previous visits had been made early in the morning, or late in the evening; whereas now—though the day was dark and lowering, and a storm of wind and rain had just broken out—still it was day.

"'Mammie,' she said, 'I cannot open the heart of the laird, and I have nothing of my own to give you; but I think I can do something for you now. Go straight to the White House,' (that of a neighbouring proprietor), 'and tell the folk there to set out with all speed of man and horse for the black rock in the sea, at the foot of the crags, or they'll rue it dearly to their dying day. Their bairns—foolish things!—have gone out to the rock, and the tide has flowed round them; and if no help reach them soon, they'll be scattered like sea-ware on the shore ere the fall of the sea. But, if you go and tell your story at the White House, Mammie, the bairns will be safe for an hour to come, and there will be something done by their mother to better you for the news.'

"The woman went, as directed, and told her story; and the father of the children set out on horseback in hot haste for the rock, a low, insulated skerry, which lying on a solitary part of the beach, far below the line of flood, was shut out from the view of the inhabited country by a wall of precipices, and covered every tide by several feet of water. On reaching the edge of the cliffs, he saw the black rock, as the woman had described, surrounded by the sea, and the children clinging to its higher crags. The waves were fast rising, and his attempts to ride out through the surf to the poor little things were frustrated by their cries, which so frightened his horse as to render it unmanageable, and he had to gallop on to the nearest fishing village for a boat. So much time was unavoidably lost in consequence, that nearly the whole beach was covered by the sea, and the surf had begun to lash the feet of the precipices behind; but until the boat arrived, not a single wave dashed over the black rock; though immediately after the last of the children had been rescued, an immense wreath of foam rose twice a man's height over its topmost pinnacle.

"The old nurse, on her return to the cottage, found the Green Lady sitting beside the fire. 'Mammie,' she said, 'you have made friends to yourself to-day who will be kinder to you than your foster-son. I must now leave you. My time is out, and you will be left to yourselves; but I'll have no rest for many a twelvemonth to come. Ten years ago, a travelling pedlar broke into our garden, in the fruit season, and I sent our old ploughman, who is now in Ireland, to drive him away. It was on a Sunday and everybody else was in church. These men struggled and fought, and the pedlar was killed. But though I at first thought of bringing the case before the laird, when I saw the dead man's pack with its silks and its velvets, and this unhappy piece of green satin' (shaking her dress), 'my foolish heart beguiled me, and I bade the ploughman bury the pedlar's body under our ash-tree, in the corner of our garden, and we divided his goods and money between us. You must bid the laird raise his bones and carry them to the churchyard; and the gold, which you will find in a little bowl under the tapestry in my room, must be sent to a poor old widow, the pedlar's mother, who lives on the shores of Leith. I must now away to Ireland, to the ploughman; and I'll be e'en less welcome to him, Mammie, than at the laird's; but the hungry blood cries loud against us both—him and me—and we must suffer together. Take care you look not after me till I have passed the knowe.'

"She glided away, as she spoke, in a gleam of light; and when the old woman had withdrawn her hand from her eyes, dazzled by the sudden brightness, she saw only a large black greyhound crossing the moor. The Green Lady was never afterwards seen in Scotland. The little hoard of gold pieces, however, stored in a concealed recess of her former apartment, and the mouldering remains of the pedlar under the ash-tree, gave evidence to the truth of her narrative."

A PROBLEM IN PHYSIOLOGY.

Under this heading Dr. Chazarnin, of Paris, contributes an article to Le Spiritisme, from which the following is extracted:—

A Magnetiser, who, be it remembered, is an embodied spirit, can induce in his subjects effects such as sleep, insensibility, catalepsy, activity of various functions, &c. Those who believe in the survival of the spirit will be prepared to admit the possibility of a spirit being also able in at least an equal degree, to induce like effects in mediums. This possibility has been demonstrated to me as a fact.

There are difficulties in citing some cases, presenting themselves in private families. That I am in a position to cite the one I am about to do is due to my position as a friend as well as physician.

Last November I was at a séance at the house of Madame G., with others of her friends, all interested in spiritual investigation. In the course of the séance I was addressed by the communicating spirit, thus: "Doctor, what think you of this fact? a woman who has never had a child gives, at the advice of her spirit guides, the breast to another in a decline who had a cough with spitting of blood and constant sickness; milk from her breasts supports her for months and saves her?"

I expressed my astonishment. A lady in the circle, Madame X., said, "I will explain the communication by-and-by." The séance over, and the younger people having retired, Madame X. informed me that she was the nurse spoken of by the spirit and the patient was her dear friend, Madame S., sitting then by her side. They are both mediums. The latter told me that she had hardly had any nourishment for months except that yielded by her friend, Madame X.'s breasts. Both assured me that no milk appeared to be in the breasts of Madame X., either before or after such suckling, and that no-one but Madame S., the patient, could draw milk from them. This was confirmed by Madame A., also present. In the interests of science I asked Madame X. to be allowed to verify these particulars myself. This being kindly accorded, I made strict professional examination of the breasts and there was not a single sign of milk in them. I then witnessed the operation of suckling from them. There was such a flow of milk that it exuded from the angles of the patient's mouth. At the cessation of this operation I again examined, and again there was no sign of milk in the breasts obtainable by actual manipulation.

Madame X., who is well taught and intelligent, said that having read of milk being secreted under the stimulation of frequent suckling, she asked her guides whether such might not be the case with her, and that their reply was, "No more milk will flow from your breasts until you ask for it." Then, although her sick friend took the breast as usual, none came for her. After two days of this, she said she felt satisfied and asked accordingly; then the milk came as before, and she is assured that it will continue to come for the full restoration of her dear friend to bodily health.

SPIRIT TELEPHONE.—This is the title of a new Spiritual Journal published at Baltimore, and edited by Mr. T. L. Henly, a name at one time well known in Spiritualistic circles on this side of the Atlantic. The Spirit Telephone is neatly got up, and we wish the new comer a successful career.

Buddhism and Christianity.

SIR,—In the remarks which your honoured correspondent, "W. F. B.," has made on my article in "LIGHT" of June 16th, I recognise the necessity for some explanation on my part. Most assuredly I did not wish "to disparage the teaching and the life of Jesus of Nazareth." Who with any sense of what is beautiful and divine could do so? Nor do I at all doubt the power of the Christian ideal to respond to the spiritual principle in man, and to give it form and substance. Your correspondent knows that I have been too highly favoured by intercourse with living exemplars of this truth to doubt it. The religion of these persons is altogether more deep and real and effective than anything to which a speculative, questioning, and but half understanding Buddhist like myself can pretend. But it is not the religion of the Christian world at this or any other date. Nor would it be reasonable to expect that it should be. Spiritual truths can only be spiritually discerned, that is to say, the most interior signification of doctrine can only be known to those who have already recognised it in their own consciousness. But not only can I not credit anything exclusively to Christianity in this higher aspect, but I contend that it does not stand to the popular doctrine in the relation of interior to exterior; that it has to be reached, if at all, in spite of the authorised teaching, and not through that. There never has been a form of spiritual Christianity which has not been persecuted as heresy as long as persecution was possible. And that persecution is no longer possible is due in no way to the influence of Christianity, but to the influence of Rationalism.

To trace the conventional morality of any people to its causes, and to ascertain how much of this is due to their religion, and how much to other influences, is an extremely difficult inquiry. But we can speak with some confidence a priori of what must be the tendency of certain doctrines approved by the teachers of the people, and thoroughly adopted by the latter. And so I venture to say that the comfortable assurance of the nominal Christian that he must be saved, if at all, by the merits of his Redeemer—by certain historical events—is about the most dangerous and demoralising narcotic that has ever been administered to the conscience of mankind. I by no means say that you cannot get the doctrine of Christ in us out of the doctrine of Christ for us, as you can extract healing virtue from a deadly poison. But until that subtle chemistry has been effected by the spiritual consciousness, the poison remains fermenting in the system, and it is that which the world in general understands by its Christianity. Nor need it be explained at length how this conception is necessitated by the Christian notion that a fixed and eternal condition ensues upon this life. Such a fearful belief is only tolerable on the supposition that we have been saved by an arbitrary act of Divine benevolence, the condition being made as easy as possible—simple belief that it is so. And, therefore, "I trust in the merits of my Redeemer," is the formula which sends the worldly "humble" Christian straight off to Heaven. Now, as I said that the doctrine of redemption by vicarious sacrifice must have a demoralising tendency, so I say that we require no evidence of the fact to be sure that the Buddhist doctrine of Karma must be eminently conducive—not to saintship or the regenerate life—but to observance of the moral law. Not that we are without the evidence that it is so in fact, for we have the testimony of Dr. Rhys Davids,* as well as the admissions, sometimes grudging and reluctant, sometimes generous and free, of Christian missionaries.

But in the statement to which "W. F. B." takes exception, I referred not so much to the conventional morality of Buddhists as to the public history of Buddhism, compared with that of Christianity. If to have possessed at times absolute sway, and never once to have raised the sword of persecution, and, on the other hand, to have endured that when the turn came, with exemplary fortitude and resignation; if to have had, throughout its whole public course, the "bloodless and innocent record" of which Mr. Sinnett speaks, are practical proofs, on the largest scale, of that "self-conquest and universal charity," which Dr. Rhys Davids tells us "are the foundation thoughts, the web and the woof of Buddhism;" then, surely, Buddhism was truly said by me to have made its ideal effective. Dr. Rhys Davids makes no exception in favour of our own Christian rule in India, when he says: "The principles of the new creed were quite inconsistent with oppression and wrong of every kind; and the government of Asoka, the Buddhist Emperor of India, was probably the most enlightened, and certainly the most philanthropic, which the natives of India have had."*

I am not in the habit of quoting Colonel Ingersoll, but in the following vigorous passage there is truth as well as eloquent indignation:—

"This frightful declaration, He that believeth and is baptised shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned, has filled the world with agony and crime. Every letter of this passage has been sword and fagot; every word has been dungeon and chain. That passage made the sword of persecution drip with innocent blood through centuries of agony and crime. That passage made the horizon of a thousand years lurid with the fagot's flames. That passage contradicts the Sermon on the Mount; travesties the Lord's Prayer; turns the splendid religion of deed and duty into a superstition of creed and cruelty. I deny it. It is infamous! Christ never said it."

That was the "broad contrast" to which I referred. Such were the respective fruits by which I said popular religions must and will be judged.

But then there are those Mongolians. The Mongolian Buddhists are 2,000,000 out of a nominal Buddhist total of 500,000,000.† But never mind that. It is possible that any reader of the Rev. James Gilmour's book may receive the impression of the author's "calm and impartial attitude;" but certainly I should not infer it from "W. F. B.'s" quotations. For not content with saying of Buddhism (what I, indeed, say of Christianity) that it is a practical failure, Mr. Gilmour actually attributes to it the moral degradation which he denounces! "Its practical effect is to delude its votaries as to moral guilt; to sear their consciences as with a red-hot iron; to call the morbid righteous, and to send men down to the grave with a lie in their right hand." And this, after admitting its many excellent doctrines, that it "holds out the greatest inducements to virtue, and the highest penalties to vice," and that the Mongolians themselves declare their moral state now, bad as it still is, to be far better than before the introduction of Buddhism. Now, if a Buddhist missionary in this country, and at this day, were to write a book about us with such a passage in it as that above quoted, it would be at least intelligible. For the natural, probable, and, to some extent, actual effects of the doctrine of redemption by a vicarious sacrifice could not be better described than in those very words. There is no doctrine in Buddhism to which they can have any sensible application.

I have often been told by enlightened Christian clergymen and others, that the notion, orthodox as I believe it is, popular as I know it to be, that Christ made satisfaction for our sins by His death upon the Cross, is not what they mean or understand by Christianity. They have even gone further, and have admitted that that doctrine, carried to its logical conclusion in the minds of believers, would have a deplorable tendency. But what I never have been able to get from them is a definition of the efficacy, other than that of teaching and example, which they ascribe to the incarnation, life, and death, of the historical Jesus upon this earth. They know perfectly well that nine-tenths of their congregations believe, or profess, in some unthinking fashion, the doctrine which they, in esoteric conclave, deny or put aside. They do not preach the doctrine. No. But they do not publicly controvert it, denounce it, warn against it. Yet if it is not Christianity, if it is error, if it is prevalent error, and dangerous error, why not? Above all, if it stands in the light of a purer, truer, higher, and more spiritual conception, why not?

I have only to add, as the article referred to was a review of Mr. Sinnett's book, that I am alone responsible for the comparison between Buddhism and Christianity, and for any offence it may have given. Mr. Sinnett himself has altogether abstained from the topics which seemed to me apposite in an introductory notice of his work.

Esoteric Buddhism.

SIR—"C. C. M." asks: "Can it be that to the bloodless and innocent record of Buddhism will be added this claim upon human gratitude and love?" (the re-construction of religious faith upon a permanent basis.) I should like to give a few reasons for thinking this most unlikely, if I can, at the same time, avoid any semblance of the presumption of attempting to deal with the comparative merits of Buddhism and Christianity in the abstract. That is very far beyond my grasp. But though I sympathise much with this writer as a fellow witness of the "dismal spectacle of sickly faiths drooping and perishing in a hostile environment," I hope little as to faith or religion from Esoteric Buddhism. To begin with what almost ends his interesting paper; "all religion," he says, "recognises our connection with superior powers, and the so-called Atheism of Buddhism is not inconsistent with adoration, prayer, and worship." No: but by religion surely something must be understood that ties or binds? A recognised connection with superior powers is a very feeble holdfast to supreme good, and the first impulse of passion can break it; while we are undeniably inferior, obedience seems to me essential to any religious faith; and adoration, prayer, and worship, that is more optional than obligatory, becomes about as common and fervent as it is among merely nominal Christians at the present time.

But probably the answer would be that hitherto received notions of God it has become impossible for thoughtful minds to accept—that with growing illumination the faith of our forefathers is seen to be manifestly a disguise, if not a travesty, of truth—that if we must believe what has been proved by science and history, we cannot believe what is taught in the churches of Christendom. I also am convinced that those who deeply ponder what is taught ecclesiastically cannot accept it fully, if at all, as it is taught. And what surprises me in the reasoning of people who thus justify disbelief in, or scorn of, the Christian's Gospel, is their identification of a faith with its corruptions, with the folly of successive ages in dropping such parts of the Divine message as ill-suited human convenience, and mistranslating with hard and narrow dogmatism what its interpreters were far too little spiritualised to understand. Here, for instance, is an able thinker, to whom the attainment of truth in its highest aspects is a foremost ambition, pointing out the ridiculous misconceptions of those who judge Buddhism by its exoteric data, and at the same time complaining of Christianity as a failure because its fruits are and have been so confessedly disappointing,—as regards practice, what the bulk of life in Christian countries exhibits,—and as to spiritual knowledge, what permits of the amazingly confident absurdities which may be found in popular religious literature, without long search. He forgets, apparently, that he is judging from the results of exoteric Christianity only; and that these are all that generally come into view is no consequence of Christ's teaching. Just the contrary. Nearly nineteen centuries ago He emphatically declared that what He taught was not the all of truth, but all that His followers could then bear; and He promised a guide who would lead to all. A guide as to doctrine vehemently discredited by Christian authorities ever since! The testimony of everyone spirit-taught in contradistinction to priest-taught has uniformly been silenced as much as possible; it has been condemned as dangerous, and, of course, it is dangerous to all the moulds of unprogressive spiritual life. Add to which that even to the intellect it is troublesome, it strains, it sometimes baffles thought, and misunderstood, misleads.

I know it will provoke a smile if I say that Jacob Böhme revealed, as a medium, esoteric truths, which entirely retranslate and harmonise dogmas which, as "C. C. M." well says, "common sense repudiates as shocking or preposterous;" and this with teachings that "seem almost framed in response to the demands of modern intelligence." Yet it is strictly true, as everyone finds who studies his writings with earnest and unprejudiced attention. This, however, is what, with very rare exceptions, our intellectual aristocracy will not do: it takes too much time, claims too much suspense of own reason; and is an old-fashioned mental hunting ground—"to pastures new!" is the natural and determinate desire. Therefore to continue to run a tilt at Christian faith in its popularised outlines, is not for them as disingenuous as it seems; any more than their favourite habit of citing parts of the book of Genesis as proof of the childishness of Christian belief: they might know if they wished to do it justice how widely different is the literal translation of a learned modern scholar. I refer to the "Cosmogonie de Moïse," by Fabre d'Olivet, which once to read is to be for ever silent as to the ignorance of the writer of Genesis.

There are many reasons for the absence of any wish to do justice to Christian teaching, which need no notice here. Alienation from it has been to a degree inevitable; it has not expanded to meet new inquiry, and eager minds have gone elsewhere for food: perhaps no disappointment is more bitter, or more deeply resented than that of having a stone given, so to speak, in place of bread, when the soul hungers for food: but the description Jesus Christ gave of a "scribe, instructed unto the kingdom of heaven" is "like unto a householder which bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old." (Matt. xii. v. 52.) We have been restricted to the old! not by the Head of our brotherhood.

A further question remains; even were Christian faith esoterically taught, and its mysteries placed—not within reach of reason, for that cannot be—but out of all contradiction to modern science, and in range of ever growing light, would its excellence be justified by the creed or the conduct of the majority of its professors? Is not the one apt to be moulded to their wishes, and others debased by their practice? And can the right standard of wisdom and goodness be tested by the lives of those who fall short of its requirements?

When I hear people censure modes of belief because little or bad fruit seems to result from them, I think of the common impatience of chronic invalids: either the doctor was mistaken or his medicines unsuitable; some other adviser, some fresh nostrum is to give ease. Perhaps even the plain unphilosophical man (still less the philosopher) has not yet attained such conceptions of himself as even Christian teachers make very clear; and cannot perceive that his nature, previous to rebirth of the will, is so totally corrupt that whatever his faith may be, his perversions of it from the blindness of self-love are certain. And I cannot see how Esoteric Buddhism is to remedy that core of evil and folly, human pride, particularly if it recognises in man such as he now is, any just claim for having the moral order of the universe vindicated to him! With all that is confused and dark in a Christian's creed, this at least remains, a quiet trust in the promise of his Master, "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter." (John xiii. v. 7.)

The Buddhists most deeply learned in occult truths have not, we are told, by searching found out God. Christians believe this discovery to be impossible unless God reveals Himself to man; as Nature never can reveal Him. And further they believe (if past the mere tract-reading period of evolution) that such revealing can only be made according to the law of like to like; (N.B. Not equal to equal) which makes knowledge necessarily conditional on being. And as in this present stage of existence, mental darkness and spiritual impotency has made humility, patience and love the only Godlike powers which man can exercise; we Christians believe that God veiled Himself in material flesh, in order to manifest His love to mankind with uttermost humility. And so believing, we adore the Divine wisdom which thus put conjunction with God (to use Swedenborg's phrase as less time-worn) within reach of the poorest intellect, and weakest nature. With the pride or the intellectual power of the creature, God can have nothing in common, but in meekness and love He evidently can, for this God, so far from being only "in external relation to us and the world" (as I grant popular theology might lead us to suppose) is the all of creature life at long removes of out-flown and now discordant natures. And we know what man makes of it, outraging even the laws of Nature as He wills. Because God is "the greatest meekness, so far as He is in Himself, without or distinct from His manifestation or revelation."*

Of all the priceless additions to occult knowledge now offered to us by Esoteric Buddhists, none I think could be more immediately valuable than the distinct affirmation that "man's self is not yet man." "The fifth principle or human soul in the majority of mankind," says Mr. Sinnett, "is not even yet fully developed."†

There the East and the West agree. Mr. T. Lake Harris has many years been teaching the same doctrine; and this much I venture to claim from the students of Buddhism in Mr. Sinnett's school, that if they can accept the fact that hitherto the human soul, and much more frequently the spiritual soul, has been, and is, wanting in thousands of man-shaped beings, they ought in common fairness to allow for the same slow growth of

REMOVAL OF OFFICES.

In consequence of the property in which 4, New Bridge-street was included, having changed hands, and the intention of the new proprietor to make structural alterations, we have been obliged to leave, and therefore have to announce for the information of friends and subscribers that our Temporary Offices are now at 38, Great Russell-street, W.C. (entrance in Woburn-street), to which address all communications should be sent until further notice.

SPIRIT TEACHINGS.*

We have just received from the publishers a copy of this book, consisting of teachings given through automatic writing to our esteemed correspondent and co-worker, "M.A. (Oxon.)." We purpose reviewing it very fully in an early issue of this journal. Meanwhile our readers will be able to obtain some idea of the scope of the book from the syllabus, which appears in our advertisement columns. The publishers ask us to announce that subscribers' copies are being sent out in order, and also that everyone should have received their parcels by the end of the forthcoming week.

AND LIBRARY, 38, GREAT RUSSELL STREET, W.C.

THE WARNING VOICE.*

A True Story.

39, Royal-terrace, 18th April, 1878.

I have been requested to authenticate the facts related in this tract. This I willingly do, leaving the reader to draw his own conclusions from them. How I became acquainted with the circumstances appears in the tract itself; and my recollection of that Sunday afternoon is so clear and fresh that I am able, without hesitation, to certify the perfect correctness of the narrative.

WM. ROBERTSON,
Minister of New Greyfriars, Edinburgh.

Many years have elapsed since the occurrence of the circumstances related below, and I probably should never have thought of laying it before the public but for the suggestion of a friend, in whose judgment I have great confidence. We had been conversing on the subject of providential escapes and supernatural interposition. This led to my relating to her the story of "The Warning Voice," occurring in my own experience, when the life of my daughter (who was present with us at the time) was preserved by what appeared to me as remarkable an interposition of Divine Providence as any I had ever heard of. My friend was so impressed with what I told her that she entreated me to publish it, expressing a hope that it was calculated to do much good in these days of scepticism, when the over-ruling Providence of God is so frequently questioned. To this I accordingly agreed, as the circumstances of the case can be amply verified, all the parties concerned being still alive. By many, such occurrences will doubtless be attributed to accidental coincidence, but there are others who believe that there is no such thing as accident, in the ordinary acceptation of the word, and who, with the poet, interpret chance to mean "direction which thou canst not see." There are few thoughtful minds, indeed, who are in the habit of looking back on the past, reflecting on the various occurrences of their lives, and considering the way by which they have been led, who could not produce from the stores of their own memory instances of Providential care if not so striking or remarkable as that which I am about to relate, yet of such a character that they cannot be easily accounted for on what are termed natural principles. There have been incidents, perhaps, in all men's lives, most certainly in the lives of many, which bear the stamp of supernaturalism so visibly, that to attribute them to blind chance or accident would certainly argue as great credulity as to acknowledge them to be the result of Providential arrangement. To those who have faith in an over-ruling Providence I commend what follows as an encouraging example of a gracious Father's care, while I leave to others to account for such things as they may think fit, if they should consider them worthy of thought at all.

In July, 1860, I went to reside for a short time at Trinity, accompanied by my little daughter (who, for the present, I will call Annie) and a servant. On Sunday, 15th of that month, the Rev. Dr. Robertson, of New Greyfriars, Edinburgh, late in the afternoon, walked down to see me, and, on his way, heard that a terrible railway accident had just occurred on the line between Edinburgh and Granton; that an engine and tender, with five men, had run off the rail, and that three of them had been killed on the spot. On arriving at Trinity he told me what had happened, and asked if I had heard any particulars. I replied that I had not heard of the accident at all, not having seen anyone that afternoon. After a little further conversation on the subject, I said, "I have had a strange nervous feeling this afternoon about Annie, for which I am unable to account; I wonder if it could have had any relation to this accident?" He asked what I meant, and I replied as follows:—"Between three and four o'clock I told Annie to go out and take a short walk, and as she was quite alone I advised her to go into the railway garden (a name she gave to a narrow strip of ground between the sea-wall and the railway embankment, which was closed by a gate at either end). A few minutes after her departure I distinctly heard a voice, as it were, within me say, 'Send for her back, or something dreadful will happen to her.' I thought it was a strange suggestion. I reasoned with myself, what could happen to her on so lovely a day, with hardly a ripple

* This narrative, though published as long since as 1878, will, we believe, be new to our readers. We are informed that Mr. Robertson, who was one of the most popular of Scotch divines, frequently referred to this incident. It was ultimately printed in pamphlet form, but is now out of print. The copy forwarded by our correspondent was given him by Mr. Robertson's widow.—ED. OF "LIGHT."

on the sea, all the world gone to church, and in so quiet a walk, where she would probably meet no one but a nursemaid and some children—so I refused to send for her. But a little afterwards the same thing occurred again; the same words were repeated in the same manner as before, but, as appeared to me, with greater emphasis. Again I resisted the thought that she could be exposed to any danger, and taxed my imagination to divine what could happen. The only thing that suggested itself was the possibility of her encountering a mad dog; but this was so very unlikely that I dismissed it entirely from my mind, and I persuaded myself that it would be absurd to bring her back on account of such a fancy, and, though beginning to feel uneasy, I still resolved to do nothing, and endeavoured to throw off the oppressive feeling by occupying my mind with other things. For a time I succeeded. But soon the voice renewed the warning, in nearly the same words as before, 'Send for her back, or something terrible will happen to her.' At the same moment I was seized with a violent trembling, and a feeling of great terror took possession of me. I rose hastily, rang the bell, and ordered the servant to go immediately, and bring Miss Annie home, repeating at the same time the words of the warning, 'or something dreadful will happen to her.' The servant, in order to quiet my agitation, said, 'Nothing can possibly happen to her, ma'am, she can be in no danger. The weather is very fine; everything is so quiet; everybody is at church. I never saw you nervous before, and yet Miss Annie has been often out alone, and you were never anxious about her.' 'Quite true,' I replied, 'but go directly; there is no time to be lost; go at once.' On leaving the room she told Miss Orrock, the landlady, what had occurred, and the reason of her going out, which she thought very unnecessary.*

"During her absence, the terror which so unaccountably possessed me seemed to increase, and I feared that I should never see my child again alive. In about a quarter of an hour the servant returned with her safe and well. Disappointed at having her walk so suddenly interrupted, Annie asked if she must remain in the house the whole afternoon. I told her there was no occasion for this, but she must give me her promise that she would not go to the place she intended when I sent for her; she might go anywhere else; she might go to her uncle, Major S—, and remain with his grandchildren in his garden. She will be safe, I thought, between the four stone walls; for though she had returned safe, I distinctly felt that there was still danger in the place from which I had recalled her, whatever that danger might be, and my object was to prevent her returning there. No sooner had she quitted the house, than all my anxiety on her account passed away. I thought no more about it, nor reflected on what might have been a foolish panic; it vanished from my mind like a dream, and if you had not mentioned this terrible accident, I daresay I should never have told you about it or thought about it myself any more."

Shortly after Annie came into the room, and Dr. Robertson asked her where she was going when the servant overtook her and brought her back. She said she was going through the railway garden to sit on the great stones by the seaside, to hear the trains pass by. "I was two hours there with my brother last Sunday, and we heard the trains go up and down; they made such a noise as they passed over the arch!" Now it was on that very spot the engine and tender fell when they ran off the line, breaking through the protecting wall, and crashing down on those very stones where she was accustomed to sit, and killing three men out of five that were on them.† Shortly afterwards Annie, accompanied by her brother (aged thirteen), visited the scene of the accident, and, making their way through a little crowd gathered round it, they saw the shattered engine lying on the spot to which she had been going, and where she had spent some time with him the Sunday before.

Afterwards, on reviewing all the circumstances, I thought I could perceive very distinctly the reason why I had been compelled to act with such urgent haste, which did not appear on first thoughts to have been necessary, as the accident did not occur for some time later; for if even a little delay had taken place, the child would have passed out of the walk, and would have gained her favourite seat by the sea, where she would have been completely hidden from anyone looking for her in the walk itself, and the servant would have returned without her. Again, if I had not so strictly prohibited her from returning to the same place, she certainly would have done so (as she herself acknowledged), for it possessed much greater attractions for her than any other, and she consequently would have been on the stones when the train passed from Granton.

* The servant's name was Ellen; if she sees this tract I shall be glad to have a letter from her, to say what she remembers of the occurrence.

† A few days after the above incident I wrote a little account of it to a lady, and before sending this to the press, I forwarded it to her to know if it corresponded to my first statement. In reply, she said that the only difference there was between the two accounts was that in the former I did not mention where Annie went after she returned from the railway garden. The name of the lady could be given if required.

Now it may very naturally be asked, supposing Annie's safety to have been effected by a supernatural warning, why was such a remarkable method adopted? Providence usually accomplishes His purposes by merely natural causes and without any such sensible interposition. Some trifling matter might have detained her at home, some young companion might have met her and led her another way, or she might unconsciously have been induced to select some other walk, and the same purpose would have been served, so far, at least, as her safety was concerned, without exciting the slightest observation. Why was it otherwise here? Who can interpret all His purposes? One of these, at least, was manifest, and that was to make an indelible impression on the minds of all those immediately concerned, so that in after years, they might never forget their loving Father's care, who compasseth their path and their lying down, and is acquainted with all their ways. Perhaps, too, this little record of God's mercy to my family may one day meet the wants of those who, having imbibed something of the "free thought," as it is most erroneously called,—the infidel or atheistic opinions of the present day,—feel themselves adrift on an ocean of uncertainty, and long for some token, some clear evidence of a supernatural agency in the world, some proof that there is One who rules the universe, and yet "humbleth Himself to behold," not only the things that are in Heaven, but the things that are on earth also.

The "Warning Voice" may also prove a blessing to some anxious mother, by alleviating the anxiety she sometimes feels at the protracted absence of a child from home, by reminding her that although she cannot see her loved one, or even tell where he is, there is One who does, and who, speaking of children or young converts, says: "Their angels do always behold the face of my Father in Heaven," standing there in constant readiness to fulfil His pleasure, to fly to the uttermost part of His dominions to ward off unseen dangers, foil temptations, or suggest thoughts, words or actions which may lead to results of the highest importance. "For are they not all ministering spirits sent forth to minister to them who shall be heirs of salvation?"

The object of this little narrative will be abundantly accomplished if the perusal of it should lead any to trust more implicitly in God, and in Him who said, "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall to the ground without your Father. Fear not ye therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows."

25, India-street, March 26th, 1878.

MADAM,

In answer to your inquiries, I beg to say I remember your being with me twice, when I lived at Trinity,—once was in July, 1860. I perfectly remember your sending your servant to bring Miss — home from her walk on Sunday, July 15th, because you were very nervous about her. The servant did not wish to be sent out then, but went, and brought Miss — home. When I heard about the accident that happened on the railway, I had told Miss — she had had a providential escape, for she certainly would have been killed, if she had been sitting on the big stones she had intended to; and I advised her not to go near the railway again.

Yours respectfully,

(Signed) B. H. ORROCK.

A new Spiritualist review, the Reformador, Organ Evolucionista, has made its appearance at Rio de Janeiro, we learn. The editor in his introductory says: "It is to Spiritualism that is reserved the task, glorious because difficult, of effecting the harmonious alliance between science and religion."

A book has recently appeared, written by an obscure individual, titled "The Bottom Facts Concerning the Science of Spiritualism," by one John W. Truesdell. It is said to be a narrative of the author's experiences while investigating the mysteries of Spiritualism during a period of nearly twenty years. The Boston Evening Transcript (a high-toned secular paper of this city) says of the work in question that "his [the author's] investigations were mainly made with people whom the Spiritualists themselves denounce as impostors, and can hardly, therefore, be considered as having much weight as an argument against the existence of certain phenomena."—Banner of Light.

evolution as to spiritual life in Christians. To a creature worthy of the name of man or of Christian, successive layers, so to speak, of improving habits have been essential to after perfection; and had a philosopher examined either, at any earlier stage of ascent and formed his estimate of man or Christian in rudimentary life, he would infallibly have misjudged.

If I at all understand Mr. Sinnett, he has received full confirmation of the old belief in transmigration of souls from the lowest to the highest rungs of creative evolution; and I think he would not deny that we all must have had our mineral and vegetable stages before we began to climb up to animal existence. Why, then, judge of Christianity any more than of humanity by what we now see of it? The cute American who has "got religion" and trades on it: the demure church-goer, highly respected for orthodoxy, hard as a flint to the needy: the fine lady combining all attainable self-indulgence with strict liturgical régime; even the poor drunkard who groans and whimpers at a prayer meeting, are no more samples of what Christ's followers will be, after full and gradual development, than ape or tiger, cat and pig are samples of what man will be when he has his human and spiritual soul, together with all that laid the foundation for them. Yet, I think our Divine Master was at least as wise and as merciful as the head of the Himalayan Brotherhood in not letting poor, half-formed creatures know this, in holding back so long a secret which would tempt many to give up the struggle with the lower principle, and maintain the character of animal-man till fate gave them a lift.

Mr. Bishop at St. James's Hall.

SIR,—I am surprised to see in your issue of last week that "M. A. (Oxon.*)" asserts that "all experience hitherto is dead against the possibility of performing such a feat as Mr. Bishop claims to have done under such conditions as those in which he is alleged to have performed it." One instance strongly in favour of such a possibility is given in the Times, in which Sir John Lubbock (no favourable witness) testifies to four figures out of five in the number of a note having been correctly read by Bishop, the erroneous figure being read as three instead of five. In the other instance Bishop gave the number of a note held by Mr. Waddy correctly. But it is no new feat. It was repeatedly done by Alexis Didier, forty years ago. It was one of the first experiments that he tried with Captain James, who first received him into his house when he came to England. He desired him to write some word and inclose it in an envelope. Captain James wrote "Virginie," and handed the envelope to Alexis, who charged him to fix his thoughts upon the written word. "Pensez-y bien," he would say, when engaged in such an experiment. In the present instance he said he saw that Captain James was a good man because he had written the name of a woman and he at once wrote "Virginie" on the back of the envelope.

"M. A.'s" suggestion of the possibility of Colonel Trench's note having been changed is certainly, as "M. A." himself seems to feel, hypercritical. There was nothing whatever like scuffling on the platform, and nothing short of bad faith on the part of Mr. Waddy or Colonel Statham could have made it possible to change the note. Moreover, there could have been no preparation for anything of the kind, as the offer of the note was an entire impromptu on the part of Colonel Trench.

No doubt Bishop's flagrant charlatanerie strongly indisposes his hearers to believe in his profession of any abnormal powers. Nothing could be more ridiculous than his pretence of showing how the wonders exhibited in the presence of physical mediums are performed. But our belief in the dishonesty of the man ought not to blind us as to what is actually accomplished before our eyes. And he would not be the first example of a person possessed of abnormal powers who endeavoured to turn them to profit by pretending to expose the tricks of physical mediums. An American of the name of Everett, who came over a few years ago, began with the profession of an exposé of Spiritualism, and he, like Bishop, freed himself from the best handcuffs that the police could fix upon him; but when he found that his profession of exposing did not pay, he freely admitted the possession of abnormal powers that he himself did not understand.

I maintain that what took place when Bishop was in the Davenport cabinet conclusively proved, either that he was possessed of some abnormal powers, or that he was aided by some invisible agency capable of wielding a banjo or a hammer. It is certain that he was firmly tied with strips of calico round his wrists, ankles, and neck, with his hands behind him, in such a way that it was physically impossible for him to stir an inch with any member of his body. He was, moreover, during some part of the time, held in his arms by a blind-folded member of the committee. Yet the curtain was no sooner down than the banjo was away about and the curtain thrown into violent agitation, the hammer was heard busily at work, and two pieces of board which had been put in separate, were thrown out firmly nailed together.

Some Results of Curative Mesmerism.

DEAR SIR,—Many think that the results of mesmerism should be more generally known; may I make, on this occasion, the following little contribution:—

I was lately called into Cheshire to mesmerise a lady who had been for some time under medical treatment for neuralgia of the eyes, with such flinching from light that she had to wear a mask as a shade. She had also long suffered from such irritability of the stomach as to compel her to take only beef tea in small quantities, with a little maccaroni. After the first few mesmerisations she left off her large shade. I mesmerised her in all thirty times, with the effect of causing the neuralgia to disappear and the digestive organs to regain their tone.

A lady suffering from sciatica recovered in ten mesmerisations. In this case, as in most others of this kind, of a chronic character, I found electro-magnetism co-operate with the mesmerism.

Another lady suffering with so-called liver complaint, aggravated by the late trying weather, was also cured in ten mesmerisations.

A gentleman under great cerebral excitement from no assignable cause except a chill was restored to equilibrium in a few sittings.

A lady suffering from great mental disturbance approaching insanity, was brought into such composure by mesmerism that her family regard it as a gift from God, and express sorrow that it is not more recognised.

P.S.—While the pen is in my hand, allow me to relate the following, bearing upon a topic often introduced to your readers, as Phenomena after Dissolution.

A short time ago I was attending a patient mesmerically at a country residence of the Marchioness of ——. A mesmerist being considered singular, she imparted to me what she called a singular phenomenon. She had had a French cook who had apartments in the house. He was taken ill of bronchitis, and his illness proved rapidly fatal. After his burial his apartments were entirely renovated. After a few weeks, having many visitors, these apartments were allotted to one of them. The morning after first sleeping there the guest inquired whether anyone was ill in any adjoining room. He said that he had heard coughing nearly all night and even fancied that he saw the person from whom the coughing came. Upon being asked, he described the person as having a black beard and a very pallid countenance. The Marchioness told him that his description corresponded with that of her late cook, who had died of bronchitis in the room in which he had slept. Others, she said, had since occupied the room but had not been disturbed by any sight or sound. It may be supposed that the gentleman spoken of was a medium of a certain description.

Thought-Transference.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Permit me to correct an expression used by the Standard's correspondent, "H. K.," respecting M. Marcillet, who was for many years the mesmeriser of my brother, Alexis. To call a gentleman who has passed away, a noted charlatan, is, at least, out of place. M. Marcillet was not a professional mesmerist, simply a gentleman who delighted in mesmerising my brother. Thought-reading in connection with mesmerism has always existed. When a clairvoyant gave signs of failing before many persons, often the success of a séance was caused by an "incrédule sincère," who would mentally think of what he had written; then Alexis, or I, would at once spell the words thought. In such case it was not vision, but thought-reading.

Catholicism and Spiritualism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The letter of your correspondent, Mary S. G. Nicholls, suggests to my mind some very important questions. The first is: Is the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church true according to the declaration of the spirits as they have returned to tell us? Do we believe the spirits can return and hold communion with us? Shall we believe them or the doctrines which affect our after life, or shall we believe the traditions of a Church whose motto is SEMPER EADEM, i.e., once ignorant always ignorant, the same applying to all the causes of the deaths of the martyrs and the persecutions of those who dared to think for themselves and to express that which they thought? Personally, I have no doubt on any of these questions and I decline, as a Spiritualist, any compromise whatever between the Romish Church and the teachings of the spirits, through whom it has been my privilege to be taught.

If I understand Spiritualism it consists of something more than mere clairvoyance or any other special gift of an individual. Doctrines are embodied in it which, when placed in juxtaposition with those of the Churches, are very different indeed. Take, for instance, that of individual responsibility. This alone strikes at the root of Christian orthodoxy, viz., vicarious atonement, and does away entirely with confession except to the one we have wronged, whether he be in the body or out of the body. If we wrong ourselves we know there needs no forgiveness, we must pay the inevitable penalty.

Spiritualism, if understood as I understand it, sets all men free; it teaches that sin obligations are self-created and must be self-discharged; hence there is no necessity for priests who enslave men's minds and trade upon ignorance.

If your correspondent should think I have been too harsh I must ask her this time to make a little allowance for me, for I believe I was born hating a priest, and since that important event, taking them as a body, they have never excited my admiration.—Yours truly,

PETER LEE.

Freedom in Mediumship.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The principles and facts referred to in No. XXXIX. of "Spirit Teachings" by "M.A. (Oxon.*)" are, I have no doubt, correct. The evils incident to public circles have been fully and painfully illustrated both in England and in this country; and it is our duty to use every judicious safeguard to prevent their recurrence. While, however, they are the evils of excessive freedom, they are those for which there is, as Macaulay said, no better remedy than freedom; and, I think, any attempt to restrict by violent means the exercise of public mediumship would result in worse ills than those which it may be designed to cure. The lessons of experience are, it is true, costly, but usually they are well learned. And, moreover, is it not to public mediumship that Spiritualism owes its present progress, in great part, as well as some of the reproach which has been heaped upon it, but generally by those who judge superficially, and not "righteous judgment"?

The very truths referred to in this excellent lesson of "Imperator" could never have been understood or appreciated, even if they could have been stated, had not experience sadly taught us their genuineness and value. No student has yet reached a plane of enlightenment so lofty that he can afford to say to the instrumentalities of God's providence in this world, "I need no more of such lessons; teach me only by what will soothe my spirit into quietude and calmness; give me only glimpses of the angel spheres, and keep from my sight these objects of spiritual degradation and shame." This would not only be short-sightedness but selfishness; for have we not learned to appreciate, and sympathise with, the unfortunate condition of the unprogressed in spirit life by the very manifestations against which we are disposed to murmur? And while we have come to realise the wickedness, ignorance, and spiritual darkness of the dwellers in the lower spheres, have we not also been brought to see their susceptibility to improvement, and to be convinced of their ultimate salvation? Are not the blessings of spirit communion for them as well as for ourselves? For does not the Supreme Father look upon them, too, as His children, loving them, perhaps, like an earthly parent, the more for their very waywardness and consequent misery, and giving to us, His other children, the sacred privilege of lifting them up?

Even the dark side of Spiritualism has had its uses—its blessedness for us; and how much more for the other side of life! Spirit intercourse is a boon not for humanity alone; it has proved a blessing far greater and more extensive for the spirit sphere adjoining, so to say, the mortal sphere; and I think it is admitted that these two spheres can advance spiritually only pari passu.

What "Imperator" says about "earth-bound spirits" has been illustrated in my own experience; and the perils incident to mediums and circles from their wives and influence have been clearly shown; but we must overcome them by charity and fraternal feeling, not stigmatise them as "devils"—although they are, probably, the only devils that exist. What I mean is, that Spiritualism is not to be shunned because, through it, the presence of these lower spirits is made known to us; for, Spiritualism or no Spiritualism, we are exposed to their psychologic influence, and it is, most certainly, a blessing for us to learn, as we do by spirit intercourse, how to guard ourselves against that influence. The love-spirit will subdue it all, for it is as omnipotent as God, since "God is love." To be possessed by a "vampire-spirit" would, indeed, be a great trial; but to reform the vampire, as has been done, would be a greater glory.

I do not like to have the "Judea of Modern Spiritualism" held up as par excellence the land of corrupt spirit influences; and I presume neither medium nor spirit meant to say what the language implies. The spirit circles in this country have been held with great freedom, and there is much that is calculated to excite regret at times; but ordinarily harmony, quietude, and the love-spirit prevail in American public circles; only interrupted when the demons of suspicion and wilful scepticism prevail.

"For when the heart is full of din,
And doubt beside the portal waits,
They [the angels] can but listen at the gates,
And hear the household jar within."

As Mr. Ware says, in the same number of "LIGHT," these lower influences are often attracted by persons who profess to be religious, educated, and refined, and do not affiliate with that other class whose minds, though they may not piously or reverentially be lifted up to the higher spheres of spiritual being, are yet permeated with the deepest love of their departed friends, and most sincerely desire to greet them. Their disposition is good; their minds are believing, not filled with bigoted arrogance and misbelief; and to that extent they are spiritual; and they get spiritual blessings, on the same principle as did she to whom the Man of Nazareth said: "O woman, great is thy faith; be it with thee even as thou wilt." It is when the malice of fraud-explorers fills the circle, that the saddest of all catastrophes have occurred.

Such statements in regard to the evil influences that may, at times, come to all circles, are calculated to do harm to the cause, if not carefully explained as to their proper relation to it. The Churches brand it all as "devil-worship" or "dealing with the devil;" and Jesuit writers are now quoting the unguarded admissions of Spiritualists as proof of their hostile and untruthful allegations. Let us not bolster up their fabric of falsehood by partial statements, which tend to give a wrong impression to the thoughtless or uninformed. What with the vagaries of occultism, "elementaries," "shells," "devils," et id omne genus, Spiritualism has now a rough and thorny road to travel; but its principles are being more clearly established—even by the follies incident to the movement; and the sun of truth is shining out from behind the clouds of error and grievance more brightly every day. The columns of "LIGHT" afford a sufficient demonstration of this fact.

SECOND SIGHT.

The following account of his own abnormal experience was related to me by Dr. Macaldowie, a gentleman of large practice in the Staffordshire Potteries, whom I have known for some years.

H. WEDGWOOD.

"One night, in the summer of 1882, I was reposing, after a call to a patient, at about one a.m. My brain was in a somewhat excited state in consequence of having been called up for several successive nights, and when I lay down in bed I fell into a kind of lethargy, without losing consciousness of all around me, and in a way quite distinct from dreaming, I saw myself following a woman with a candle through several low-roofed, dark-panelled rooms in a house that I did not know. The vision seemed barely finished, when my night-bell rang, and I was called up to attend the patient of another medical man, at an old public-house in Stoke, where I had never been. I was received at the door by a woman with a candle, and was led through several rooms, corresponding in their general features to those I had seen in my vision, to the patient's chamber.

"About a month after the foregoing, precisely the same state of things occurred again. I had been harassed in like manner by repeated nightly calls, and was resting after returning from one, when I had a vision of myself running along the line, accompanied by several railway porters. Immediately afterwards my bell rang, and I was called to attend a man crushed by a train about a quarter of a mile from Stoke station, and had to walk along the side of the line accompanied by several railway officials.

"The experience of a prescient faculty which I had in these two instances enabled me to realise the possible truth of a tradition with which I had been familiar from childhood, having repeatedly heard it from my mother.

"My grandmother lived at Aberdeen, and her brother was assistant in a jeweller's shop in London. One night he dreamt that an ill-looking man came into the shop when he was alone there and asked to look at some rings. He saw that the man managed to secrete one of the rings, and when he was going away without purchasing, the assistant charged him with the theft and made him restore the ring.

"The following day at dinner time the assistant was left in charge of the shop, when a customer came in, whom, to his astonishment, he recognised as the man he had seen in his dream. He in consequence watched him closely, saw him secrete the ring, and succeeded in getting him to restore it exactly as things had happened in the dream. He wrote an account of the occurrence to his family at Aberdeen, where the story made a deep impression and was handed down to us of the second generation."

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON &amp; THE PROVINCES.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

CAVENDISH ROOMS, 51 AND 53, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

On Sunday last this Society brought the public work of its second term of three months to a close, and the controls of Mr. Morse appropriately devoted the evening to the exposition of the "Laws and Lessons of Spirit Communion."

The subject was considered in a sufficiently comprehensive and instructive, and—so to speak—compact and charming manner, to interest alike the Spiritualist and the scientist, the indifferent explorer and the acutely conscientious soul, every fibre of whose being is influenced by the religious sentiment. The idea of communion between the two worlds involves the active exercise of an interchange of powers and of effort, and the possibility of intercourse results simply from the natural qualities and resources of being in both states. Laws govern the conditions—not miracles. Here and now we advance from the grosser to the finer properties of life; here and now the material is gradually subdued, and the spiritual evolved; and it needs only a perfectly rational development of the elements of growth, already perceptible to us, to realise mentally and by anticipation, the approach of the period and of conditions when matter shall yield absolutely to force.

It is obvious to us all now that man is distinguished by functional peculiarities, in a sense apart from, although associated with, his physical structure. Something is to be said for the possibility of thought-reading, or mind-reading; and if an assimilation, by bodily contact or otherwise, of brain waves shall permit, as it may permit, the transfer of the product of the mental exercise of one organisation to the area or grasp of another, so may there be muscle and nerve waves—waves of physical force.

Such processes, moreover, ordinarily exhibited with feeble results in a perfectly normal and matter-of-course way, are intensified in character and application by concentrated will-power.

It really needs, then—we will suggest—little more than a due appreciation of the possibilities whose germs are apparent in your present lives, to realise or to perceive the explanation of spiritual forces. At the point where the physical eludes you, or is no longer operative to your senses, you may take it that the spirit-world finds its initiative.

Here lies the primal law; a subtle element which belongs to humanity at large, whereby a thought-atmosphere is created which permits of individual appropriation of a common inter-related product. Then, however, it is promptly needful to consider the effect upon the possibility of communion, of sympathy, and of antipathy. With you, as with us, and with you and us, like attracts like, power is intensified by affinity.

What is the spirit-circle? A local application of this universal principle. A company of persons, with a certain range of ideas, a distinct and earnest purpose, meet to investigate some of the unseen possibilities and facts of life.

Associated upon the model of the home, where ties of love, and blood, and soul, unite the members and constrain to mutual duty—and any other basis will certainly retard success—the profoundest emotions of human life are evoked, and the problems of death, the grave, and futurity, are diligently examined as of individual concern. The law of sympathy, then, is of paramount importance, and so delicate are the conditions generally of spirit communion, that the privilege can be applied for the highest and purest of purposes only when that law is unfailingly respected. The controls illustrated this position by a large variety of argument and of example.

Proceeding, then, to a consideration of the lessons probably and usually resulting from the laws and methods, suggestive reference was made to the wonderful adaptations of nature, from the lowest forms up to the heavenly heights, and to the perfect and sublime harmony of the whole—into the details of which reference it was not then possible to enter—as promising continual progress, and our ultimate God-like perfection of being. That was the first lesson. Then that religion, which does not consist in the enunciation of dogma, but in the utilisation of opportunities, is a thoroughly practical matter, which can be duly appreciated only by those who are informed upon the laws of spirit-life. With this practical appreciation comes the knowledge that our individual experience will be happy or miserable in proportion to our regard for law, and that only by present righteousness can we be said to live, as we should live, for eternity, labouring for its evolution while here. We were reminded that it would be easy to shew, if time and circumstance permitted, how the whole of the moral, social, and political, and even the commercial conditions of life, are truly involved in an adequate appreciation of the fact of spirit existence and communion; and finally, urged to cling to the evidence it afforded of a life beyond the grave, where we shall again meet our loved and lost ones, whose state, like ours, is fixed by conduct.

This address should have been reported verbatim; it is impossible to summarise its sustained beauty and comprehensive argument.

On Sunday, the 8th July, the controls are to deliver a discourse upon a subject to be chosen by the audience. The process of discovering the subject will correspond to that pursued on ballot nights for question and answer. In the meantime the congregation have been invited to prepare suggestions and to hand them in, under cover, and signed, on the date named at 7 o'clock p.m.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

The North is quite alive at the present time with Spiritualism. On Sunday, the 24th June, three large meetings were held at Hetton-le-Hole, at which upwards of 2,000 persons were present, and at which several energetic and able discourses were given by a number of the well-known local talent of the district, Messrs. Grey, Stevenson, Patterson, Pickering, Robinson, and Mrs. Wilson. The chair was filled during the day by Mr. H. Burton, of Newcastle.

At Newcastle, on Sunday evening last, Mr. Rowe, of North Shields, discoursed most admirably upon the merits of modern Spiritualism, in reply to an article lately published by the free-thought poet, Mr. Waller. We are sorry to record the fact that the committee of the Newcastle Society have been compelled to expel from their society Mr. W. Armstrong, and the late president, Mr. John Mould, because of their slanderous remarks towards members, and wilful obstruction to the business of the Society. Every opportunity was given previous to their expulsion to substantiate or retract their vile accusations, but, failing to do so, no alternative but dismissal was left to the committee.

At North Shields, Mr. H. Burton lectured to a goodly company concerning Spiritualism, and elicited a large amount of attention and appreciation from his hearers. Mr. Appleby occupied the chair. Mr. Morse, we are glad to say, will visit this Society during his stay at Newcastle and Gateshead.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

I am happy to say that "Spirit Teachings," long delayed by no fault of mine, is at last issued from the press. The announcement in the last number of "LIGHT" will have told as much as this. It is not often that an author can impartially criticise his own book, with a feeling that, beyond general arrangement, he can claim no credit for its contents, though he must, doubtless, bear any just blame for its defects. He is the only person to be got at, and is so far responsible. This is to a great extent my case, however; and the consecutive reading of what is now in the hands of the public has impressed me with a belief that the story of that struggle, and of the means by which it was fought out, is a narrative that must interest and instruct in a measure far greater than the opinions, especially the theological opinions, can benefit or injure any reader. I am not about to enter into a disquisition on theology: I know too much about it. And though it was necessary to deal with a mind that was packed with much lumber as I was dealt with, the theology may be omitted without loss by anyone who is so inclined. The value of the record as one of an educational influence brought to bear from without will remain; though nothing can now give any real idea of its potency.

If Mr. Wedgwood will refer to my previous notes he will find that I have given Mr. Bishop full credit for the two experiments to which he refers. And if he reflects even slightly he will see, I think, that the conditions at the Deanery, Southampton, were very different from those which obtained at St. James's Hall. It is antecedently improbable, in the light of experience, that any sensitive should be able to perform successfully the very difficult feat which Mr. Bishop claims to have performed under such circumstances as those which then prevailed. It is not impossible that the feat was fairly performed. But when the arts and tricks of the conjurer and showman are mixed up with what should be a serious scientific experiment, it is not surprising that those who, like myself, do not doubt the general possibility but only the special fact, should suspend their judgment, and point out the possible flaws in the evidence. If Mr. Bishop read the number of that note under those distracting conditions, he can, no doubt, read the numbers of other notes with some of the fifty elect under much more favourable conditions. He tells us that he is going to do so. I will wait for the result.

No doubt Everett had some psychic power. So, I believe, has every so-called exposé of Spiritualism, else his exposure would soon come to an end. It is only by prostituting the gift that these men can do what they do. But admitting all this—and it is well that the public should know that it is so—I do not see what we are to gain by any dealings with the professional exposé, or the charlatan, who trades on his gift to hoodwink the public quite as much as the cheating medium does when he "assists the phenomena." Against him, poor creature, whom our folly has often made what he is, the outcry is loud, and the moral indignation immense. But the man who lies in order to befool by his words and deeds that which he lives by counterfeiting and misrepresenting, is petted and patronised, not only by those who would kill a hated thing by any means in their power, but by those who view the matter from a very different standpoint. I see no difference between the moral obliquity in these two cases, or, if we are to be nice in our distinctions, the weight of sin is on the side of the man who misleads and hoodwinks a whole public, and makes a knowledge of truth, so far as in him lies, impossible, rather than on the side of the often obscure and always uninfluential medium.

Those who in this matter desire to arrive at truth, and not merely to prop up a shaking opinion, or to bolster up a prejudice, cannot afford to rush to conclusions, or to accept any but the best evidence in dealing with persons whose motives are so manifestly interested as are those of the professional exposé. It is his business to deceive their senses, and to throw dust in their eyes, and they should set out with that conviction. There is naturally, as the Spectator pointed out in an otherwise halting and undecided article on the subject, "a strong prejudice against the conglomerate of conjuring tricks and professed thought-reading which Mr. Bishop exhibited to his audience;" and rightly so. The very circular convening that meeting should lead a critic to be cautious. I say nothing here of other reasons for caution. But I do say that if Mr. Bishop be what Mr. Wedgwood depicts him, his responsibility, and that of the "American of the name of Everett," and that incurred by the whole tribe of exposés, even if they be, as the confiding writer in the Spectator naïvely puts it in one instance, "gentlemen who never gained a penny by the use of such powers as they possess," is one that is weightier than one likes to contemplate.

The Journal of Science for the current month has a paper on Thought-reading by the Rev. H. H. Higgins. He conceives the faculty to be perfectly natural, "a part of the profound mystery of life," which all share in common. He thinks that "there are called into exercise in every instance of Thought-reading two distinct constituents—first, the ordinary nerve-currents; and secondly, an abnormal exaltation of the sensitiveness of some portion of the cerebral system, or sensorium of the operator." The nerve currents, very similar in nature to the electric currents, provide the material (so to say) for mental telegraphy. "There is a special physical condition of the brain corresponding with every thought of which we are conscious," and by the nerve-force it is possible to bring that condition of brain into what Dr. Carpenter calls "direct dynamical communication" with another brain. Especially easy is this when the hand is used for the purpose of transmission of the nerve-current; for "the brain is well accustomed to acts of discrimination founded on nerve-current coming from the hand."

The second constituent—"an abnormal exaltation of sensitiveness in the operator"—is one which he also regards as being reached "by a perfectly natural gradation." The principle of compensation pervades all nature. The blind man is marvellously acute in power of hearing, and the deaf man often possesses very keen vision. In sleep sense impressions are suspended, but we become conscious of what Mr. Higgins regards as the ceaseless action of the brain—unconscious cerebration. This passes into the dream-state where volition is in abeyance. In somnambulism, on the contrary, "volition is active: the senses also are in a normal condition, but reason and judgment are suspended." All these perfectly natural states, "reverie, sleep, somnambulism, catalepsy, lead up so closely to the hypnotised and mesmerised conditions that why the one class of affections should be less a subject for scientific investigation than the other does not appear." (It does not indeed!)

These considerations Mr. Higgins thinks are sufficient to explain the transference of thought when the subject and operator are in "quasi electric communication." "The two brains become like two electric clock dials." I do not know whether he would consider that they covered the more remarkable cases where no contact is established. The case of Alexis Didier to which Mr. Wedgwood refers is hardly similar, except in kind, to the ordinary cases of thought transference. Alexis was a trained and accomplished clairvoyant, and his power of reading concealed letters or seeing objects abnormally is more akin to that displayed by many hypnotised or mesmerised subjects. But, however this may be, Mr. Higgins's temperate and lucid article is a timely and intelligent contribution to the study of a subject which is in no little danger of being vexed by gusts of controversy wherein prejudice rather than impartial justice is dominant.

I am much in accord with Mr. Kiddle's comments on a recent Spirit-teaching. Probably the necessity for impressing me with decided views of what was not apparent on the surface led to a strong statement of one side only of a question that is many sided. No doubt it is true that no more in America than here do the conditions which were then under consideration obtain. But we must all of us have observed that, from "The Judea of Spiritualism" we get what we have of this new truth, even as we seem to hand it on in our turn to Australia. In that sense only was America referred to. But, in truth, whether there or here or elsewhere, the meddling with a subject little understood should be undertaken, as Mr. Kiddle properly points out, in a guarded spirit and with due care. It is equally improper to assume that spirits are "devils," and to greet them all as "angels." Most of them are neither one nor the other, and it is the part of wisdom to warn the inexperienced that there are risks just as, and because, there are blessings in spirit-communication. It is not unkind or unnecessary to warn the young student that he must be careful in dissection lest a tiny prick introduce into his system a fatal poison. Approached in a proper spirit, such as that which pervades Mr. Kiddle's letter, the investigation loses half its risks.

M.A. (Oxon.)

A fresh attempt at National Organisation has been made in the U.S.A. Some of the "soundest" of American Spiritualists are connected with it. We hope to notice it next week.

A NEW FIELD FOR PSYCHOLOGICAL INVESTIGATION. INVISIBLE DENIZENS OF THE SOLITUDES OF NATURE.

The manifestation of the presence and power of spiritual beings in the wild solitudes of nature, unfrequented or abandoned by man, in elevated mountainous regions, in the depths of extensive and ancient forests, upon desolate heaths, by the margin of the ocean or extensive lakes—is a phase of spirit-manifestation which merits special attention from the student of psychology. In remote districts of England, Scotland, Wales, Ireland; of France, Germany, Tyrol, Switzerland, Italy, Corsica, Sweden, Norway—not to speak of other portions of the world—a class of manifestation of spirit-presence will be found attaching to these and similar localities of a strikingly kindred character, suggesting that possibly these wildernesses may be populated by invisible throngs of very mysterious denizens. This is a branch of the great tree of psychology which, hitherto, has attracted but little attention, except from persons interested, more or less, in the Rosicrucian philosophy, or now-a-days here and there, from a "Psychic," with a faculty of spirit-vision developed in this peculiarly occult direction. To the world at large, this must be regarded simply as a very ancient and now all-but entirely dead branch of the great Tree of Superstition sprung from the roots of ignorance. To the writer, however, it appears a limb of the Psychological-Tree of very ancient growth, still shewing signs of vigour in curious blossom and fruit—both for "blessing and banning"—overhanging and intermingling with the colossal myriad-branched tree of the mythologies of the world.

Old Chaucer said in his day,

"The Queen of Fays,
With harp and pipe and symphony
Was dwelling in that place."

Sir Walter Scott in our century, as we learn by the notes to his novels, collected many a story from the lips of the Scottish peasant regarding these weird, fantastic, and sometimes awesome dwellers in the realm of "Faerie;" and "eyes that yet look on the light," he assures us, were, in his day, declared to have witnessed strange sights amidst the solitude of mountains and forests.

And, "eyes that yet look on the light," or have done so within very recent years, within the memory of the writer, have witnessed the presence of the fairy-folk amongst us, in this later portion of the century.*

Ears, which the writer believes are still cognisant of the sounds of earth, have caught the melodies of music proceeding from the water-spirits of a lake in Ireland, the overpowering fascination of which was averred to have been so great that the hearer, lest perforce she should have been drawn beneath the waves by the sense of strange spiritual magnetism attending it, henceforth avoided, on still summer evenings, sailing upon its waters.

Neither could the writer readily discredit the narration of another correspondent, also a lady of education, who averred that three times one clear moonlight night, in Ireland—she herself was Irish—she had heard repeated the thrilling, terrific, "most musical, most melancholy" shriek of the "Banshee," whose cry foretold on that, as on numerous occasions in previous generations, the death of an important member of this ancient Irish family. Sounds also of "the knockings" of the little men of the mines have been heard by the ears of persons in Wales with whom the writer has conversed, and the eyes of others have beheld in thickly-wooded tracts in our mountain solitudes, passing glimpses of mysterious creatures. Thus gradually for years the belief has forced itself upon the writer that probably there exist, whatsoever their origin and nature may be—whether higher or lower than the spirit of humanity—countless varieties of spiritual beings, each occupying its own peculiar realm and region, and fulfilling its own peculiar avocation,

"be 't to fly,

To swim, to dive into the fire, to ride on the curl'd cloud," and that glimpses of these mysterious denizens ensphered within the solitudes of the world of nature, are occasionally revealed to the spiritual perceptions of persons endowed with the temperament and eye of the seer.

For us, who call ourselves students of Psychology, standing upon the threshold of the opening portals of the realm of the supersensuous world, and who—as King Lear said of himself—still "take upon us the mystery of things,

As if we were God's spies—" here indeed open out to us "fresh fields and pastures new" of fascinating study and investigation. Let us begin at once to collect facts. Dr. Justinus Kerner, who resided in the hill country, amidst the forests which border the Swabian Alps, possessed himself by personal inquiry, and through a wide circle of correspondents, of many remarkable instances of this peculiar species of spirit-manifestation. From his storehouse we will now take the following strange and well-attested facts concerning

Mysterious Spirit Manifestation in 1837 near the Lake of Lucerne.

(Communicated by Colonel von Pfiffer to Dr. Justinus Kerner.)

"In the Canton Uri, in the commune of Silenen, near to Stig, resided a peasant family of no great wealth, but highly respected, of which the members were as follows: the grandfather, Johann-Joseph Tittle, aged sixty years of age; his son, Johann-Joseph, aged twenty-four; his wife, Ursula Trysch, from the neighbouring Silenen, also twenty-four years of age; and their two children, little boys, the eldest Johann-Joseph, about three years old, and the youngest about two.

"On August 26th, 1837, to these worthy people there occurred the following extraordinary event. The elder of the two children vanished from the sight of his relatives, and various neighbours who diligently sought for him in vain throughout the restricted area, for the space of three days; and then suddenly appeared relating the extraordinary things which had occurred to him during the interval.

"I will carefully set down the particulars as I obtained them from the parents and the child, in reply to the questions that I put to them.

"The grandfather, the mother, and the two children were, on the day named, on a pasture (Alp) called Rupleben, on the Brästenberg mountain, near Stig. The father, on account of his work, was on another and distant pasture (Alp). It being Sunday, the mother was gone to church at Stig, the grandfather remaining with the little boys in a small house built upon the pasture-ground, in which also various other relations had their abode. The younger child the grandfather carried in his arms; the elder, with his little wooden basket in his hand, was gone with some other children to gather strawberries in a small wood hard-by. As the little Johann might easily have fallen upon the stones and bushes which lay and grew about in the wood, the grandfather, who had the two-year-old child in his arms, and was occupied in warming it some milk to still its crying, kept an eye upon Johann wandering about in the wood, and called to him to return to the house. To the call of the grandfather to retrace his steps, little Johann replied that he was coming directly. Upon this the grandfather returned into the house to give the crying child its milk; meanwhile the sister-in-law, arrived at the house from a distant height where she had been to collect snow, said that she had heard little Johann crying aloud. She sent off one of her children in search of the child, and went into the house where the grandfather was still occupied in quieting the screaming infant and told him that little Johann was crying sadly in the wood. The grandfather, carrying the little one in his arms, ran off at once to the spot from whence the cry had been heard; but neither saw nor found anything except the little wooden basket. Ten persons collected together, sought carefully through the small wood, not a quarter of a mile in length, and could not find the child.

Neither had the boy, sent at once in quest of him, seen little Johann.* The mother had now returned from church, and the grandfather, meeting her with great anguish of mind, told her what had happened. But she would not credit his account and ran to seek her child, uttering loud cries, weeping and lamenting. Nevertheless, all her cries and continued search, and the continued search of others within this confined area were equally fruitless. The mother, together with other persons, continued to hunt for the child the whole night through; but the little fellow had vanished. No one saw or heard anything more of him. They began to fear that either the child had fallen into a stream which flowed not far off, or else he had been carried off by a spirit. Such an occurrence had occasionally taken place in the highest regions of the mountains. On the morrow the child's father was sent for; there was nothing for him to do but to continue the search, which he did, assisted by persons of the neighbourhood, weeping the while. On Tuesday twelve persons sought, and on Wednesday seven. At length, as no trace of him could be discovered, either in the little wood or in the brook which flowed down to Stig, it was agreed that the funeral bell should be tolled for the little lad; the belief being that when this was done, if a child had been carried off by a spirit, the child would then return.

On Wednesday, about five o'clock, whilst the bell was tolled in Stig, two boys—one thirteen, the other ten—aloft on the mountain side, above the spot where the child had been lost, looking down from a distance, saw something moving on the ground. It was the lost little Johann, who was busy playing with pebbles and making houses with them. The child attempted to rise, but fell back from sheer weakness. The younger boy clambered down to the little fellow, who, however, was so much alarmed that he trembled all over. The place where the child was thus discovered was just outside the wood, close to the stream, near to which runs a rivulet, through which the child could pass without the water covering his shoes. Little Johann sat upon a stone close to this small piece of water. His coat was unbuttoned, and a large piece of it was torn out from the bottom. He had lost his cap and shoes; the soles of his stockings were torn away, so that the child had walked with bare feet. The soles of his feet, however, were in no way hurt. Except for great weakness the little fellow was quite lively, and had rosy cheeks. He complained alone of weakness. The boy who had discovered him took him at once to the cottage of his own people, which was near. Something was given him to eat and his father was sent for, and the child kissed his hand. The mother came; but the child did not seem at first to recognise her, not until she had taken the lost child in her arms, and said: "What, Johann-Joseph, dost not thou know me?" Then the child first recognised her and kissed her hand.

Asked where he had been and what he had been doing, he gave the following answer. He said that a great black man had come, had seized him by the scruff of the neck and carried him off to the spot where he had been found. Through this rapid carrying of him away, his cap and shoes had been lost, and his coat torn by the bushes. When he cried aloud from fright, the black man said that he need not cry, because no harm would happen to him. He had seen his mother crying and running about quite close to him, and would have called out to her, but was prevented by the black man. One of the searchers had passed over the very spot where the child was, with his stick—the child named the person. It was so. Besides this, the child said that he had been into Heaven. There was a beautiful, white bridge, beautiful white houses. People were playing lovely music there and dancing. He had joined in the dancing. He had also seen two beautiful white horses. Asked whether he had slept, he said yes, he had lain on his side, had put his head upon his arm and slept. Of the rain which had fallen for two nights he knew nothing; asked other questions, he gave no other answer. As an event interesting to himself, he related that he had nearly laid his head in the water of the streamlet. He had eaten nothing; he would not go back again to the black man, but he would beg his Guardian-angel to come and take him again to Heaven, for it was more beautiful there than here.

"The boy is in good health and lively; has never been ill. Began early to speak; is rather difficult, like most children, to keep in order. He did not approve of my writing down what was told me, and sought to interrupt my writing by crying. He is strong for his age; has a free, courageous expression of countenance; dark eyes, fair hair; resembles his father. He is not fond of mixing with other children, prefers being at home with his parents, especially his mother. He is fond of saying his prayers, and does so in the morning and evening, without being told to do so; especially likes to pray to his Guardian-angel who is to take him into Heaven. He desires his parents frequently to go to church.

PROGRESS IN BELGIUM.

The last quarterly report of the Fédération Spirite Belge is just to hand. The objects of this federation are the advocating of Spiritualism as a philosophical science and as a popular belief, and the cultivation of fraternity and solidarity, or common good, among Spiritualists.

The meetings are annually and quarterly. At the latter reports of delegates are received from societies or groupes which remind us of similar reports elsewhere. For examples:—One says that a local clergyman distinguishes himself by representing spiritual healers as devil's agents and promises damnation to those who submit to their healing; another that the work of healing goes on well, and that the clergy acknowledge the spread of Spiritualism; another that deceiving spirits used to cause trouble and perplexity among them, but not now; another that Spiritualists suffer in their worldly affairs by employers and customers turning away from them; another details its method of conducting séances, and holds it up as an example, namely, opening with prayer, reading from some spiritualist book, sitting in circle for development, and to find who are mediums, and finishing with magnetic healing by an entranced medium.

One society anticipates a large annual meeting, and offers the use of a hall capable of accommodating two thousand. The report indicates the extension of Spiritualism in Belgium.

"We said a great deal of Bulwer, . . . and as everything relating to him is interesting, I must recount a very singular conversation which passed between him and Lady Alison. Their discussion turned on spirit-rapping, in which it was well-known he was a devout believer, and she was anxious to see to what length his credulity carried him. He assured her with perfect sincerity and an agonised look which bespoke too clearly the horror with which the vision had been attended (!) that he had succeeded in calling up the spirit of his daughter.

Being asked what the subject was upon which he conversed with her, he replied, 'The first question I asked her was whether she was happy?' She said, 'Perfectly so.' The next was, 'What is the state of the soul after death?' She answered, 'I know, but I cannot explain it to you, from having been only a short time here.' . . . Whatever may be thought on this subject, no doubt could remain of the sincerity of his declaration, for his anxious manner put that beyond a doubt. Some weeks after, when dining at his house, where his brother Sir H. Bulwer, and his son were present, he introduced a celebrated mesmeriser to call up some spirit to us, but the attempt totally failed. He ascribed this to my being an unbeliever, which always, he said, marred the effect of the incantation. He mentioned at the same time what I have since repeatedly heard from other sources, that the Emperor Louis Napoleon was a believer; that spirits were frequently called up at small parties of the faithful at the Tuileries; that the great Napoleon was sometimes given from behind a curtain, to the company, to kiss, which the Emperor did, on his knees, with the greatest fervour."

(See p. 55.) "At Lord Hardinge's we met the Duke of Cambridge, Lord and Lady Derby, Lady Emma Stanley, Lady Jersey, Lady Clementine Villiers, Mr. Secretary and Mrs. Walpole, and many other persons of distinction. I sat beside Lady Stanley, . . . nearly opposite to Lord Derby, and the conversation in that part of the tables was general. . . . The conversation turned much on mesmerism and spirit-rapping; and though by no means a believer (i.e. Lord Derby) like Bulwer, he recounted several instances in which they had proved successful, so—though not prepared to admit what their followers required,—he was not disposed utterly to disbelieve in them.

"Since that time this strange delusion has almost gone out of fashion, and left behind, in sensible men, one only firm belief in connection with it; which is,—in the influence of imagination, and the marvellous on the credulity of even the most highly-gifted of mankind!"—From "Autobiography of Sir A. Alison," Vol. II., p. 52.

THE SPIRITUALIST PRESS IN SPAIN.

We quote the following, with some condensation, from the Moniteur Spirite et Magnetique (Paris):—

"In Spain books on Spiritualism, original as well as translated, are now frequently brought out. Spiritualist reviews and journals have long been issued in Madrid, Barcelona, Murcia, Alicante, and Saragossa; and now in Seville and in Huesca. The title of the last is L'Iris de Paz, (The Rainbow of Peace). Its title, however, brought no peace to itself, but the sword in the form of the Bishop's 'major excommunication.' This was flashed in the eyes of editors, publishers, printers, contributors, subscribers and readers all round! Alcala la Real brought out La Luz de Cristianismo, (The Light of Christianity), the first number of which received a similar demonstration of ecclesiastical wrath.

"Fair Spain and her former colonies on the South American continent all begin to reflect the light of the spiritual doctrine. We are in regular receipt from them of monthly, fortnightly, and weekly reviews and journals, and so numerous that we are sorry we can give them only a cursory reading.

"Spain, like the rest of the European continent, has to pass through a time of contention before spirituality prevails over the Obscurantism that remains in her antique tenebrous ecclesiastical system. The Middle Ages, when that system reigned supreme, bequeathed to posterity lessons which but too many, misled by compelled clerical moderation since the end of last century, pass by unregarded. Modern ecclesiastics are looked upon as having no bad traditions of the past, as having no spiritual relationship with the perpetrators of doings which history is ashamed and revolted at recording. We are asked to allude no more to the massacres of heretics, the breakings on the wheel, and the burning faggots of the Inquisition!

"But with the sword of these 'major excommunications' flashing in the eyes of spiritualist writers, publishers, and readers, our brethren of Spain may well ask whether the ashes of the fires of the Middle Ages are not still smouldering in ecclesiastical bosoms?

"But let us have courage and persevere to the end. Let us be assured that the way is being prepared for a great reconstruction. In this Materialism has done effective work; like a corps of pioneers and sappers it has done not a little in clearing and levelling ground. This it certainly has done, but it is not capable of erecting a beacon whose light shall be a guide to the human family, scattered in thought and wandering in the maze of hypothetical systems.

"In providential order Spiritualism comes with its facts, demonstrating that life is continued beyond the grave; with its knowledge that those gone before and whom we are unable to see through the limitation of our corporeal vision, can communicate with us. From these we receive experimental knowledge as to the consequences—present to them—of their past lives on earth.

"From these facts rational illuminating doctrine has been evolved.* These spiritual facts manifesting themselves simultaneously among the most advanced nations, coincidently with the discovery of rapid means of locomotion and of instantaneous communication of thought among all peoples, point most assuredly to providential action, and enable us to foresee the time when all humanity will progressively participate in the blessings, here on earth, of a happy social order.

"But antagonism to this must be expected from Spanish ecclesiasticism. The apostles of any such order must look for its pains and penalties. The heaviest of these that it can now inflict is this 'major excommunication.' It was a curse, indeed, in times when all had unhesitatingly to carry the Church's edicts into execution; but in these latter days it is of force only so far as response is accorded to it; and this response becomes weaker and weaker in proportion to the enlargement of laical or secular knowledge, which is now strengthened by the extension of spiritual instruction."

W. J. Colville, we are informed, sailed for England in the Cunard steamer "Scythia," from New York, Wednesday afternoon, June 20th.

Mrs. Hardinge Britten will lecture for the present at Liverpool the second and third Sundays, and Halifax the last Sundays of each month; at Rochdale, July 22nd; Blackburn, August 12th; Walsall, September 9th. The Limes, Humphrey-street, Cheetham-hill, Manchester.

* When French writers mention spiritual doctrine they may be generally understood to mean that taught by Allan Kardec. His works, excellently translated by Miss Anna Blackwell, are to be had of the spiritualist booksellers. They are also in the library of the Central Association of Spiritualists.

EXPERIENCE OF A WRITING MEDIUM OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

"I never desired to know anything of the Divine mystery, much less understood I the way how to seek or find it; I knew nothing of it, as is the condition of poor laymen in their simplicity." . . . "I besought the Lord earnestly for His Holy spirit and His grace, that He would be pleased to bless and guide me in Him (Jesus Christ) and take that away from me which did turn me away from Him; and that He only might lead and direct me. In this, my earnest feeling or desire (wherein I suffered many a shrewd repulse, but at last being resolved rather to put my life to utmost hazard than to give over and leave off) the gate was opened unto me, so that in one quarter of an hour, I saw and knew more than if I had been many years together at a University, at which I did exceedingly admire, and I knew not how it happened to me; and therefore I turned my heart to praise God for it. For I saw and knew the Being of all beings, the Byss and Abyss" (i.e., the original ground and that which is fathomless) "of the Holy Trinity; the descent and original of this world, and of all creatures through the Divine Wisdom; I knew and saw in myself all the three worlds, namely, the Divine, Angelical, and Paradisaical World, and then the dark world, being the original of nature to the fire" (i.e. the becoming of fire) "and then thirdly the eternal and visible world, being a procreation or external birth; or as a substance spoken forth from both the internal and spiritual worlds; and I saw and knew the whole Being in the evil and in the good, and the mutual, original, and existence of each of them." . . . "And presently it came powerfully into my mind to set the same down in writing for a memorial to myself; albeit I could very hardly apprehend the same in my external man, and express it with the pen; yet, however, I must begin to labour in these great mysteries as a child that goeth to school. I saw it, as in the great deep in the external, for I had a thorough view of the Universe, as in a chaos, wherein all things were couched and wrapt up, but it was impossible for me to explicate and unfold the same. Yet it opened itself in me from time to time as in a young plant; albeit the same was with me for the space of twelve years, and I found a powerful driving and instigation within me before I could bring it forth into an external form of writing; which afterwards fell upon me as a sudden shower, which killeth whatsoever it lighteth upon. Just so it happened to me, whatever I could apprehend and bring into the external principle of my mind, the same I wrote down."—Second Epistle, pars. 6 to 14.

"I proposed, after the persecution, not to write any more, but only to keep myself still in obedience to my God." . . . "But it went with me as with a grain that is sown into the earth, which against all season springs up afresh in all storms and tempests; whereas in the winter all seems as dead, and reason with now all is gone: thus the precious grain of mustard seed sprung up again under all dispraise, contempt, disdain and devious as a lily, and returned with an hundred fold increase; and also with deeper and more peculiar knowledge, and came forth again in a fiery instigation or forcible driving. But my external man would write no more; it was somewhat discouraged and amorous, till it came to pass that the internal man did captivate and overpower the external; and even then the great mystery did appear, and then I understood God's counsel and cast myself upon His Will; also, I would not invent or feign anything out of reason; neither would I give way and place anything with reason, but resigned my will to God's Will, that so my reason might be as it were dead, that He (the Spirit of God) might do and work how He pleased."

"I say that I could not nor durst not write otherwise than the same was given and indited to me. I have continually wrote as the spirit did declare it, and did not give place to reason, or the wisdom of the natural and astral spirit. . . . Art hath not written here, neither was there any time to set it down punctually according to the right understanding of the letters, but all was ordered according to the direction of the spirit which often went in haste, so that the pen-man's hand did often shake; and though I could have written in a more accurate, fair, and plain manner, yet the reason was this, that the burning fire did often force forward with speed, and the hand and pen must hasten directly after it, for it cometh and goeth as a sudden shower, whatsoever it lighteth upon it hits. If it were possible to comprehend and write all it would then be three times more and deeper grounded."

"The very wise and skilful in arts will be offended at the plainness and simplicity of such a thing when he heareth one speak of such wonders and deep mysteries in such a mean and simple way, without scholastic pomp of words and artificial terms and phrases of logic and rhetoric: then he thinketh it is a rhapsody, on some confused heap of notions, patched logic, and enthusiastic phantasmic patch of whimsies, on a bundle of nonsense, for he understands not the gifts of God, and also is not able to see into the heart of another; therefore, I will disturb no man, advise none to trouble himself about it."

"Further, I give you to understand that in these writings the author wisheth sometimes to speak of himself and sometimes I: now understand by the word see the spirit, being spoken in the plural, in two persons; and in the word I the author understands himself."—J. Bohme's Third Epistle, pars. 3, 5, 7, 8, 11, 31, 35, and 39, dated 1620.

A "PHANTASM OF THE LIVING."

The following account relates to a "phantasm" of the writer, the Honourable Mrs. Pigott-Carleton, of Greywell Hill, Winchfield, Hants, seen by her father, the late Lord Dorchester. I had occasionally, and long ago, heard the incident referred to in the family, but it only occurred to me the other day to request Mrs. Carleton to write out an accurate account of it. This she has kindly done, and allows me to publish it, with names.

C. C. M.

"Early in September, 1872, I was with my father and husband at the former's shooting lodge in Co. Tyrone. An old friend, Captain M., was also staying there, and one afternoon it was arranged that I should accompany this gentleman and a keeper on a fishing expedition. My husband had some engagement, but my father walked a short way with us. He never cared to have me long away from him, and, upon turning back, remarked, as he left me, 'Don't get too far from home.'

"It was a brilliantly fine day; I had a book with me, and often sat down to read while the others fished. We were about four miles down the river, when, chancing to look up from my novel, I perceived a heavy cloud rising into sight above the mountains opposite. I saw we were 'in for' a drenching, thought how it would fidget my father, and wished myself at home with all my heart. In a few minutes the storm burst upon us. Shelter there was next to none, and as soon as the deluge had somewhat abated, we made for the lodge, looking as though we had all been barely rescued from a watery grave. When nearly home, we were met by my father, my husband, and several men employed about the place. It seemed to me singular, not to say absurd, that my father should have turned himself and party out in such weather, but when he began actually to scold me for my 'foolhardiness,' I grew quite indignant, and performed the rest of the unpleasant journey in dignified silence. Still more to my surprise, my father evidently could not get over his disturbance, spoke little that evening, and went off to bed earlier than usual. After he was gone, my husband (seeing that I too was rather 'upset') thought it well to explain matters. The next day I boldly entered upon the subject with my father, hoping free discussion might help to disperse his disquietude. He told me that some little time after his return from the river, he sat down to read, with his back to the (western) window; that suddenly a shadow fell across the page; that, turning his head, he saw me standing at the half-open window, my arms resting upon the push-down sash; that he said, 'Hallo! Back already!' that I made no reply, but apparently stepped down off the low outer window sill and disappeared; that he put a mark in his book, got up, and looked out of the window; that, not seeing me, he first went to the servants and asked if I had come in at the back door; and then went out on to the little terrace before the lodge and looked around for me; that he suddenly caught sight of the coming storm-cloud; that his bewilderment changed to uneasiness, and that my husband just then coming in they speedily started in search. This narrative certainly struck me as curious; but of course I treated it airily, and the matter soon dropped out of household discussion. My semblance never again appeared, nor did any disaster befall any of us. However, so deep was the impression left on the mind of my by no means imaginative father, that when in the following summer I was temporarily in delicate health, he often privately referred to 'what he saw at the window,' and told my husband 'he should be uncommonly thankful when "the year" was 'up.'"

HENRIETTA PIGOTT-CARLETON.

July 5th, 1883.

[The facts that the apparition cast a shadow, and that this was the first intimation of it, are very important, as guaranteeing its objectivity. There can be very little doubt, from the clue afforded by similar accounts, that the moment of the apparition was that in which Mrs. Carleton "wished herself at home with all her heart."—C. C. M.]

REMOVAL OF OFFICES.

In consequence of the property in which 4, New Bridge-street, was included, having changed hands, and the intention of the new proprietor to make structural alterations, we have been obliged to leave, and therefore have to announce for the information of friends and subscribers that our Temporary Offices are now at 38, Great Russell-street, W.C. (entrance in Woburn-street), to which address all communications should be sent until further notice.

THE IDENTITY OF MAN AND NATURE.

The perusal of Mr. Sinnett's "Esoteric Buddhism" sent me back to Schelling.* And it seems to me that so much of the doctrine now before us as concerns evolution in human consciousness,—so much of it, at least, as relates to the working of one and the same nature as physical and conscious forces—is none other than the so-called (and rightly called) Identity Philosophy of Schelling.

Now what, concisely, is this "Identity" Philosophy? I may be asked by some who are not already familiar with these speculations. Concisely and generally, I will try to answer the question in the following propositions:—

"The laws of nature are laws of the thinking process which are not reflected upon or cognised as such."

"The unreflected, unconscious action, as we may call it, of the vital or psychical power stands, so long as it is only this, and knows nothing of itself, upon the very same stage with the action of the so-called blind and outward forces of nature, and nothing constitutes the distinction between the conscious and unconscious activities but that want of reflection upon itself."

"A perfect demonstration of the intelligible world as present in the laws and forms of the sensible world, and again a perfect comprehension of these laws and forms by means of the intelligible world, a demonstration, consequently, of the identity of the worlds of nature and of thought—this is the business of the philosophy of nature to accomplish."

"All activities of nature are in themselves none other than activities regarded objectively by us as movements,

* Or rather to the excellent epitomised exposition of Schelling's philosophy contained in Chalybans' "Historical Survey of Speculative Philosophy from Kant to Hegel" (translated by Talk. Longmans: 1854), from which most of the quotations following are taken. I have, of course, also consulted Schwegler.

which activities we bring subjectively as mental activity within us to the state of self-consciousness."

"The highest goal and terminal point of this evolution is that where this, in the beginning blindly working life, attains in its fullest development to the consciousness of itself."

"In so far, now, as this original essence [activity] having become intelligible to itself in man, still recognises in the rest of nature also, or as it were in all its members, its own life and essence,—in a word, here contemplates as objective, what it perceives in a directly subjective manner in the human being—it follows that all knowledge has, so to speak, two poles, subject and object, knowing and known, and thus also there are, actually, but two fundamental sciences, or rather two modes of viewing one and the same life from two different points of view: first, the Philosophy of Mind, the self-consciousness of the subject—Transcendental Idealism; and secondly, the Philosophy of Nature, the being or life, objectively regarded from its real side, and its development, i.e., as natural life."

"This," says Schelling, "and nothing else, lies at the bottom of our endeavours to bring theory to bear upon the phenomena of nature. The highest perfection of the natural sciences would be the perfect spiritualisation of nature's laws into laws of intuition and of thought. The phenomena (the material) must, as regards ourselves, completely disappear, and the laws only, or the formal, be left remaining. Hence it follows that the more the regular or normal in nature comes into view, by so much the more does the veil or covering vanish, the phenomena themselves becoming more spiritual, and at length ceasing altogether. . . . The perfected theory of nature would be that by virtue of which the whole of nature might resolve itself into intelligence. . . . The highest goal, that of becoming wholly an object to herself, is first attained by nature through the highest and final stage, that of reflection, which is none other than man, or to speak more generally, is that which we call reason, through which nature first completely returns into herself, and whereby the fact becomes obvious, that nature is originally identical with that which in us is cognised as intelligent and conscious."

I hope next to show how the great primordial and persistent force, in its two aspects as expansive and contractive, male and female, spirit and matter, is conceived by Schelling.

MR. HUSK'S SEANCES.—We are requested to remind the members of the C. A. S. that subscription sances are held with this medium every Thursday evening at 8 p.m. at the rooms of the Association, 38, Great Russell-street. Tickets for admission, 2s. 6d. each, application for which should be made to Mr. T. Blyton, 6, Truro-villas, Station-road, Church End, Finchley, N., or at 38, Great Russell-street, W.C.

SPIRITUALISM IN ITALY.—Signor Sebastiano Fenzi, of Florence, in writing to the secretary of the C.A.S. says:—"In Italy our ideas are gradually spreading, but we, as yet, have few mediums. We have now founded a new Spiritual Association, in Florence, of which I have been elected vice-president. I have hope that we may possibly do good. In some of our papers Spiritualism is treated with ridicule, but we must have patience, feeling sure that a time will come when a change will take place in our favour."

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.—A general meeting of the members of this Society will be held on Wednesday next, July the 18th, at Willis's Rooms, King-street, St. James's-square, S.W. The president of the Society, Henry Sidgwick, Esq., will take the chair at 4 p.m. The meeting is open to members and associates. Members are at liberty to invite friends. Order of proceedings:—Address by the president; account of some experiments in Thought-transference; abstract of some recent French speculations on apparitions, &c., by Mr. C. C. Massey; selections from recent evidence on dreams, &c.—EDWARD T. BENNETT, Secretary.

An open meeting of the London Lodge of the British Theosophical Society will be held on Tuesday evening, July the 17th, at 9 p.m., at the Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, for the purpose of meeting Mr. Sinnett.

SPIRITUAL TEACHING IN THE PULPIT.

As an illustration of the very marked degree in which the teachings of Spiritualism are leavening the theology of the present day we cannot do better than quote a portion of a sermon recently preached by the Rev. H. F. Limpus, M.A., Vicar of St. Mary's, Twickenham. As Mr. Farmer points out in his "New Basis of Belief," "The heart and intellect of the Christian Church has unconsciously been educated and influenced by Spiritualism to an extent little dreamt of by those who have not read between the lines of the religious history of the past quarter of a century. Taking the pulpit utterances of thirty years since, and comparing them with those of the present, it will at once be seen how much the theology of to-day has been modified and softened down. . . . All these changes and modifications are in the very direction which Spiritualism has indicated from the first, and are fairly traceable to its influence." It will be noticed that Mr. Limpus in the course of his sermon brings out into striking relief many points peculiarly acceptable to Spiritualists.

"Young man, I say unto you arise."

Towards the end of his sermon the preacher said: "If we could examine into the minds of men and find out their opinions as to the state of the soul after death I think that we should find that the vast majority have a notion that when the body dies the soul departs, and exists in a kind of comatose state, in some region separate from this earth, and that there it will continue until the great Day of Judgment when it is to be reunited to the body which was buried. It appears to be taken for granted that apart from the body the soul can do nothing, that it must remain powerless, unconscious, incapable of thought, feeling, action; that before these powers can be restored to it the reunion with the body must take place, and then, after that, all will go on much the same as before. And the majority think thus because they are accustomed to argue from what they can see. And what is it that they see? They move about the world and they form intimacies and friendships and even closer ties with those whom they meet. They are accustomed to look upon that part of the man which is visible and tangible and to consider what they can see as their friend. But that which can be seen is merely the body, the tenement, the house in which the friend lives. They see this same body attacked with disease, they see its power begin to fail, they see it grow weaker day by day, until at last it lies motionless, still and cold, in death. The hand no longer returns their pressure. The eye no longer returns the glance, nor the voice the greeting, and they say: 'He is dead.' Yes. His body is dead, because he is gone out of it. The tenement is vacant. He has left his house in which he lived here on earth. He has gone unto the world of spirits. But we know that 'there is a natural body and there is a spiritual body'; and from Holy Scripture we learn that the latter resembles the former, and that it has, indeed, far greater powers. For, with regard to recognition, we read that the rich man of whom our Lord spake, recognised Lazarus; and further, that he also recognised Abraham, although he had not seen him in the flesh. We know also that in the Mount of Transfiguration the spiritual bodies of Moses and Elias were recognised by St. Peter. Now the natural bodies of all these, with the exception of Elijah, had been left in the grave; and we cannot doubt that the body of Elijah had undergone some marvellous transformation before he was admitted into the spirit-world—that it was, as St. Paul says, 'changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye; as will be all those who shall be alive upon the earth at the last day.' For the trumpet shall sound and we shall be changed, incorruptible. For this corruption must put on incorruption and this mortal must put on immortality. Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written: 'Death is swallowed up in victory.' What, then, we may ask, can we gather as to the state of this young man while sojourning in the world of spirits? We may conclude that it was not a state of repose, or lethargy, or sleep, or forgetfulness. For we are reminded that when the body of our Lord was buried His spirit went and preached to the spirits in Paradise.

* The Psychological Press Association, 38, Great Russell-street.

"There was activity, work done. We know that Dives wished Lazarus to return to the earth and preach to his brethren in order to proclaim to them the existence of the spirit-world, and to warn them that their position in that world would be governed by the life of probation lived in the body during the earthly life.

"We have Moses and Elijah represented not in a state of repose, or forgetfulness, or sleep, but as coming to our blessed Lord, and actually talking with Him on the Mount of Transfiguration.

"From what has been revealed to us we may be sure that immediately on entering the spirit-world, the spirit gravitates into the position which it has made for itself during its earthly life in the body; and that whatever the flame may mean, and whatever the cup of cold water may mean of which Dives made mention, and whatever the 'good things' may mean of which Abraham spoke, they mean something which is very real, namely, a state of happiness and a state of unhappiness.

"So much is actually revealed to us by our blessed Lord Himself in the parable of Dives and Lazarus, and if it is argued that it is only a parable, and that, therefore, we can draw no conclusions from it, I think we may reply: 'True, it is a parable, but we cannot admit that our Lord would ever have made use of that which is impossible or untrue in order to teach us the truth concerning the most vital and important subject which it behoves us as human beings to know.'

"Again we may ask further, since the state of the soul in the spirit-world, or Paradise, is not one of repose, or forgetfulness, or sleep, how does it seem to us, from analogy, and from the nature of things, that it is employed? In order to get an answer to this question we will ask another, namely, Why did God create the human soul at all? And the only answer is, 'For the same reason that He created all things. For His glory all things are, and were created.'

"Now, if you take the life of the best and most spiritually minded man or woman on earth, what do you find is the great object of that life, the mainspring of all their actions, the constraining motive by which they are governed? The great object is the Glory of God. Did not our Lord teach us that this must be so. 'Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in Heaven.' Thus we see that God is to be glorified by the good works of His servants.

"So then work for God is the very reason of the creation and existence of the human soul. And shall we say that this work is to be carried on for 20, 40, or 70 years, while the soul is clogged and bound to earth and weighed down by the body, and that such work is to cease and to be laid aside at the very moment when it is released from the weight and the hindrance which kept it from doing as much as otherwise it might have done?

"Shall we think that it is to work for God's glory for the short span of time during which it is allowed to dwell in the earthly body, and that it is to cease working for God's glory during the ages that may elapse between its severance from the body and the last great Day of Judgment?

"No. Analogy and the nature of things, yea, and revelation itself teach us that all God's servants will work in the spirit-world as they have worked here, only with probably greater power, greater freedom, and greater light to guide them.

"What a vision, then, was vouchsafed to the soul of the son of the widow of Nain in the spirit-world!

"There would he meet with and recognise all those whom he had known upon earth, but who had preceded him to the spirit-world. There would he see each separate soul occupying that position for which it had prepared itself during its earthly life. There would he learn the truth that the human soul itself is God's Book upon which the man himself writes his own doom; that the man makes himself of a certain character, and that very character determines the position which the soul occupies on its entrance into the spirit-world; that the soul gravitates as it were by a natural law to its own place. There would he learn the truth about the 'great gulf' of which Abraham spoke, and he would see that it was fixed by Dives himself—fixed by his own utter selfishness and the misuse he made of the 'good things' which had been his portion during his earthly life. And might he probably learn that the flame which was tormenting Dives was the consciousness that he had dug that very gulf himself, and that even if he should be allowed to go onward and upward towards perfection, there would be ever present to his mind the reflection that if he should go on for ever he could never reach the state he might have reached if he had used his time of probation as he ought to have done!

"And there too in that spirit-land he would see those bright and glorious souls enjoying the reward which is prepared for all those who love God and do His work here on earth.

"In all their radiant beauty he would see them, and he would learn that purity, and goodness, and truth light up the spiritual body, and proclaim their preserver just as truly and as unmistakably as did selfishness, and vice, and cruelty on the countenance of the earthly body.

"But with what emotions of awe, and wonder, and amazement must he have heard the voice of Jesus calling him back from the bright and glorious spirit-land into this earthly life again!

"I might speak to you if time permitted of the joy of that widow mother, of the wonder of the bystanders, of the amazement of the disciples, at the effect of the calm, majestic voice of the Lord of Life, but I will only direct your attention to what at this distance of time, that young man is saying to each one of you.

"Listen! He is saying to some of you, 'Arise from thy dream of worldliness! Arise from thy career of selfishness! Know that even now thou art shaping thine eternal destiny, that in the spirit-world thou wilt be what thou hast made thyself here.' Listen to the words of our common Lord and Master, 'Arise while there is yet time, and work for God, and goodness. Pray for help to Him who never yet failed to answer real and earnest prayer. And even yet by Christ's mercy and through His all prevailing merits thou mayest attain unto life eternal! Arise!'

"And what is he saying to others of you? Arise from all your anxieties and your depression! You are looking too much on the clouds which shadow your life, you are looking too much to the past and thinking too much of the difficulties and the trials of your life. Look upward and onward, and never forget that there is One to whom you may take all your troubles and your trials; One who will never leave you nor forsake you. Only be strong and of a good courage. Arise, 'Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in Heaven!'

"And you, Christian, has He no message for you? Yes, indeed; to you He says, 'Bravely and well hast thou fought the good fight; earnestly and patiently hast thou contended for the right. Go on in the path that leadeth to life eternal, for he that endureth to the end the same shall be saved.'"

SLATE-WRITING IN MICHIGAN, U.S.A.—The Citizen, published in Battle Creek, Mich., reports an interview with Mr. W. A. Mansfield, a medium for the production of the independent slate-writing phenomena, with satisfactory results. Two new slates were purchased by the representative of that paper and fastened together with staple screws. They were held by him in his left hand at arm's length while his right hand was joined to the left of the medium, who was at least six feet from the slates. The muffled sound of writing was plainly heard and attrition as plainly felt, yet no pencil was between the slates. The slates were then taken apart, and on one of them was found these words: "I can write now.—Harriet." Following this was something written in another hand which could not be deciphered. Harriet was the name of a deceased sister of the reporter. The sun was shining, and a full blaze of light poured into the room through two uncurtained windows at the time this was done. The account closes by saying: "These are the facts; with theories the Citizen has nothing to do. Each reader can form his or her own conclusions."

HINTS TO INVESTIGATORS.—There are two kinds of investigators into the alleged phenomena of spirit-communication with whom the writer has little or no sympathy. First, the man who swallows everything in regard to it, be it goat or camel, which any zealous, and perhaps interested, believer may set before him; and, second, the man who fancies he knows everything, and refuses to believe in the possibility of spirit intercourse, no matter what amount of reliable evidence of this fact may be brought before his notice. Between these two a very large class of persons exist, every member of which is anxious to know the truth in regard to this most important question, and if all such will only keep their judgment well in hand, and carefully note everything that comes under their notice with due discrimination, and the use of that common sense which they bring to bear upon the every-day events of life, they will soon find that spirit-communication is as true as that the sun shines above our heads at noon-day. The great mistake so many investigators make is in refusing to collect the gold because of the dross which accompanies it, but the man who acted thus in the ordinary affairs of life would show but scant wisdom or even ordinary intelligence. The best of all modes is to pursue your investigations at home.—Spirit Telephone.

SOME APHORISMS FROM THE SPIRITUAL PHILOSOPHY OF THEOPHRASTUS PARASELSUS.

Man the Centre of His Own World.

"The whole world surrounds man, and is surrounded as a point is surrounded as by a circle. Thus it follows that all things have their impulse in themselves; even as a pippin lies in an apple, and is sustained by the apple, and from it is derived its nourishment."

The Font of Inspiration.

"The body comes from the elements, the spirit from the stars. All that the brain produces takes its inspiration from the stars. Although all musicians should die, yet the same schoolmaster, Heaven, is not dead, which would become a teacher anew. Many stars have not yet had their influence; therefore the discovery of arts is not yet come to an end. Man eats and drinks of the elements, for the sustenance of his blood and flesh; from the stars are the intellect and thoughts sustained in his spirit."

The Astral Realm.

"Time is the life of the stars; the circling and working together of them. Not alone through the sun does the earth measure out its time. All that returns in circulating time to the earth, to animals and to man, acknowledges the lordship of the stars. The particular life of earth must accord with the general life of higher worlds, for God in love has created for us the sidereal body, and has given it sensibility, that we may feel and reveal the secrets of the stars."

The Wonder-Working Faith.

"The human spirit is so great a thing that no man can express it: as God Himself is eternal and unchangeable, so also is the mind of man. If we rightly understood the mind of man nothing would be impossible to us on earth. The imagination is invigorated and perfected through faith, for it really happens that every doubt breaks the operation. Faith must confirm the imagination, for faith establishes the will. Because men do not perfectly imagine and believe, the result is that the arts are uncertain; while they might be perfectly certain."

Power of the Human Spirit.

"It is possible that my spirit without the help of the body and through a fiery will alone, and without a sword, can stab and wound others. You are to know that the exertion of the will is a great point in the art of medicine. Man can hang disease on man and beast through curses; but it does not take effect by means of the strength of character, virgin wax or the like: the imagination alone is the means of fulfilling the intention. Every imagination of man comes from the heart, for this is the sun of the microcosm; and out of the microcosm proceeds the imagination into the great world. Thus the imagination of man is a seed which is material. Determined imagination is a beginning of all magical operations. Fixed thought is also a means to an end. The magical is a great concealed wisdom, and reason is a great public foolishness."

The Triune Influences.

"Three spirits live in and actuate man; three worlds cast their beams upon him; but all three only as the image and echo of love, and the same all-constructing and thinking principle of production. The first is the spirit of the elements; the second, the spirit of the stars; the third is the Divine spirit."

Dreams.

"In dreams a man is like the plants, which have also the elementary and vital body—but possess not the spirit. In sleep, the astral-body is in freer motion; then it soars to its parents; it holds converse with the stars. After death also it returns to the stars, and the earthly body descends then into the bosom of the earth. Dreams, forebodings, prognostications, and presentiments, are the gifts of the sidereal, and are not imparted to the elementary body."

Wisdom latent in all Beings.

"Wisdom is also in fools, and breaks forth like a light through horn, dim and murky, or like light through a fog."

Buddhism and Christianity,

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you permit me just a few words in reply to "W. F. B." in this week's "LIGHT"? "Mongol Buddhism and holiness have long ago parted company, and it seems impossible for men and women living in scenes of unblushing evil, to be at the same time experiencing in their souls the effectual consolation of their religion." This seems to be the pith and substance of "W. F. B.'s" complaint against Buddhism. Now, as a Christian clergyman of twenty-five years' experience in England and Ireland, I am grieved to have to say it, but the truth must be said—I might sit down, and with greatest truth, write the very same words with respect to the working of Christianity in England. Let any one walk through Regent-street and Hyde Park, or Pentonville, or Pimlico, or in fact any part of our great Christian Metropolis, not at nightfall only, but in the broad open day, and if he does not walk with his eyes shut, will not his experience be the same?—"Men and women living amid scenes of unblushing evil;" but, over and above this, let him observe quietly the vast amount of hidden vice and corruption which is now and then exposed just for a moment, to view in the courts of justice and in the public prints—that suppressed evil which revels in secrecy and eats into the heart of society—and what then shall he say? Will he not have a just reason for expecting that the superior system of religion and philosophy given by Buddha will rise in the West only to "brighten" the hopes of humanity? And this suggests a question which I would fain see answered satisfactorily. In the diseased human body, do we not regard that condition as most favourable where the evil which is in the body is brought to the surface? Can the same analogy be applied to the social body? And is not a state wherein evil appears unblushingly, preferable to that wherein it eats silently and secretly, undermining the entire system? In the human body such evils brought to the surface soon disappear. In the body social will these evils sooner disappear by being permitted to manifest openly, instead of eating their way secretly, which seems the more general method? I only make these suggestions, and ask for light.—Yours,

IOTA.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I must trouble you with some few observations on the letter of my friend Mrs. Penny in "LIGHT" this week. Mrs. Penny complains of me that I fall into the same error in judging of Christianity by its exoteric aspects as I comment on in those who thus misinterpret Buddhism. But that is not quite the case. The misinterpretation of Buddhism by European scholars does not arise at all from its popular doctrines—which are easily intelligible—but from inability to comprehend its metaphysics. And, on the other hand, I do not at all judge exoterically by exoteric Christianity, but confine myself to a comparison between exoteric Buddhism and exoteric Christianity.

I quite agree with Mrs. Penny in her idea of religion. Did I not, indeed, say that the external relation with God—or, what comes to the same thing, the external God—cannot satisfy it? But the recognition of superior powers does respond to the early conditions and requirements of the religious consciousness, and in this respect Buddhism is on a par with Christianity. In what sense the higher Buddhism can be said to be "atheistic" depends, of course, on what we mean by Atheism. Probably in no other sense than that in which the higher Christianity—which does not concern itself with theories of creation, &c., but looks rather to the realisation of the Divine in consciousness—might be pronounced atheistic by those who can only conceive the external relation.

I fear Mrs. Penny has not perceived my drift, if she thinks it relevant to vindicate the teaching of Christ Himself from responsibility for the perversions it has undergone. What I say is that the perversions have become enshrined in the creeds and articles, the ministerial teaching and popular belief, which represent, and must be accepted as expounding, the world's Christianity. Take, for instance, the 2nd Article of our own Church of England—the concluding sentence—"Who truly suffered, was crucified, dead, and buried, to reconcile His Father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for actual sins of men." So in the 31st Article: "Of the one oblation of Christ finished upon the Cross." "The offering of Christ once made is that perfect propitiation, redemption and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world both original and actual, and there is none other satisfaction for sin but that alone."

To know what Christianity is as a religion of the world, I must take what Christians and Christian Churches believe; the question is not at all what, in the judgment of Jacob Bohme or of someone else, they ought to believe. I myself should greatly prefer Mrs. Penny as my religious teacher to the Archbishop of Canterbury (in his ecclesiastical capacity); but the latter is a representative of that power in the world which we call Christianity, and the former is not.

Now popular Buddhism does not pretend to carry men up to Arhatship (which corresponds, I conceive, to the Christian Regeneration); but it does not delude them as to the conditions of future spiritual and temporal well-being. Says Dr. Rhys Davids, "They" (the pre-Buddhistic populace) "preferred to look for a better world beyond, which the ritualisms would ensure to them, and to which the theologies would guide them. Now, early Buddhism had its answer also to them, and it was this: Very good; you want to go to Heaven. It is really a mistake. Arhatship is better than Heaven, and the Arhats are above all gods. But still, if you cannot comprehend that, then at least understand that the only way to Heaven is—not ritual, but righteousness."—Hibbert Lecture, 1881, p. 104.

Righteousness with such a motive is, of course, only an enlightened self-interest; but what better can be said of any popular religious inducements?

And in my view one of the chief advantages of popular Buddhism over popular Christianity is that the former gives a definite and rational conception—in the doctrine of Karma as understood by Buddhists themselves—of the future life or lives of the unregenerate man, while Christianity has really nothing to say on the subject, if we put aside what is either shocking or absurd.

C. C. M.

P.S.—I referred to myself in my letter last week as a "Buddhist." Allow me now to make the correction, "student of Buddhism."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Pray admit the shortest answer possible to "C. C. M.'s" impressive "Why not"? Because the doctrine of salvation by Jesus Christ is a paradox, resting on seeming contradictions; and to impugn one part of a paradoxical truth is to make a falsity of the other. His sacrifice was vicarious; a life and death in the flesh to save us from sin; but unless we too sacrifice self, He cannot get a life in us, and enable us to "work out our own salvation"; nor until then can we be freed from sin. Now in a country where people feed too well to be very patient of complex ideas, it is certain that they will fix their faith upon the most intelligible aspects of Redemption. The idea of a ransom paid could be understood in any age: the idea of a higher spirit co-acting with the freewill of another—potentially in the whole human race, and exceptionally in those who consciously surrender themselves to its influence—is most difficult to seize even now. If the clergy attempt to make a channel for such supersensuous conceptions in the national mind, I believe they must draw upon mysteries for the where-withal. But our clergy are under authority, which always frowns upon mysticism; and justly, for it is a disintegrant of form.

Catholicism and Spiritualism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—"Once on a time" a good deal of ill-feeling was excited between two opposing lawyers in an American court. One of them wrote "rascal" in the other's hat. The owner of the hat claimed the protection of the court, saying to the judge, "Brother — has written his name in my hat, and I suspect he means to make off with it."

Mr. Peter Lee reminds me of the lawyer who wrote the offensive epithet in the hat. He spells my name wrong, but that is not a sin. I claim protection of the court, for though a Roman Catholic, I am a harmless person, free to accept "truth wherever found, on Christian or on heathen ground," and I feel more pity than contempt for a man who says he was born hating those of whom, I presume, he knows as little as of your humble servant.

Healthful Positions in Sleep.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I had many years ago read Baron von Reichenbach's "Researches on Magnetism," wherein it is laid down that the proper and most healthful position for all to sleep or rest is with head to the north, and the only other at all allowable being head to east; and this is confirmed by many experiments made with healthy as well as sickly sensitives. The Baron also finds that the transverse axis in man is of far greater importance than the longitudinal, and that the right hand should, being negative, always be to the west, which is positive, and the left, being positive, to the east, which is negative. Now in the Theosophist for May last, I read, from the pen of Leeta Nath Ghose, an able and experienced electrician and mesmerist, that the true and proper position for all who desire good health, sick and whole, is with head to south, and never to the north, which brings on disease and death, and that the only other position which can be used for health is with head to east. Such decisions, so diametrically opposed, surely call for investigation, and if possible, reconciliation; and the knowledge of what is the true position for health is most important to all who desire health. As a possible help towards the solution of this difficulty, I could point out that the position of the sleeper, whether on his face or on his stomach, has been entirely omitted in these experiments and statements. Which is the true position for man naturally to repose in, lying on his back, or lying on his stomach, in common with most other animals?

Now, by the diagram following, which will be very useful in illustrating this question to the reader, it will be seen there are four directions for the sleeper in each of the two positions (for the experiments relating to the transverse axis of the human magnet imply one or other of these positions).

POSITION I. LYING ON THE BACK.

- |                  |   |
|------------------|---|
| A. Head to east  | Accord in all.                            |
| B. Head to north | { Discord—head and feet.Accord—hands. |
| C. Head to south | { Accord—head and feet.Discord—hands. |
| D. Head to west  | Discord in all.                           |

POSITION II. LYING ON STOMACH.

- |                   |   |
|-------------------|---|
| A'. Head to east  | { Accord—head and feet.Discord—hands. |
| B'. Head to north | Discord in all.                           |
| C'. Head to south | Accord in all.                            |
| D'. Head to west  | { Discord—head and feet.Accord—hands. |

It follows from the above there are but two positions and one direction in each position in which man can lie in polar accord in both axes.

1. On his back, head to east. A.
2. On his stomach, head to south. C'.

I have observed in southern climates that the natives who sleep out of doors always sleep lying on the stomach. I believe most animals do the same.

Which, then, is the right position, the natural position for health, and which is the right direction in that position?

For sensitives and for adepts of course these may vary.—

Yours truly,

I. O.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.
CAVENISH ROOMS, 51 AND 53, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

An interesting experiment, not uncommon elsewhere, but the first of its kind in connection with the public services of this Association, was carried to a successful issue on Sunday last at these rooms. In the presence of an interested and appreciative audience, the controls of Mr. Morse delivered a sustained address upon a topic chosen by the audience.

The selection, from a number of written suggestions, made by open vote of the meeting in the absence of the medium, was, "Inspiration: Ancient and Modern," and the consequent impromptu was very effective; fluent and eloquent, instructive and suggestive.

The Council of the Lyceum will publish a verbatim transcript of the shorthand writer's notes of this address, and introduce, as an appendix, a similar report of the proceedings of the last ballot, or question and answer night.

In the meantime it may be briefly stated that the leading ideas submitted on this occasion were that while the Deity, the admitted source of thought and consciousness, has never, in any fair sense of the word, directly inspired any man, the operation has occurred mediately in all ages of the world, and is continued now; that all the great religious systems of the past have been due to such intervention, and all religious chieftains the special subjects of such influence; and that the common characteristic of such efforts, as affecting persons or developed into systems, is always to advance the thought, and hence to amend the lives of mankind at large. It is, nevertheless, a pernicious error, enslaving the mind, to regard such revelations as of Divine authority. As a matter of fact we all possess the faculty of subjection to the influence of inspiration. It is more or less active in proportion to our other personal qualities—to our receptivity especially—and may be defined simply as the inherent power of transfer of sentiment, thought, and desire, from one mind to another, upon the same broad and general principle as the brain-wave process referred to on Sunday last. There is, therefore, nothing miraculous about it, and we were earnestly recommended to get rid of the idea of miracles as involving mystery, and if mystery, error. The Spiritualist says that he knows what inspiration means, and he speaks truly. He may be unable to speak scientifically upon its methods of operation or application, but he has witnessed its evident effects too frequently to question its power. He has seen men, women, and little children of feeble intellectual resources, under its clear influence, preaching with such fervour, skill, knowledge, and eloquence that, like a certain tempestuous reformer of old, he could not say whether he himself was in the body or out of the body.

And he has discovered practically the further great truth that the need of a life is the measure of its inspiration. Such inspiration is truly instinct with the Spirit of God, and the issue shall presently be that an accepted spiritual force shall bind the worlds together in undying harmony.

Due announcement will be promptly made of the publication of this address. An expression of the cordial thanks of the meeting was respectfully tendered to the controls, and most amiably acknowledged.

It was then stated that Mr. Bengough will, on Sunday, the 15th inst., deliver a lecture, entitled "Spiritual Lessons from the Oldest Indian Scriptures." There should be a very large gathering of friends to welcome this well-known and able exponent of the spiritual philosophy. Thereupon the attention of the audience was directed to some crayon drawings of spirit forms and small to some oil paintings, alike illustrative of the qualities and capacity of spirit-life; and a most interesting evening was concluded by a solo from Mrs. Williams—"The Lord is mindful of His own," which was much appreciated.—S.B.

The Spirit Telephone of Baltimore in the course of an article in defence of astrology, says:—"Amongst the many wonderful instances of the truth of this science may be mentioned the following:—In 1651, William Lilly, the astrologer, who received from the Council of State, as he terms it, a pension of £100 per annum, published a prediction that London would be devastated by the plague in 1665, and be destroyed by fire in 1666, which took place at the dates mentioned, as nearly everybody knows. In 1853 Raphael's Almanac for that date contained the following prediction respecting the Emperor Napoleon III.: "Let him not dream of lasting honours, powers, or prosperity. He shall found no dynasty; he shall wear no durable crown. But in the midst of deeds of blood and slaughter, with affrighted Europe trembling beneath the weight of his daring, martial hosts, he descends beneath the heavy hand of fate and falls to rise no more, with none to mourn him, none to inherit his renown, none to record his good deeds, and none to lament his destruction." In 1870 he surrendered, together with 150,000 of his soldiers, on the field of battle to the Emperor of Germany, of which the writer Archibald Forbes, who was a witness thereto, speaks as follows:—"He, the Emperor of the French, the proudest monarch in Europe, kicking his heels on the roadside by a weaver's cottage, while a Prussian count galloped to a Prussian king for instructions as to what should be done with him."

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

Knowledge of July 6th, reproduces almost in extenso the article of the Spectator on Thought-reading, and founds on it some "editorial gossip" of a not particularly edifying character. The gist of what Mr. Proctor has to say is similar to the contention of the Rev. H. H. Higgins in the Journal of Science, which I noticed last week. The phenomena under observation he believes to be akin to those called mesmeric. "There is nothing supernatural about them, though much that is mysterious, in the same sense that (for example) gravity is mysterious (but in infinitely less degree)." We are favoured with some unimpressive details of Mr. Proctor's own experience with Zamoiski, whom I remember at Oxford as a powerful mesmeriser. He used to exhibit his powers at the Universities—Mr. Proctor saw him at Cambridge—and was popular with the undergraduates. I do not sufficiently remember his performances to criticise them at this distance of time. But he did nothing, I believe, more curious than I have since seen, and nothing that was so antecedently impossible as necessarily to be relegated to the domain of trickery.

Mr. Proctor thinks otherwise. He says:—

"A man named Zamoiski came to Cambridge, who professed to possess marvellous mesmeric powers. He really had a very fair amount of that particular mind-influencing power which we may conveniently call mesmerism (as a name not suggesting any theory as to the nature of the power). But he promised all manner of performances, far outside of anything he or any man could do without the aid of confederates. He appeared on the platform, went through a number of performances, some interesting and curious, but by no means marvellous, on college men of various standing, others which would have been marvellous indeed if they had been genuine. But they were performed on certain boys who were no doubt paid for their parts in the display."

That "no doubt" is exquisite. We get there the truly scientific attitude. Yet Mr. Proctor can write thus:—

"One cannot but be amused at the tone of jeering superiority with which the psychical problems involved in such questions as thought-reading and thought-finding are dismissed by folk who are only not stupidly credulous because they are stupidly incredulous. With such persons there is no middle path; they either refuse to consider evidence at all, or they swallow everything they are told. In either case it is the same defect in the unscientific mind which does the mischief. A man of this class believes or disbelieves—he does not inquire. Take such a subject as mesmerism, for example:—"Mesmerism! my good sir," he will say; "mesmerism is utter humbug; nothing in it but lies and trickery;" or, it may be (just according to the way in which he has taken up the matter), he will talk equal nonsense on the other side, and tell you that mesmerism is the most marvellous power in existence."

The truth is—and it is amusing that Mr. Proctor does not know in what a glass house he lives while he is pelting his scientific and unscientific friends,—the truth is that, to assent to the truth and reality of some of Zamoiski's experiments on the ground that he, Mr. Proctor, can square them with his preconceived ideas of what may and may not be, the while he rejects others a priori as "no doubt" tricks, because he could not understand the principle, is utterly unscientific and absurd. And this is no less true because Mr. Proctor thinks he "had begun, even at that time, to have scientific tastes," and has since devoted long years and abundant energy to writing about science in various ways, and on many aspects of it. Nor is it less curious because Mr. Proctor can write thus: "Of Mr. Bishop, personally, I may say, vidi tantum . . . but, the cool assumption that because the power claimed by Mr. Bishop is beyond their slow minds, dullards are free to treat him as if he were a proved swindler, would be discreditable to them in the extreme, if it were not that, presumably, they know no better." This is delicious!

Colonel Olcott is pursuing his beneficent course of healing disease. The Theosophist of June contains a letter, signed by a native medical practitioner, and dated from Bhaugulpore, which attests the reality of ten cures effected in one day in his presence and that of other observers. Some of them are not of the kind that I have always sought for as good evidence, though they are, doubtless, real enough and beneficent enough to the patients who were cured. But two are important and striking. In the first a native auctioneer was cured of deafness. "This," says the medical recorder, "was a most surprising case; within a few minutes the patient was made to hear words spoken in an ordinary tone at a distance of eighteen feet, though a few minutes before he could not hear at the shortest distance without an elevation of the speaker's voice."

The other case is that of the "medical practitioner" himself. He thus details his cure of blindness in the left eye:—

"My closest friends could not have suspected this infirmity, for there was no apparent difference between the two eyes, yet from boyhood one of them has been useless to me. The disease was Hypermetropia, and Drs. Cayley and Macnamara, the famous oculists of Calcutta, were of opinion, after examination, that it was congenital and certainly incurable. But to-day, after a few minutes of simple mesmeric treatment—by breathings through a small silver tube, Colonel Olcott has restored my sight. He has made me close the right eye, and with my hitherto useless left one, read ordinary print! My feelings may be better imagined than described.—LADLI MOHUN GHOSH, Medical Practitioner."

These cures Colonel Olcott claims to effect by the healing virtue that is in him. This power he ascribes to the effect of a pure and simple life which he has led ever since he began to work for those who impelled him to found the Theosophical Society, and whom we are to identify with the Mahatmas, the Brothers of Tibet, of whom Mr. Sinnett has lately given us some glimpses. If this be so, we have come at last to the answer to the question, cui bono? No one can read Mr. Sinnett's "Esoteric Buddhism" without intellectual satisfaction. No one can doubt that Colonel Olcott's work, under the direction of these mysterious beings, is one that Christian and Buddhist alike must recognise as one of pure beneficence.

The activity and energy displayed by Colonel Olcott are phenomenal. Niveran Babu, who, at his own cost and without the smallest remuneration, devoted three months to acting as private secretary to the President on his late tour, has compiled some statistics which are very impressive. It seems that between February 23rd and May 19th of this year, 2,812 patients "of both sexes, all ages, conditions of social life, and sects," were "successfully treated" in twenty different places. As two or three days only were spent in a place, the patients flocked in from the surrounding country, and were soon again dispersed. It is, therefore, impossible to tell what proportion of these cases were actually cured. But if pain were even temporarily alleviated, that is much, even if the patient's imagination largely helped his belief. Those who deal with human ailments know well that their science is often powerless in presence of what they cannot refer to definite causes, but which they label hysteria, or some such term that explains nothing. So what the cures were none can tell, but Niveran Babu, who had three months' opportunity of judging, bears warm testimony to the remarkable success of Colonel Olcott's work.

The concluding portion of this testimony—never written in the language of enthusiastic exaggeration, but calm, logical, and clear—is of a nature that may excuse quotation. It is well that we should know what powers we have in us, so that we may learn to use them.

"Not the least striking, and, from the scientific point of view, important features of these cures is the fact that on the tour Colonel Olcott has eaten nothing but vegetable food, and of that what we Hindus would call a very small quantity. His usual daily allowance (for three meals—at 7 a.m., noon, and 6 p.m.) has been 6 to 8 potatoes, 8oz. green vegetables, 2oz. macaroni, 1oz. vermicelli, 6 slices bread and butter, and 3 cups tea or coffee. He never touches beer, wine, or spirits in any form. He retired ordinarily at 11 or midnight, and rose at about 6 a.m.; did not sleep in the day time; and always had a cold bath in the Hindu fashion [pouring water from a pot over the body.—Ed.] Never in tubs. Our tour—that is, not counting the Colonel's voyage to and fro by sea between Madras and Calcutta, 2,000 miles—was something over 2,000 miles, and was made by rail, steamboat, budge-row (canal-boat), horse-garry, elephants, horses, palankin, &c., and was completed in 57 days; the travel being sometimes by night, sometimes by day, and the average stop at each place two clear days besides fractions. The President delivered 27 lectures, organised 12 new branches of the Theosophical Society, visited 13 old ones, and held daily discussions on philosophy and science with hundreds of the ablest men in Bengal and Behar. Add to this that he is 51 years of age and throughout has enjoyed robust health, and our countrymen as well as Europeans can have some idea of the activity and endurance of a temperate white man even in our tropical climate, in the hottest season of the year."

I have said that these cures are wrought by the inherent power of the healer without external aid. This, however, requires modification. Niveran Babu, speaking of the immense amount of work done in the hottest season of the year, adds:—

"One would have to go, like myself, with the Colonel day by day and from place to place, to realise the marvellous exhibition he has made of reserved psychic power. As you know, he has always said that his own vital strength, overtaxed as it is constantly by his current official work, would not stand such a drain without help, and that he has been constantly helped by his Guru, with whose permission he began the work. It will please all true Theosophists to learn that Colonel Olcott's Parmaguru [Teacher's Teacher.—Ed.] was actually seen twice clairvoyantly within one week by one of the blind patients, the latter gentleman giving so accurate a description of this exalted personage—about whom he had never previously even heard one word from anybody—that He was instantly recognisable."

It would seem, therefore, that as the Spiritualist believes that he has behind him his unembodied "guide, philosopher, and friend," whose aid he cannot measure, and whose power he cannot limit, so the Theosophist has what is much the same, save that the Guru is a Teacher yet embodied, but of extreme psychic power developed to the nth.

A PRIVATE SEANCE WITH MR. HUSK.

I wish to record a remarkable series of phenomena which took place under test conditions—i.e. all hands, including those of the medium, being locked together during the phenomena, which occurred in the dark. The medium was Mr. Husk, who sat with the circle, and besides him there were ten present, including my wife and myself.

Two minutes after the light was put out the fairy bells were touched by spirit-hands, places arranged by responses from them, and one of the company offered a short prayer. The fairy bells were then taken up and carried all over the room, playing most beautifully. On coming again upon the table in front of me, still playing, I was stroked by a small spirit-hand repeatedly. Then my coat-sleeve was pulled persistently, until I was impressed that I was to sing, which I did, the instrument accompanying me through a song perfectly. Another spirit then played on the piano, which had been left open outside the circle in one corner of the room, against which some of the chair-backs rested. The two instruments were played together, the piano by a master hand. We had a good deal of music between the two instruments—sometimes the fairy bells being placed on the top of the heads of various sitters whilst playing. It is impossible to describe the beauty of tone, soft and loud, alternately, which the spirit flashed from the strings. Mr. Husk is himself a musical man, but both his hands were held all the time. Soon after there were five or six spirits in the room at one time—talking to various members of the circle. One mischievous little child-spirit came to me, took everything out of my side coat pocket, including spectacle-case, which I begged her not to break. Immediately she opened the case, and her little hands—warm and pleasant to the touch—put the spectacles on my face: not enough, she took out my eye-glasses and fixed them on my nose in front of the spectacles! At my request she took them off and placed the spectacles in my hand, which she then patted playfully. She next amused herself by bringing me various things—a brooch, a collar, &c., from other sitters.

Next the spirit of John King materialised, and shewed himself by means of the luminous slate. He took great pains to go to each one of the circle. On coming to me he said in his loud bass voice, "Can you see me?" and adjusting the slate over his head, and under it, and sideways, I saw his features completely and distinctly. He then took my hand (linked as it was to the lady next me), and lifted it high up, saying "Rise," when he lifted me on tip-toe. This he did also to my wife; but, in her case, taking her hand away from the next one, remarking, "He would keep the circle intact!" He shook hands also with each in the circle. When he had taken great pains to shew himself to all, he said: "I am now going through the table; watch me." Down went his form, which was materialised only to the bust, through the table, leaving the slate on the top whence he disappeared. He still remained for some time longer. Soon after the spirit called "Irresistible" found a glass jug with water in it, and a tumbler on the mantel-piece, when he asked if anyone would like some water.

My wife said she should, if only for the sake of taking it from him; and the gentleman next to me said, "I should very much." The spirit brought the jug and tumbler in front of us, poured out a glassful of water, holding the jug and glass above the table, and gave it to the lips of each, one after another, and most drank thus. There was no hesitation even in the total darkness in coming direct to the mouth, and I felt his hand against my forehead as he lifted and emptied the glass completely. This was a very beautiful test in many ways.

Soon we heard a fine bass voice, intoning in a foreign language, which was, it appeared, the spirit of a Greek priest who often comes towards the end of a seance to close with a Greek prayer.

Soon after the spirit of "Irresistible" went to the piano, and, after playing the introduction to Calcott's "Last Man," touched Mr. Husk on the head (so he said) when Mr. Husk sang the song in a fine bass voice—the voice being different from any which had been speaking, though not altogether unlike John King's.

During these two hours then we had had seven spirits speaking and materialising (for two or three I have not referred to); we had been fanned by the invisibles when the heat was oppressive, and scents had been put to our faces; we had been swept by the drapery of John King, and seen and heard him distinctly for about an hour; and during the whole time as we sat in the dark the condition of linking hands was absolutely maintained.

The influence was genial and pleasant, and we seemed to be able to get whatever we asked for; e.g., the luminous slate was on one occasion left under our eyes on the table, and as it was dazzling to the sight we asked for it to be covered. Immediately "Irresistible" said, "I'll do that," and fetched from behind us several paper-covered French books which he spread over the slate and thus obscured the light; the water I have referred to and the music over our heads when asked for. Such phenomena, however, can only be obtained in a private harmonious circle, such as this was.

A Seance at Home with Miss Wood.

Miss Wood, who has been my visitor for a short time, was good enough to consent to sit as medium for our own family circle last Sunday evening. Besides our own circle there were only two friends; but we numbered twelve, including Miss Wood.

We commenced, as usual, with reading and prayer. After this we sang, "Give, said the little stream," during which Miss Wood was entranced by her familiar little spirit, "Pocha." I may interpose, and say that "Pocha" has become quite at home with us, and has frequently shewn her presence in various ways. She has carried things from one room to another; has lifted the table at meal times; has suddenly entranced Miss Wood, and made her write letters and do things of which she has been totally ignorant afterwards; but these belong to "Pocha's" secrets!

Miss Wood entranced is a totally different being from herself awake and reserved, and "Pocha's" vivacity on these occasions is frequently very amusing, while her mischievous looks, as seen by clairvoyant members of our family, are an interesting index to what we blind ones cannot see. But it would take a small volume to record "Pocha's" biography at Blackheath! To return to our seance-room—one recently fitted up for the purpose, "Pocha," as usual, talked for about an hour, which I wished over, although she assured us she was not wasting time, but the spirits were busy in the cabinet materialising—as, indeed, they were. The medium was, after this, taken into the cabinet, and we sat in light sufficient to see one another and the cabinet clearly. We heard some altercation going on as to who was to come out, which was decided in favour first of "Pocha." Beside Miss Wood now entranced, was also one of our own number, the one nearest to the cabinet, but three or four feet distant. Out came little "Pocha," a vivacious little sprite about three feet high, known to a good many. She brought out of the cabinet with her the fairy bells—an instrument two feet in length and seven or eight inches wide, weighing 2½ lbs. This she placed on the chair where Miss Wood had been sitting, and we distinctly saw her little dark hands fingering the strings as a child would to amuse itself. She then went up to my wife who was sitting four or five feet from the cabinet, took her hand, and as my wife leaned downwards she put her tiny arms round her neck and kissed her. She then crossed over the room and took my hand, then my daughter's, and my daughter-in-law's hands, fondled them a bit, and retired to the cabinet. Again the curtains opened, and out came a tall female form with less power than "Pocha," nor was she able to speak as "Pocha" had done. But she was known to our clairvoyants, who saw her through the white drapery in which she was enveloped: and it was interesting to us as the promised form of our departed daughter who for years had promised to come out among us. Gaining power, she slowly walked up towards her mother and gave her her hand, but had not sufficient power to embrace her as she evidently tried to do. She then walked to the chair on which the fairy bells were resting, took them up and walked to me with them, leaving them in my hands. I took her hand gently, but it, although fully materialized, lacked the firm touch of little "Pocha's," and seemed too ethereal to be pressed. We were all delighted, however, thus to see her for the first time, but not prepared for all that was to follow. On her retiring, another spirit came out, who looked towards his father, but lacked the power to reach him at the furthest part of the room. He was known to our clairvoyants, and indicated his identity by bowing his head as his name was given.

Those who have read "Heaven Opened," will know that some years ago we lost three little ones, one after another; lost to sight only, for we have had repeated indications of their nearness. And now the three sweet little spirits, one after another, came out, materialised for the first time. How can I describe the delicate little forms of infants radiant in light? It was indeed a Sabbath evening of holy communion, and to us the place was holy as these forms of light walked among us. But I fancy I hear some one, more critical than sympathetic, saying: Yes, but where was Miss Wood? I reply: Hitherto she was in the cabinet, sometimes talking while the spirits were moving about, and at other times breathing so as to be heard by those nearest the cabinet, to three clairvoyants present seen distinctly with the spirit forms. But we are not all clairvoyants! No; so for those the following phase occurred.

Miss Wood was now brought out of the cabinet; still entranced, and seated in view of all; in front, outside, all saw her, while the curtains, now slightly opened, disclosed the spirit light. Some papers had been pinned upon the curtains, for more readily noting their movements. A hand now, seen by some only, took out the pins and threw the papers on to the floor, this latter seen by all. Now as the curtain was opened all saw the light and those on one side the form of a spirit, very tall. "Pocha" said, "There's another spirit coming out with a baby," and there it was. But a storm broke over us and broke also the conditions.

My daughter-in-law, next to me, lady-like, was scared by the peals of thunder overhead. The invisibles, I presume, determined to do their best, entranced her now, but in vain; the tall form seen could not come out, and our last baby form is still nursed in the spirit-land. Not long ago I heard from a pulpit the bewailing recorded by the poet:—

"Oh for the touch of a vanished hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still."

The touch we have often felt; the voices of some we have often heard. And yet the question is still asked, "If a man die, shall he live again?" Some do. Is it scientific to conclude from that that all do?

It is the mission of Spiritualism to establish this fact, and it is gradually being accomplished.

But I know there are many hungering and thirsting after such phenomena as I have described, and which now mingle with the daily life of many. It is only in family life such pure phenomena can be secured; but with a medium like Mr. Husk, who is now sitting weekly with members of the Central Association of Spiritualists, even visitors, if true and honest, can see enough to confirm what is now so often recorded, as will also be the case with our friends at the Antipodes who are looking forward to the arrival of Miss Wood. The conditions for such manifestations are so subtle that I doubt if scientists will discover their existence satisfactorily for many a long day, while those on whom the light has shone can rest and be thankful. No so-called exposures touch their serenity. They could explain even them, but not to the fools who expose!

MR. IRVING BISHOP AND SPIRITUALISM.

SIR,—In your issue for February 17th, I took the liberty of criticising a certain performance given by Mr. Bishop at Liverpool, in which he was supported by the Rev. J. H. Skewes (a violent opponent of Spiritualism), and many other local gentlemen of repute. Mr. Bishop pretended to have accepted a challenge that had been made him by a certain Mr. Ladyman for the sum of £10, the terms being that he (Bishop) should find a pin that had been hidden by the challenged in a certain part of the city. And he was reported to have successfully won the wager. The local Press was unanimous in declaring it to be a death-blow to Spiritualism, and seemed to enjoy the reputation Mr. Bishop was earning for himself as a "thought-reader." The evidence was so weak that I wrote in your columns as follows:—

"I could not help feeling that, considering the advantages Bishop was to derive from the experiment, there is another and very simple explanation than that of the pin having been found by 'thought-reading.' Indeed, the explanation is so obvious that no one will be mystified as to what it is. But assuming it to have been a genuine exhibition of Bishop's mental power, I shall be pleased to make the following offer:—I will place in the hands of the Psychical Society the sum of £10, and that Society shall choose a committee of six of its members, to mark and hide a pin in a similar manner to that adopted by Mr. Ladyman. Bishop shall allow himself the like conditions of being blindfolded and a copper wire; and if he, under these circumstances, will guide any one of the six gentlemen to the spot where the pin is hidden, I will forfeit the sum above-named, and will publish the result in the newspapers. Should the Psychical Society and Mr. Bishop consent to this, and the latter succeed, he will at once see the importance it will give him in having been successful with a committee of scientific gentlemen, whose testimony no one will doubt, besides having clearly demonstrated that his power of thought-reading has stood the calm and deliberate test of a body of men who have already satisfied themselves of the existence of such a power."

To this challenge Mr. Bishop made no reply. Nor indeed did I expect any, as I felt certain that his powers could not stand the test of a crucial investigation.

I am glad, therefore, to be able to call the attention of your readers to an article which appeared in Truth of June 21st, by which Mr. Bishop's system of "thought-reading" is completely exposed; and I quote the following from Truth as proving that my criticism was not unwarranted:—

"At Liverpool there is a certain Whiteley, an owner of a waxwork exhibition. Bishop having quarrelled with Uffner (his partner at Manchester and elsewhere), entered into a partnership with Whiteley, I suppose on the same terms as he had done with the former. The first object, of course, was to attract attention to his entertainment. It was therefore announced that a gentleman had bet Bishop £10 that he would not find a pin concealed within a certain distance of the Adelphi Hotel. The experiment was to take place at mid-day; Bishop was to have a bandage round his eyes, and then, as a further precaution, a black bag was to be passed over his head (the bag is an old trick—no sooner is the bag put on, than the performer is able to push up the bandage without detection), and he was to be attached by a wire to the wrist of a local dentist of the name of Ladyman. The experiment was 'successful.' Bishop ran through the street, walked into an hotel, went out on the balcony, and found the pin there. A few days later on, two men called on me. One gave the name of Whiteley, the waxwork man, and the other that of Blunt, a conjurer at Liverpool. They said that they had seen in Truth that Mr. Bishop's pretensions had been ridiculed, and that they were prepared to produce evidence to show how he had tricked the public at Liverpool. I did not pay any great attention, but told them that when they gave me the evidence I would look into it. I heard no more of them, but as they had told me that either they were going, or had gone (I forget which), to see Mr. Maskelyne about the matter, I thought that I would call upon that gentleman and ask him whether they had ever been to him. Mr. Maskelyne said that they had, and that they had related the whole circumstances in regard to the Liverpool transactions to him. Whiteley had told him that the trick of the pin at Liverpool had been arranged beforehand; that although the man who made the bet with Bishop had lost it, and consequently ought to have paid the £10 to the charity, in reality Bishop and his friends had paid it. Mr. Maskelyne showed me a letter to him from this Whiteley, in which he says, 'So far as I am personally concerned, I am willing and prepared to make a public statement as to the fact of having myself paid a share of the bet.' I asked where Whiteley was now? Mr. Maskelyne replied that he had lately met him, and that he had learnt that he had made up his differences with Bishop, and was again either his partner or his impresario. Another fact in regard to Mr. Bishop's Liverpool experiences is, that the 'subject' there was not a person either of repute or independence. At the séance, a man stepped forward and, producing a note, which he said Bishop could never have seen, asked him to read it. This Bishop did. The man was one Corner, a clerk in a Liverpool bank. It can be proved that just before the meeting he had been with Bishop, in his private room."

If the writer's allegations are true, a clear case is made out against Bishop's pretence to possess the faculty of reading thoughts; and his reluctance to place himself under conditions that preclude fraud and collusion is, without doubt, most prejudicial to his claim.

In view of the large sums that have been offered him should he succeed in reading the number of a bank-note, it would almost be ridiculous to further call his attention to my challenge, but it will hold good until such time as Bishop may care to accept it.

I am surprised that Mr. Hensleigh Wedgwood, who is usually so clear in his observance of facts, should state in your columns that he could account for Bishop's cabinet performance at St. James's Hall in no other manner than by spiritual aid. Such admissions are not only damaging to the cause, but lead the public to believe that there can be no difference between the trickery of the professional conjurer and the phenomena observed in the presence of a medium. For Mr. Wedgwood's information I beg to say that the trick—for it is nothing else—is an old one, and was resorted to by Annie Eva Fay when in England, and more recently in America, when I had an opportunity of discovering how it was done; and I shall be happy to inform Mr. Wedgwood how he can perform the same feats himself after a little practice, although for want of practice I could not hope to do so with the same agility as the exposed exposé, Mr. Washington Irving Bishop.—Yours faithfully,

Onslow-gardens, S.W.

Esoteric Buddhism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In three recent numbers of "LIGHT" we have had three eulogistic reviews from the thoughtful and metaphysical pen of "C. C. M.," and perhaps some of your readers may not object to a criticism of Mr. Sinnett's book from a European and arithmetical standpoint.

In the first place it has seemed to me that the title of the book is a misnomer.

By the term Esoteric is generally meant the sacred innermost, and thus Esoteric Christianity means the innermost secret of that soul which is One in spirit with the Christ as the Logos or operative wisdom of God. And as God thus is the cause and centre of all things, a system like Buddhism, which denies the existence of a Creator or spiritual First Cause, cannot, in the true, that is the Theistic sense, be esoteric.

A mere secret is not esoteric, and one might as truly speak of an esoteric police, or esoteric drugs, as of an esoteric cosmogony; and as Mr. Sinnett's book is almost entirely a theory of the evolution of man out of matter, and a supposed history of man's growth in various planets, it is no more entitled to the term esoteric than are the theories of Andrew Jackson Davis or those of "The Vestiges of Creation."

Mr. Sinnett's book is given as the secret teachings of the Occult Brothers through their representative, Koot Hoomi; and it is stated that their secrets are stupendous, and are now for the first time in the history of the human race, given to the world by the author.

Moreover, it is intimated that the revelation is infallible, and that as it is only by receiving infallible truth that the soul can be saved, we run a great risk if we reject the teaching now so generously given to us; and, indeed, one is reminded of the words of the Athanasian Creed when it informs us that, "Except ye thus believe without doubt ye shall perish everlastingly," with this extra terror, that whereas the Pope of Rome who thus threatens us is a man visible in the flesh, the secret Popes who now threaten us are invisible Esoteric Brothers.

Regarding this Koot Hoomi, it is a very remarkable and unsatisfactory fact that Mr. Sinnett, although in correspondence with him for years, has yet never been permitted to see him.

The excuse is that his magnetism is so refined that he could not safely descend into the plains of India, and run the risk of infection from the low magnetism of ordinary mortals.

If this be a fact then he cannot truly be an adept—that is, as is claimed, one who can control the forces of Nature—for if he could, then he could easily surround himself by a curtain of invisible but impenetrable magnetic aura.

Even a common mesmerist can make himself so positive that he not only associates with the lowest human beings, but while he expels the evil magnetism of their diseases he himself lives safely in the midst of it.

How comes it, then, that Koot Hoomi is so feeble, and why does he not resemble Jesus, who associated with lepers and maniacs, and expelled their demons by the word of His power?

But if Koot Hoomi cannot safely descend to the plains, why does he not invite Mr. Sinnett to visit him in the hills, and after purging him with fruit and baths and fumigations, and being "ever careful that he did not come between the wind and his nobility," hold from his tripod sweet and psychic converse with him, and indeed why not, if need be, isolate himself from the sinner of the West by means of a glass case?

But although Koot Hoomi has not shown himself to Mr. Sinnett in the flesh, he has sent him three portraits, one by Madame Blavatsky, and two taken by a kind of spiritual or occult photography.

These portraits the devotees have been permitted to look on, but not to touch, but I as one altogether born of the devil have not been permitted to behold them.

This, I think, is a mistake, for just as some second-class saints have been made by gazing on halfpenny prints of the Mother of God, so who can say that if my good friend had permitted my sceptical eyes to look on the Divine face of Koot Hoomi I might not forthwith have been converted into an Esoteric Buddhist?

I dwell at the outset on this Oriental practice of secrecy, because although I believe many of those we are in communication with in the East are noble beings, yet I know that Secrecy and Cunning are ever twin sisters, and hence it has always appeared to me childish and effeminate in any Western or Eastern society pretending by secret words and signs to enshrine great truths behind a veil, which is only useful as a concealment of ignorance and nakedness; and as secrecy is so often a sign of weakness, I will venture to assert that if these Occult Brothers came out of their caves and mixed with mankind we should find them merely attenuated ascetics, inferior in matters of science, wisdom, and knowledge to the higher minds of our Western civilisation.

But as to this grand secret regarding man and the universe now for the first time in the history of the human race revealed by the Occult Brothers through Koot Hoomi, it is briefly as follows:—

1. "There is no God personal or impersonal,"* and "no Creator, because no physical effect can arise but from a physical cause," and thus man, body, soul, and spirit, is an evolution from matter.

2. There are seven planets through which man passes by successive re-incarnations in the progress of his evolution.

These seven planets have each evolved seven races, and these seven races each seven sub-races.

Thus we have 7 planets  $\times$  7 races  $\times$  7 sub-races, that is  $7 \times 7 \times 7 = 343$  stages of existence, and as each man and woman has been twice incarnated in each stage we have  $343 \times 2 = 686$  as the number of re-incarnations man has had in the seven planets, and as I understand, this process has been performed seven times in the "spiral" evolution of the planets. We thus have  $686 \times 7 = 4,802$  as the number of existences a human soul has in its progress towards a final Nirvana.

3. Three of these seven planets are the Earth, Mars and Mercury, the four others are of so refined a material as to be invisible.

4. At all his 4,802 deaths man passes into a paradise of happiness and rest, "a world of effects," the average life there being probably 8,000 years before each re-incarnation.

Thus the life of man in this world of effects which is called Devachan, is  $4,802 \times 8,000 = 38,416,000$  years.

This seems a very long time, but in a conversation I had on the subject, I was informed that although the Brothers were shy as to giving exact quotations in figures, it was yet understood that the probable duration of a finished soul on the planets was more like 70,000,000 of years.

5. The life in Devachan is one of happiness, but of a dream-like nature, during which the inhabitants do little or no work either for themselves or others.

6. The ultimate destination of the soul is Nirvana, where all the past lives of 70,000,000 years become as one remembrance—the soul being in unity with the infinite but yet a distinct individuality.

7. All do not reach Nirvana, for while some can find into it a short cut by occult lines, others, even after 70,000,000 years, are too wicked to go there, and these are cast into the "dust bin" of our system, the moon, where they drag out a miserable existence and rapidly disintegrate and perish for ever.

This is a brief epitome of Esoteric Buddhism as I have learned it from the book and from private instructions, and I find the revelation is received by three orders of mind in three very different ways.

First. I find some who "read the revelation with breathless attention, and receive it in wonder and awe."

Second. I find those who say, "The author of this cosmogony, whoever he may be, is evidently as mad as a hatter."

While a third order of mind says: "We have great suspicion of all schemes made, cut and dry, by the multiplication of sevens, and it seems to us that Koot Hoomi is trying to impose on Sinnett 'an awful cram.'"

For myself I restrain my sentiments, and only beg to be permitted to question the statements, philosophically and arithmetically.

First, then, we are told there is no God and no Creator, for all things were evolved out of matter, the body, soul, and spirit of man being but three stages of matter in evolution. And we are further told that there is no Creator "because no physical effect can arise but from a physical cause."

SPIRITUAL LESSONS FROM THE BHAGAVAT GITA.

An Address by the REV. S. E. BENGOUGH, M.A. at Cavendish Rooms, on Sunday, July 15th, 1883.

"The foundations of the earth are out of course," said the prophet; signifying, no doubt, by that striking image that the social and religious condition of his country was in a thoroughly disorganised state, going to pieces, and falling into confusion, as a city might do under the influence of an earthquake. This prophetic language is eminently fitted to describe our own age and condition, and it becomes more so every day. The foundations of our earth are out of course. It is no use to deny, or shut our eyes to, a fact which is patent to every one of ordinary intelligence who is not blinded by prejudice or use and wont. There is no single tradition of the past which commands universal or even general reverence. There is no moral or religious axiom of 100 years ago which is not called in question by some of our most honoured and deepest thinkers.

Such a state of things is, in many respects, a very unhappy one. Individuals and nations must have some truths, some firm convictions to build their life upon. And, now-a-days, half our time is spent in arriving at the comfortable assurance that all which our grandfathers believed was a delusion and snare; and then, when we have begun to see our way to a few practical relative truths, we have to die, or, as we Spiritualists think, go into another state of existence. To those who may be troubled with any such reflections as these, allow me to suggest a source of consolation. After all, the doubts which have been cast upon old authoritative notions have been caused, in most cases, by scientific discoveries, and increased clearness of vision in almost every province of inquiry. And to one of these discoveries I would refer as a consolation for the shortness of our individual lives on earth. I mean the fact—which becomes more certain every day—that man has been upon the earth some hundreds of thousands of years. And if our own personal existence is short, our inherited faculties, and even some fragments of history—taking that word in its widest sense—go back to a quite indefinite past. It is true, indeed, that what is commonly called history is but of yesterday. Of the enormous period during which man has been upon this planet we have only records of 5,000 or 6,000 years, and those consist of the legendary story or the skeleton annals of half-a-dozen countries on the shores of the Mediterranean—countries that in an ordinary map of the world may be covered with three or four fingers. And this, forsooth, is universal history. Universal, I suppose, as to time and space in relation to our globe. The appellation is, really, too absurd.

Indian Literature.

China, Egypt, India, at the earliest period of recorded history, had already attained a highly developed state of civilisation—on which we ourselves have made but slight advance. And of the countless ages preceding that epoch we know almost nothing—only a few archaeological facts concerning mound and pyramid builders, lake-dwellers, and so forth. About the time referred to there already existed in India some religious books—the four Vedas, or words, written in a beautiful dialect, that has been for centuries a dead language. These Vedas, with the Upanishads, Puranas, and two prodigious epics, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, form alone a voluminous literature, bespeaking intellectual capacity equal perhaps to that of any era that succeeded. On these sacred writings is based the most ancient ecclesiastical system of India, represented by Brahminism, of which the long pre-Christian Buddhism was an offshoot.

The Mahabharata seems to have been written after the first three Vedas and prior to the fourth. It is a gigantic production, and is said to contain 220,000 lines. It is divided into eighteen books, and in about the centre stands the Bhagavat Gita.

The Bhagavat Gita is generally allowed to be the deepest and most interesting portion of the Vedic literature. It is allegorical to begin with, and susceptible of more than one interpretation; but it is quite certain that it states and professes to solve a great variety of metaphysical and moral problems, and I think I am justified in describing it as the oldest psychological treatise in existence. In the miserable chaos of religious and philosophical scepticism in which the world is weltering at present, it may have a tranquillising effect on some minds to go back to this ancient document, and breathe for a while that serene atmosphere of thought that brought with it peace, and strength, and purity to our Aryan ancestors 3,000 years ago.

Bhagavat Gita.

This poem has a dramatic form throughout, but there is scarcely any action, and it consists almost entirely of a dialogue between two interlocutors. In the first scene two armies are facing each other ready to commence a battle, which is to determine the question of sovereignty. The armies are composed of descendants of one ancestor through two brothers named Dhreetarashtra and Pandu. Pandu was the younger brother, and had obtained the right of sovereignty on account of the incapacity of his elder brother, who was blind. The younger brother, however, resigned, and after the lapse of years his descendants, the Pandus, contended with the Kurus, the descendants of the elder brother, for sovereignty: finally, obtained the victory and acquired possession of the kingdom. This episode has its parallel in the Hebrew story of Esau and Jacob; the posterity of the latter—the younger of the two brothers—becoming the heroes of the after part of the drama.

Now for the interpretation. By the two families, Kurus and Pandus, of one tribe, are to be understood the various forces of passion and intelligence in the one tribe of mankind—or, if you please, the individual man. The microcosm man, just as the larger world, is for ever the battle-field of vice and deceit against truth and virtue. Man is born undeveloped. Passion—like the elder brother, Dhreetarashtra, and Esau selling his birthright for a mess of pottage—is spiritually blind. Vice and deceit obstruct the gates of intelligence. The moral principle also is held in a state of siege. The theatre of this drama, then, is none other than the soul of man—the spiritual kingdom that is within us, the scene of such awful conflicts of contending powers. But my audience need not fear that they will have paraded before them a lifeless train of abstract virtues and vices, like the dramatis personae of the old Morality Plays. Religious idealism has seldom soared higher than it does in this poem, and for equal beauty of moral feeling we should have to go to Thomas-a-Kemp's Imitatio Christi. But there is, moreover, here a depth of theosophical speculation which makes one giddy to contemplate.

So much for the general character of the poem. Let us look into it closer. The whole work has been divided into three sections. The first is purely practical; the second, theological; and the third, metaphysical. There are three speakers, Sanjaya, a messenger—who simply introduces the narrative, like the chorus in a play—Arjuna, and Krishna. As is well known, Krishna was supposed to be the eighth incarnation of Kishna, who is the second in order of the Hindoo Trinity. Arjuna represents embodied humanity. Shortly after the opening, Sanjaya says:—Now when Arjuna beheld the Dhartarashtra arrayed for battle, and that the flying of arrows had commenced, he raised his bow, and addressed these words to Krishna: "Draw up my chariot, O Eternal One, between the two armies, that I may examine these men, and see with whom I have to fight." And Krishna, being thus addressed by Arjuna, drew up that best of chariots.

Surely it is remarkable that the second person of the Hindoo Trinity should be acting here as Arjuna's charioteer. As the action proceeds we find that he assumes the part of revealer of all mysteries, and is himself revealed as the central life of all creation. It should be noted that Arjuna is addressed by three different titles: Son of Kunti, Son of Pritha, and son of Bhārata. These refer respectively to the animal, the human, and the divine principle in man; and they apparently answer to the terms: Son of Mary, Son of Man, and Son of God, as applied to Jesus the Christ.

The first scene is entitled Arjuna's Despondency; and this despondency leads to all the dialogues that follow. Arjuna is perplexed and distressed to see in the ranks of those opposed to him numbers of his blood-relations and others whom he respects. He knows not how to act.

"Alas!" he says, "we have determined to commit a great crime; since for the desire of sovereignty we are prepared to slay our kin. Better were it for me if the Dhartarashas would slay me harmless and unresisting in the fight." This is Krishna's answer: "Thou hast grieved for those who need not be grieved for, but thou utterest words of wisdom. Know this, that that by which all this universe is created is indestructible, and these finite bodies belong to an eternal, indestructible and infinite Spirit. Therefore, fight, O Bhārata! The spirit is not slain when the body is killed. As a man abandons worn out clothes and takes other new ones, so does the soul quit worn out bodies. The soul is eternal and capable of going everywhere. Therefore, knowing it to be such, thou art not right to grieve for it. The soul in every creature's body is always invulnerable. And considering thine own duty" (as a kshatrya), "thou art not right to waver. For there is nothing better for a kshatrya than lawful war. And if thou wilt not join in this lawful fight, thou abandonest thine own duty and glory, and contractest a crime. And to a noble man infamy is worse than death."

Spiritual Principles.

Such is the practical exoteric teaching of the earlier portion of this drama. It comprises the following principles:

1. The spiritual and eternal origin of all phenomena.
2. The duty of faithful, calm submission to the unknown and the inevitable, and the brave fulfilment of relative obligations.
3. The pursuit of tranquillity of soul by the attainment of spiritual truth.
4. The disregard of all selfish considerations or hope of reward here or hereafter.

The succeeding portion of the poem consists chiefly of religious and philosophical illustrations of these fundamental principles.

The method prescribed for attaining to spiritual truth and perfection may be termed the doctrine and discipline of the Yogis. It is probable that for thousands of years this sect of ascetics has had its representatives in India. Two years ago there appeared in the Theosophist an interesting account of the different stages through which an initiate in this order passes. It is reported that at an early period of his experience the Yogis' limbs are benumbed. Then follows a sense of utter exhaustion. Afterwards he becomes "master of the vision." He sees into men's hearts, he hears the most distant voices. Next he feels himself to be so subtle that he can transport himself where he will, and like the Devas, see all without being seen. Finally, he becomes the Universal and indivisible Word, he is the Creator, the Eternal, exempt from change; and become perfect repose, he distributes repose to the world.

The spiritual principles rather than the practical precepts of Yuginism are given in the Bhagavat Gita.

Krishna says to Arjuna: "The devotee who, freed from sin, proves constant in his vocation, enjoys eternal happiness, and is conjoined to the Supreme. He sees that all existent things are centred in the Life Divine. For Me he sees in all that is, and all created things in Me. He worships Me as present in all things that are, and even while on earth he dwells in Me."

Such words prepare us to enter on the more distinctly religious portion of this wonderful poem. And our time is so limited that we will pass at once to the heart of it, to a canto which might be entitled "A Beatific Vision, or the Transfiguration of Krishna."

Arjuna thus addresses Krishna: "In loving kindness great to me thou hast in words imparted much concerning that which is the inmost principle of Life in all the worlds and spheres. But now, O Thou who art the first of forms in human shape divine, I am most wishful to behold in clearer light Thy higher form."

Krishna makes answer, and then Sanjaya, the narrator, continues:—

"Now when the Lord had finished speaking to Arjuna, forthwith the Mighty One revealed His glorious countenance and form, which shone with radiant light, crowned with a brilliant diadem, apparelled with celestial robes. The splendour of that glorious One was such as if a sudden blaze of light should issue from a thousand of meridian suns at once. And thus to Pandu's son the God of gods His presence did reveal. It seemed as if the universe itself was comprehended in that one majestic form. And thereupon the wealth-despiser, stretching forth his hands, the palms conjoined, with reverence most profound bowed low his head, and spake these words:

"O Mighty One, within that form Divine,
In which Thou dost present Thyself to me,
I see a countless crowd of angel-forms,
And myriad shapes of life.
I see Brahma upon his lotus throne
With the seven ancient ones.

"O mighty Lord of all the universe,
Thou art the sole and self-existent One,
And Thou art worthy to be praised and loved.
Thou art the central and exhaustless Fount
From whom are born all worlds that move in space.
Both sun and moon reflect as mirrors bright
The light that issues from those lustrous eyes.

"O Thou, who art the senses' conqueror,
All worlds rejoice with joy exceeding great
When they receive what flows from Thy abode.
Thou art the great Creator of the earth,
And everything that lives and is thereon!
Thou art the Generator of the air, the stars, the fire;
Hail! hail to Thee; a thousand times all hail!

"And now, O Mansion of the universe,
Appear to me again in other guise.
The same I saw before, with triple crown,
And staff, and discs held in both Thy hands."

(The change in the Divine manifestation takes place, and ARJUNA proceeds.)

"O Thou, to Whom the prayers of men ascend,
Now that I see Thee in this placid form,
In human shape Divine, I am composed,
And to my former state again return."

I should say that I have followed Mr. William Oxley's translation of this passage as given in his "Philosophy of Spirit," a work to which I am greatly indebted. But I have toned down much of the imagery in this vision, as in its entirety it is too orientally magniloquent for English taste. What I have retained expresses many grand ideas. Krishna, in his human form, is represented as the object of worship to all mankind. In his symbolical transfiguration he becomes the embodiment of all the vital energies of creation. He is described as the originator of all worlds, the stars of heaven, and our sun among the rest.

Both sun and moon, it is said, reflect as mirrors bright the light that issues from those lustrous eyes.

Almost all historic religions are, as is generally known, traceable to sun worship. But there is more than sun worship here. The sun himself is but the reflection of the glory of deity.

The philosophical portion of this poem is a sort of didactic inference from what precedes. It essays to unfold the nature of life, of consciousness, and the inmost principle—the soul, which is described as having "hands and feet, with faces, heads, and eyes in every part, and sits the central power in all. Endowed with vast intelligence, it comprehends the universe."

It is afterwards said:—

The soul, that inmost principle within all forms of life, is called the guide, preceptor, witness, sustainer, and the mighty God. And he who comprehend these three—the soul, which is the inmost principle; the spirit, which enshrouds the soul; and body, with its qualities, whatever path in life he takes, no more regeneration needs.

We are told that three principles are active in embodied men—brightness, impulse, and darkness.

The fruits of brightness are called purity and holiness, those of impulse are anxiety, and those of darkness ignorance. If, when the hour of dissolution comes, the principle of brightness is matured, the spirit will ascend to spheres where dwell the pure and perfect ones. And should it leave the outer frame when impulse is predominant, it joins the company of those who delight in active work. But if the frame should be dissolved when darkness is predominant, the spirit goes to spheres where dwell the earth-bound ones.

My nature, pursues Krishna, is approached and found when these three principles are made subservient. Then the spirit is released from future birth and death, old age and pain, and feeds on heavenly and angelic food.

Arjuna asks: "What are the signs, O mighty One, by which this conquest can be known? What course of life doth such a one pursue who would overcome these?" Krishna replies: "When brightness, impulse, darkness act in such a one, O Pandu's son, he hates them not; nor longs again for them when they have disappeared. He is neither agitated nor wavers, because he knows these principles can only act upon his most external form. He is contented in himself, and is the same in ease and pain. He values neither lands nor gold nor jewels, which are sought to him. His bearing is the same to all, be they his friends or enemies. In all he undertakes he is free from thoughts of self-aggrandisement. These are the signs which mark the one who has overcome these qualities. And he is made conformable to me and shares in my prerogative. I am the heaven of heavens, ambrosia, incorruptible, eternal, law, and order—bliss that is intense and aye endures."

Mr. Oxley remarks—I think very justly—that the concluding sentence gives the key to this profound drama. Even Krishna, or "the Holy One," is but a personification of the powers of the human soul. He is a representation of the states which a full regeneration opens, or, in plain words, the consciousness of life through all the three degrees, celestial, spiritual, and natural. Anyone who can apply this description to himself or herself will know who and what Krishna, and Christ, and Osiris really are—not historical persons of a bygone age, but life principles within ourselves.

Indian Philosophy and Judaism.

Now that I have laid before my audience the leading features of this venerable psychological treatise, I must venture to say how I think it may be utilised at present. Of course it cannot be adopted in its entirety as a guide to us. We live in a different age; our atmosphere of thought, our social, climatic, and ethnological conditions are very unlike those of the author of the Bhagavat Gita and his contemporaries. Yet what may be called the Christianlike tone of this drama is very remarkable. It is true that we have there no ghastly dogmas about men being under the curse of an angry Creator, and so on. But we have in Krishna a personification, as a Divine humanity, of the central universal life. Something like that we meet with, too, in St. John's Gospel and St. Paul's Epistles; but in the Sanskrit drama we have more psychology proper, and less of religious theosophy. There is a more philosophical, scientific spirit in the Indian than in the Jewish mode of looking at the universe. Looking at the universe, did I say? When did the Jew or the Christianised Jew ever do this? His universe was a crystalline vault that moved round him every twenty-four hours, with the sun fixed there to give him light by day, and the stars and the moon by night.

The Jewish sacred books, no doubt, in their fundamental elements rival in antiquity the Vedas themselves. They, too, contain the oldest symbolism in existence, and, here and there, a spiritual sublimity that has rarely been surpassed. But if we do not recognise that those books are allegorical, mystical books, the literal sense of which is often contradictory, grossly sensual, and misleading, we sink below the level of hair-splitting Jewish Rabbis. An unreasoning acceptance of a fancied Divine and verbal inspiration is not a condition of child-like simplicity—that has its beauty—but one of mental dotage, which is pitiable, only pitiable, whether exhibited by some poor Salvationist ranting at the street-corner or by an Archbishop of Canterbury. We owe much to the Jewish nation, and their history has been such that they can well afford to treat with contempt the derisive criticism of the prejudiced and ignorant. The Jew has his distinctive virtues, and individuals of his tribe have attained to intellectual eminence. But that is no reason why we of Teutonic race, with 2,000 years of development since the Jewish nation reached its highest altitude, should be content to sit, like open-mouthed children, at the feet of Syrian devotees and visionaries, or astute, semi-enlightened Jewish scribes.

The Jewish Yoke.

We are Jew-ridden on our Stock Exchange, and that is enough in a commercial country like ours. That is the Jew's proper sphere. But in the name of all that is just and true, I say let us shake off the Jewish yoke from our philosophy and religion. Let us no longer be Jew-ridden in our temples, whether it be the grandest of all temples, our own souls, or the star-studded vault of heaven, or some less imposing structure, from that great sepulchral cathedral of St. Paul's downwards.

In achieving this happy emancipation, which is approaching every day, we have not only many "vested interests" to contend against: we have an enemy nearer home, in our own narrow, English cast of mind, and in the inherited prejudices and superstitions of a thousand years, which have become bone of our bone, and almost part of our intellectual nature. We should not be so Jew-ridden as we are, if there were not in our national character something of the Jewish type, enriched and ennobled it may be, but Judaic still. Of course I don't refer to the non-sensical theory about a blood-relationship between Jews and Englishmen; I mean a purely ethical kinship. Our English pluck, so distinctively a national characteristic, answers to the proverbial pertinacity of the Jew. The Jew rules to-day half the money-markets of Europe; and English commercial genius has made some call us a nation of shopkeepers. Our formal Pharasaic Sabbath-keeping, and this wearisome Parliamentary oath business, is all Jewish. There is nothing Christian or rational about it. In a word, our affinity with the Jew—at once our intellectual weakness and our moral strength—lies in the excess of our personality, or rather our personal consciousness.

We English are each a little island in our little selves. Our religion is for the most part English morality intensified, not spiritualised. The God of England, when it is not gold, is a national deity. "O Lord our God arise! Scatter our enemies. Confound their politics!" (In the Transvaal and elsewhere.) What a deity that would be that backed up English politics! But the worst of it is, we carry all this into our theories of the other world. We would perpetuate there our coarse moralities—our skin-deep domestic relationships. Our sweet personality is no dear to us that sooner than lose any fragment of it, we are content to import half the unreality and twaddle of this world into the next. It may be that for some indefinite period the transient relationships of blood or moral affinity continue to affect us after that mysterious change called death. But surely there has been in the theories of many religious thinkers, Spiritualists especially, a disposition to attach too much importance to that merely moral, society, inherited personality which pertains to us as pilgrims through this troublesome world. What I would urge is that the spiritual individuality of a man is something which lies below the surface, something to which his outward moral character, which is visible to the world, and may be inscribed upon his tombstone, is but the matrix, and a most imperfect index.

"We are spirits clad in veils,
Man by man was never seen;
All our deep communion fails
To withdraw the shadowy screen."

A Spiritualist's Difficulties.

It seems to me that our knowledge of others and their knowledge of us, here in this gross artificial surface state of existence, cannot be perpetuated—except in rare cases—in the next state of being. There may indeed be, in exceptional instances, such depth of affection and sympathy between different individuals as shall survive the disintegration of death itself, but I do think that Spiritualists are disposed to generalise about such things too hastily and too confidently.

I have been a Spiritualist twenty years, and remain one to-day. I have read a small library of books on the subject, and have indirectly learned very much by the study of it. I confess, however, that I do not seem to know much more of the future life now than I did at the beginning, or much more than may be gathered from that Bhagavat Gita of 3,000 years ago. I said that I do not know, but I am very thankful for the suggestions of possibilities which have come to me from behind the veil, the food for imaginative feeling and speculative thought.

Addressing myself especially to Spiritualists I would ask if their experience too, fairly faced and considered, has not been discouraging in this respect. Of course, if we choose to pin our faith or confine our attention to one particular class of seers, or mediums, or forms of manifestations, we may succeed in drawing up a tolerably consistent theory as to the spiritual conditions of the other life. But if we compare the varying statements of twenty seers, of as many countries and religious creeds, the impression left upon our mind is likely to be very confusing. Even in the most reliable cases the subjectivity of the medium and the character of the surrounding spiritual atmosphere appear to be modifying elements almost impossible to eliminate.

Swedenborg was, undoubtedly, one of the greatest of spiritual seers, but no one who is not the narrowest of New Church men will deny that the famous Swedish mystic unconsciously Swedenborgised a large proportion of his memorable relations, and what is true of Swedenborg is certainly true of much smaller men. Hundreds of mediums on the Continent, in France, Italy, and Spain, have endorsed the re-incarnation doctrines of Allan Kardec. And how many Catholic, Shaker, Mormon, or Indian mystics have made revelations confirming their respective creeds! What conclusions shall we draw from such an endless variety of conflicting revelations? Must we not feel, first of all, that we have to deal with a most complex and perplexing subject? Not only so; but no amount of purity of intent, self-sacrifice and extreme devotion, to the highest ends is a sure protection against illusion. Take, for example, the circumstances which attended the production a year ago of that voluminous mass of absurdity called "Oathspee; or, The New Bible." It is a book which, beyond all question, came directly from spiritual sources wholly independent of the volition or normal intelligence of the medium. This man was subjected during its production to a most severe and saintlike ordeal. But what unpurged and cultivated mind could read that book without ineffable disgust and fedium?

Practical Conclusion.

Perhaps I may differ in opinion on many points from most of those whom I have the honour of addressing. And pray, friends, do not think that I speak dogmatically, or fancy my own judgment infallible. I have said already that I feel we are dealing with a very difficult subject, on which it is far more easy to point to rocks ahead than to indicate the right course to follow. For many years it has been my conviction that the crying want of our time, not only in dealing with Spiritualism but with everything—education, politics, religion, sociology—in everything, I say, our crying want is a science of human nature. The study of psychology, normal and abnormal, may perhaps do more than anything else to throw light upon such a science. But then our investigations should always aspire to something of scientific method and spirit. We should be satisfied with no doctrine which does not possess the stamp of universal order. This intellectual spirit is the "hall-mark," so to speak, which we are bound to look for and to honour. Professor Huxley once said, "If the facts of the Spiritualist are facts I have no interest in them." No doubt he meant that the facts were so abnormal that they could not be related with others, and take their place in the scientific commonwealth; and therefore had no worth to his methodic mind. I think Professor Huxley was very ill-advised in saying that, but I can understand and can respect his feeling.

In conclusion, allow me to sum up in a few words the gist of this address. It is this—that the most important truth which spiritualistic phenomena appear to me to teach is, not something concerning our condition hereafter, but that now, in our garb of flesh, we are essentially spirits with transcendent spiritual powers, of which mere scientists know nothing, and—quid scientists—can know nothing, for they belong to quite a different plane of existence from that on which scientists work. I believe that these spiritual powers, normal as well as abnormal, are our glorious privilege and distinction as human beings. Conclusive evidence has been placed within our reach that we are related to a spiritual universe in one sense at least, as being real and actual, higher than the heavens and lower than the hells of our greatest poets. Our reason and imagination can give us intuitive consciousness of this tremendous verity. Spiritualistic phenomena thrust it home to our very senses.

Revelations of our spiritual surroundings shew us that we can, if we choose, live now in Heaven or in Hell; that is to say, related to, in sympathy with, and inspired by, a substantial, though ideal, world of harmony, truth, and happiness, or discord, falsehood, and misery. If we are wise, we shall act accordingly.

The sun of popularity sometimes shines upon a flower which prematurely opens its buds and discloses all its glowing beauties, but expires amidst the chilling frost of night.

On this statement being made, I asked if the motive power possessed by the human will was material, and I was answered, "Yes, the will is only transcendental matter in motion!"

But I would ask, "Is self evolution possible or conceivable? For how is it possible that a lower can rise to a higher—except there be a pre-existing higher to rise to? For instance, how can the hod-man ascend to the top of the house without a pre-existing ladder? or the balloon ascend to the clouds except there be pre-existing strata of air on which, step by step, to ascend? And by what conceivable power could matter ascend in the scale except it ascended by, or to, a something other than itself? or how could the soul come from that matter which has no soul? or be born in matter except God breathed into matter? or how could it ascend except there was a higher than itself—a God who drew it upwards?" To all this it was replied, "These are difficulties, but not beyond occult wisdom and knowledge to solve!"

Then, again, that man has existed for, say, thirty or seventy millions of years, and yet has not an atom of remembrance of all this, is, to me, a statement the refutation of which does not require a moment's reflection, and no conceivable quantity of esoteric talk or number of Esoteric Brothers could possibly convince me that it was true.

Then, as to the moon being the "dust bin," as I was told, into which are cast all the souls of the incorrigibly wicked, the statement would be received as a joke were it not that I was solemnly informed that it was a fact, and perhaps it may be admitted that the moon is as good a place as any other for incorrigible Buddhistic and other lunatics; provided it is found large enough: although it is certainly uncomfortable to find the place so near our earth.

But to return to our arithmetic. If, as we are told, all souls are re-incarnations, and no new souls are created, there being a fixed number of souls, as there is a fixed amount of force in the universe, then I wish to know where the original souls came from before re-incarnations began, and if it is replied they were evolved out of matter, then I would ask why it is impossible for this process to operate now? But as we find, the population of this globe is continually increasing, there having been a time when probably there were only 100 human beings on the earth; if so, whence have come the 1,500 millions now here? If to this question it is replied they have come from other planets, then I would suggest that those other planets must be rapidly getting empty.

But the greatest arithmetical difficulty remains; for if souls on an average dwell in Devachan 8,000 years after each death, and before each re-incarnation, then as the average duration of man on earth is only about fifty years, 1,600 souls must enter Devachan for every one soul returning thence to a planet, and, if so, in a very few years, all the inhabitants of all the planets must have disappeared.

Although if we admit an unlimited period, during which Devachan must have accumulated an incalculable number of souls, there would thus be a sufficient nursery for all the re-incarnations; but still an ever-increasing number of souls in Devachan, and an ever-decreasing number on the planets, and this difficulty is, I understand, attempted to be met by the statement that some of the planets are empty.

Concerning these planets, we are told that the Earth, Mars, and Mercury are three of them, the other four being invisible owing to their rarity of texture.

On this statement two things strike us—first, that the two grandest planets should have no connection with man, viz., Saturn and Jupiter; second, that there are four invisible planets.

Concerning these four invisible planets we must be permitted to express a doubt, until their existence is proved, because however refined their texture may be it can scarcely exceed that of the tails of comets, of which some one has said that, if condensed, their matter might be put into a moderate-sized box.

Lastly. We are told that there are millions of planetary spirits who are so powerful that they could dissolve and reconstruct a planet.

If so, is it inconceivable that there may be one supreme spirit over all those millions, and that he may be in the place of the personal God of this planet—not as the creator of the planets, but as created by the planets—and thus an exemplification of how the Divine law has been in these days turned upside down, and now reads: "Parents, obey your children?"

And so it appears that Christianity has been tried and is found wanting, that it has become effete, and must pass away and give place to this sublime Esoteric Buddhism.

True, it is admitted there are a few who teach an Esoteric Christianity almost as good as this Esoteric Buddhism; but "C. C. M." says that "the interior of Christianity is to be reached, if at all, not by, but in spite of, the authorised teaching."

If by authorised teaching he means that of Church dogmas, his assertion is not entirely without foundation. But the Christian recognises no infallible authority save that of the teaching of Jesus, as recorded in the Gospels, and in these records, I maintain, and in these only, are to be found all which is perfect in morals and in religion.

"C. C. M." seems to believe that the doctrine of good works is a characteristic exclusively of Buddhism as distinct from Christianity—apparently forgetting that not only the moral teaching, but the entire life of Jesus, as our example, was one of good works continually, and to a degree beyond that of all other beings who ever lived on this planet.

Buddhism teaches good works as the way to Nirvana, but Christ shows that good works are dead, except they be done in the love of God, and hence the difference in the grand result of Christianity as compared with Buddhism.

We are told that there are 500 millions of Buddhists. True. But of these, 400 millions are Chinese, a people steeped in an isolated selfishness and in the most stupid forms of superstition and sensuality, and governed by a code of laws enforced by the most fearful cruelties.

Again, of the Japanese, the second greatest Buddhist people, Miss Bird, who lived amongst them, tells us that although they have many good qualities, they are yet as a people devoid of all religion and all morality.

Buddhism as exemplified and taught by Gautama was a great reform on the manners of his age in India, but it has not given to the Western world one new idea of importance to man.

It has not during two thousand years produced one man of eminence or genius. It has produced no poets, no musicians, no men of science, and no practical philanthropists. It has not conferred one intellectual or physical benefit on mankind. It has entirely failed and become dead because it has ignored the one fountain of all life, the living God.

Unitarian Christians during the last two hundred years, by their steadfast refutation of all hard dogmatism in theology, and by their continual assertion that in a morality founded on the love of God and man consisted the good of Christianity, have had a great influence on the Church doctrines of the present day, as witnessed by Canon Farrar's book on "Eternal Hope" and its widespread acceptance.

But Unitarianism, although in part the doctrine of the morality of Jesus, is not essentially Christianity, because it has failed to comprehend the doctrine of the esoteric Christ.

That doctrine has always been exemplified in the lives of the Christian saints and is now beginning to be evolved more widely, and when known it will be seen not only to contain all which is truly philosophic in Buddhism, but to have as its essence that love of God, so entirely unknown to Buddhism, but without which the highest evolution is impossible, and before which all lower forms of morality and religion must inevitably wither and become extinct.

"Nineteenth Century Miracles."

To the Editor of "Light."

SIR,—As I venture to hope that my projected work on "Nineteenth Century Miracles" may be considered as of some personal interest to every earnest Spiritualist, especially as it aims to be an exhaustive manual of reference, and a record of one of the most wonderful and momentous movements of human history, so I hope you will not deem it out of place if I ask of your courtesy to make an announcement which may promote the conditions upon which alone my work can go to press in England. I have concluded, for the benefit of that posterity to which I can confidently bequeath my present undertaking, to send down with the record, some of the worthy effigies of those who have faithfully laboured in the spiritual vineyard; in a word, I am endeavouring to procure a large number of such illustrations as will add tenfold value and interest to the volume in question. Permit me to add that although this course will greatly increase the expense of publication, no additional charge will be made to the subscribers, who will all receive illustrated copies on the terms announced in the advertisement, namely, 12s. 6d. per single copy, or £2 10s. for five copies. To non-subscribers after the publication, the price will be 15s. for illustrated copies and 12s. 6d. for plain ones. I hope this announcement may prove satisfactory to the kind friends who have already sent in promises of support, and induce others to hasten in following their example. Life is short, and time is passing rapidly. There are few of us who have no pressing need to set their house in order; I, at least, am one who have heard the call, and must obey.—Yours faithfully,

EMMA HARDINGE BRITTEN.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

CAVENDISH ROOMS, 61 AND 63, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

We had the great pleasure on Sunday last, at these rooms, of listening to an address from Mr. Bengough, at once practical and scholarly, upon the spiritual lessons conveyed by some of the oldest of the Indian Scriptures, the general subject being specially illustrated by a critical examination of the plan and purpose of the Bhagavat-Gita.

As the full text of this discourse is published in another column we prefer to refer to that as really the only adequate form for securing a due appreciation of its comprehensive grasp, earnest purpose and literary skill.

The lecture was preceded by readings from the Bhagavat Gita, and from the Epistle to St. James, of the Christian Scriptures; and followed by the anthem, "Like as the hart."

A clairvoyant present affirmed the presence of a large number of Indian and Chinese spirit forms on the platform, and described them as gesticulating freely round and about Mr. Bengough.—S.B.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

On Sunday, July 1st, "T. C. E." delivered an Address at Weir's Court, in the course of which he said:—

We may well be patient with orthodox friends, with Positivists and Atheists, when we see a man so learned and liberal as Mr. John Morley, M.P., showing such strength of ingrained prejudice, and such ignorance of the hidden springs of life which "shape our ends rough how them as we may."

In his interesting book, "Voltaire and His Times," Mr. Morley writes of Rousseau in the following disparaging strain: "Rousseau at the very first steps affirms! He, a philosopher, credits himself with succeeding at the very first in what philosophers have always reproached divines with doing. That is to say, in believing himself necessarily in the right, and repelling beforehand the objections of all gainsayers as irrelevant."

You will here observe that Mr. Morley is rather warm on Rousseau because the latter is on good terms with himself, "affirms" somewhat hastily, believes in his own philosophy, and makes statements not altogether acceptable to the author of "Voltaire and His Times."

Now let us turn over a few leaves of this interesting, but somewhat negligently written book, until we arrive at his criticism of Socrates. What has he to say of this ancient telephonic mind? A mind through which the stored up wisdom of past ages was transmitted to humanity without stint and without price. Remember that John Morley—honest John, I may say, for I believe him to be one of the foremost men in England—reprobates affirmation. He would have men thinkers, not dogmatists, and would, moreover, in his more lucid intervals, ask us to clothe ourselves in mantles of Christian charity, or, which is the same thing, in garbs of good-nature. He writes thus: "Returning now to the true Socrates, what next shall we say of the familiar spirit of which he was only, he would say, the pupil and interpreter? If he believed in it, what shall we think of his reason? If he did not believe in it, what shall we think of his sincerity?"

In other words, Mr. Morley, utterly blind to events happening under his very nose; oblivious to Biblical phenomena; uninfluenced by the writings of Cicero, Plutarch, and others; disregarding the high esteem that Plato and Xenophon had for their old master; putting on one side with irreverent haste and negligence the long-sustained and universal belief in the strength and skill of Socrates' reasoning powers, and in his innate independence of character and love of honesty, Mr. John Morley, a comparative youth at the time this passage was written, presumes to say that—Socrates was either a fool or a knave!

Now I ask you all to study the life and character of Socrates as portrayed by his pupils, Plato and Xenophon; then to the best of your abilities strive to make yourself acquainted with the capabilities of Mr. John Morley; then, free from bias, and with philosophic calmness, determine for yourselves whether Socrates was a fool, or Mr. Morley a dunce, for at one of these conclusions the facts of the case compel us to arrive.

For my part, I have never swerved from the belief (the belief of ages) that in Socrates we see the father of European philosophy, a mind, vast and pellucid as a lake, compared to which Mr. John Morley's is but a puddle by the wayside.

Mr. Morley would have added to his reputation as a philosopher if he had avoided the fault he reproves in Rousseau. Men of "light and leading" should be more careful. Their cue is taken by smaller men, who, unable of themselves to originate an idea, fall down and worship the idol that kings of literature set up, and preach sermons from texts that are utterly false, and unparadoxably foolish.

We know that Socrates, Jesus, Paul, Fox, Wesley, and other great and inspired religious teachers, have uttered statements too unfamiliar, and too opposed to orthodox modes of thought, to be acceptable to ordinary minds, or rather, to men of only normal experiences. But it should be known and remembered that these great men were subjected to influences of a divinely spiritual character, and none were more conscious of this than they themselves. One and all recognised that they spoke as the Spirit gave them utterance—as their Father directed them to speak. In other words, Divine afflatus fell upon them, surrounded, and sustained them, and under its influence they spake as man never spake before; they spake with unequalled fire and energy, and with just such affection as was peculiar to their natures. Is it to be wondered at that the consciousness of the mighty sustaining power about them gave to their souls a feeling of deepest humility, moving them to declare that of themselves they were nothing; they were but instruments, voices, or the Word, of the Infinite Spirit of Nature. How can we obtain wisdom from the viewless, inconceivable personality of Deity except it be through a finite soul, who is, for the time, His word or voice?

The excuse, then, we are willing to accept for Mr. Morley is his ignorance of the world's psychological experiences; and the same excuse may reasonably be urged for atheist and other writers, who ridicule inspiration, healing by laying on of hands, and other spiritual gifts.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

On Thursday, the 17th, the London Theosophists held a conversation at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly. Invitations were issued to meet Mr. Sinnett. Some 270 assembled, and among them were many faces well known in society, and not a few men of letters and science whose judgment and opinion the world is accustomed to treat with deference. The company would be described in the language of the ordinary reporter as at once fashionable and influential. During the evening the President of the London Lodge delivered an introductory address which dealt generally with the pretensions of Theosophy, and its attitude towards the religions of the day. It was forcibly pointed out that as a religion Theosophy found nothing in the theologies of the hour that barred its acceptance. The speaker, a Catholic Christian, was in intimate accord with the author of Esoteric Buddhism, though they had drawn their inspiration from two such apparently divergent sources.*

But the feature of the evening was an address from Mr. Sinnett, in the course of which he stated with his usual force and clearness the position of the Theosophical Society. Before attempting an outline of what he put forward, I may remark that the publication of his book, and, in no less degree, the large gathering that he addressed, as well as the speech which he then delivered, mark a new departure in the history of Theosophy in London. So long as the Society was one of students, attracted by a common taste, and perhaps bound together by a common hope that some light would eventually dawn on the faithful watcher from the source of light and truth—the East, the world had little or nothing to do with the Theosophists. Even Spiritualists had no necessary concern with them except in so far as it was necessary to vindicate their own beliefs from assault, or desirable to comprehend a philosophy which so nearly touched their own interests. But now that the veil of secrecy has been to a considerable extent cast aside, the world and the Spiritualists are bound to consider the claims made on behalf of Theosophy.

What may be the answer of the various types of mind to which Mr. Sinnett addressed himself on Thursday last, I do not know. Possibly I should not be far wrong if I were to say that many would go away bewildered with a feeling that there are antecedent points of difficulty to be settled, before examining the superstructure so skilfully raised on a basis that has not yet been submitted to a sufficient examination. And it requires a more exhaustive study of the scheme of thought expounded in Mr. Sinnett's volume, and stated more popularly in his recent addresses at the Prince's Hall, and at various fashionable assemblies in London drawing-rooms, before I, for one, should like to commit myself to a statement of what unquestionably appears on the surface to be the irreconcilability of Theosophical and Spiritualistic belief. I do not know whether the doctrines that antagonise each other are, in the language of theology, cardinal and to be held de fide. I hope not: for if it be so then the knowledge of the Spiritualist is at variance with the truth as propounded by the Theosophist. No doubt it is on the great question of spirit communion that the battle will rage most fiercely. It is that which seems to me to be so utterly beyond accommodation. But this is a question far too wide and imperial in its import to be discussed with imperfect knowledge and with the insufficient space at my disposal. It is one to which it will be incumbent on me to recur. Meantime I return to Mr. Sinnett's address, of which I present a brief epitome.

He commenced with some words in explanation of the attitude in which the Theosophical Society stood towards the work in which it is engaged, and the adepts in India with which it is connected. To make these relations intelligible he entered, in the first instance, into an account of the objects with which occult devotees in the East pursued adeptship, and the nature of their achievement if they attained it. The purpose they sought arose out of their comprehension, in the first place, of that great scheme of human evolution set forth recently in Mr. Sinnett's book on "Esoteric Buddhism." For all mankind at this present stage of the evolutionary process, or for the vast majority, the exceptions so far hardly requiring to be taken into account in a broad, general sketch of the position, there was a certain sort of spiritual future awaiting each Ego at death. And this spiritual future might easily be one of great and elevated enjoyment. But the pursuer of adeptship aimed at something more than elevated enjoyment in the spiritual state; he aimed at great developments of knowledge concerning Nature, and at perpetuity of existence, even beyond that very remote period in future evolution up to which the majority of mankind might gradually drift.

Nature would not grant perpetuity of existence which itself was only compatible with very advanced and enlarged knowledge, to any Ego, however good and virtuous, as a reward for mere goodness. The natural reward of goodness was happiness in the spiritual state,—a happiness, the duration of which might enormously transcend the brief periods of objective existence in which it might have been earned, but which in the progress of ages would come to an end by the exhaustion of the causes which had produced it. The only way to get on in the evolutionary process beyond the stage to which goodness could carry the Ego was to develop supreme spiritual wisdom or knowledge, and that was the object at which the efforts of Adepts were directed. Now, above all things, the Adepts in pursuing this object were eager to unite their own progress with that of the human race generally to the utmost extent of their power to accomplish this. Far from being selfish in their struggle for development, they were in such a position as to know that a policy of selfishness would be fatal to their own advancement, and learned to seek this in the total abandonment of their own personal welfare as compared with the effort to benefit others. They were constantly engaged in intervention, by one means or another, in the affairs of the world, even though the conditions of their existence forbade them from intermingling with the world. Their action was carried on by means of those higher senses and faculties with which their occult training invested them. In reference to these powers, it was desirable that people who paid attention to the subject should understand that the Adept did not seek occult knowledge for the sake of the powers it incidentally invested him with any more than a patriotic soldier would seek a military career for the sake of wearing a red coat. The powers of adeptship were a very embarrassing fact connected with that state of knowledge, for these powers were the explanation of the apparently timid and seemingly unreasonable policy of silence and reservation in regard to their knowledge which the Adepts persisted in following. To teach people in general the mere philosophy of Occultism, if that were done freely and carelessly, would be to put them within the reach of secrets the possession of which would enable them, if willing to do evil to others, to work the most disastrous confusion all through human society and commit almost any crimes undetected.

On the other hand, it was conceived by the Adepts that the time had now come when it was necessary to fling into the current of human thought some knowledge of true spiritual science, that mankind might be armed, in advance, with a higher religion to take the place of superstitious creeds and dogmas by the time these should crumble away. It was out of this conviction, on their part, that the Theosophical Society had arisen. That Society, and the teachings conveyed to the world through its intermediation, constituted an offer of enlightenment to the civilised world in regard to true spiritual science, the importance of which could not be overrated. It remained to be seen how far the advanced thinkers of London would respond to that offer, how far they would realise the coherence, beauty, and truth of the teachings so far put forward, and unite in asserting an intelligent demand for more. That demand, to be successful, would now have to be made by a Theosophical Society which should take a somewhat new departure. Hitherto that Society had been rather a body of secluded thinkers and students, as far as the British branch was concerned at all events, than a body of persons seeking to make converts. Now the time had come when the Society had done all it could do along its old lines of effort. In order that its beneficent work might be carried on in the future on the larger scale now contemplated and to the grander results now hoped for, it was necessary that it should take up a position of dignity and influence, that it should be reinforced by qualified representatives of the culture and intellectual effort of the time, and that its hands should be strengthened for the task now lying before it. These considerations had suggested the demonstration of that evening, which was the first effort of any kind which the London Society had made to make itself known beyond the narrow limits of its original organisation. Comparatively small and insignificant to appearance as the Society might be at present, the facts of the whole position were such as to lead those who had studied them most closely to the conclusion that this little Society was in possession of the first gleams of the spiritual science which must ultimately become the religion of all the world.

In the course of his speech, and in further explanation of the point of view from which the Adepts themselves regarded the efforts embodied in the Theosophical Society, Mr. Sinnett read the following passages from a letter written by one of the greatest among them. The letter had been specially aimed at repressing the craving for scientific explanations of abnormal phenomena which had been freely expressed in the beginning by Europeans in India connected with the Society.

"It is not the individual and determined purpose of obtaining for oneself Nirvana (the culmination of all knowledge and absolute wisdom), which is, after all, only an exalted and glorious selfishness, but the self-sacrificing pursuit of the best means to lead, on the right path, our neighbour,—to cause as many of our fellow creatures as we possibly can to benefit by it,—which constitutes the true Theosophist.

"The intellectual portions of mankind seem to be fast dividing into two classes, the one unconsciously preparing for itself long periods of temporary annihilation or states of non-consciousness, owing to the deliberate surrender of their intellect, and its imprisonment in the narrow grooves of bigotry and superstition—a process which cannot fail to lead to the utter deformation of the intellectual principle; the other unrestrainedly indulging its animal propensities with the deliberate intention of submitting to annihilation pure and simple, or, in cases of failure, to millenniums of degradation after physical dissolution. These intellectual classes, reacting upon the ignorant masses which they attract, and which look up to them as noble and fit examples to follow, degrade and morally ruin those they ought to protect and guide.

"In view of the ever increasing triumph, and at the same time the misuse of free thought, it is time that Theosophy should enter the arena. Once delivered from the dead weight of dogmatic interpretations and anthropomorphic conceptions, the fundamental doctrines of all religions will be found identical in their esoteric meaning. Osiris, Krishna, Buddha, Christ, will be shown as different means for one and the same highway to final bliss, Nirvana. Mystical Christianity, that is to say, that Christianity which teaches self-redemption through one's own seventh principle—the liberated Para-atma or Augoeides, called by the one, Christ, by the other Buddha, and equivalent to regeneration or rebirth in spirit—will be just the same truth as the Nirvana of Buddhism. All of us have to get rid of our own Ego, the illusory, apparent self, to recognise our true self in a transcendental Divine life. But if we would not be selfish we must strive to make other people see that truth, to recognise the reality of that transcendental self. . . . Shall we devote ourselves to teaching a few Europeans, many of them loaded with the gifts of blind fortune, the rationale of the spiritual telephone and astral body formation, and leave the teeming millions of the ignorant, the poor, and the despised to take care of themselves and their hereafter the best they know how. Never. Perish rather the Theosophical Society with both its hapless founders, than that we, the devoted followers of that spirit incarnate of absolute self-sacrifice, of philanthropy, divine kindness, as of all the highest virtues attainable on this earth of sorrow, the man of men, Gautama Buddha, should ever allow the Theosophical Society to represent the embodiment of selfishness the refuge of the few, with no thought in them for the many."

To avoid the necessity for response to inquiries from any of our readers it may be well to state that all information respecting the Theosophical Society may be obtained from any of the following gentlemen:—

EDWARD MAITLAND, Esq., Oxford and Cambridge Club, Pall Mall.
SAMUEL WARD, Esq., Orleans Club, King-street, St. James's.
A. P. SINNETT, Esq., Empire Club, Grafton-street, Bond-street.

The Echo of July 20th, contains the following paragraph:—"We hear that Mr. Irving Bishop has actually sent to the Victoria Hospital for Children the magnificent sum of five pounds sterling, as the proceeds of the thousand pounds wager meeting in St. James's Hall. Considering that the Hospital was made a sounding-board for the meeting, considering the lofty and disinterested motives of the transatlantic thought-reader; considering the Hall was filled by people who had given a guinea, or a half-guinea, or five shillings, or a shilling, for admittance, it is rather disappointing to the Hospital to receive only five pounds, and particularly as some of the officers of the Hospital worked so hard to advertise Mr. Bishop." We do not share the disappointment of our contemporary, as we believe Mr. Bishop has pointed out of our contemporary, as we believe Mr. Bishop has done similar things in the United States and in some towns in Great Britain. It would appear, after all, that expositors of Spiritualism make more out of charities than do the latter out of expositors.

THE BRITISH THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.

As announced in our last, an open meeting of the London Lodge of the British Theosophical Society took place on Tuesday evening, July 17th, at 9 p.m., at the Prince's Hall, Piccadilly.

The principal object of the meeting was to meet Mr. A. P. Sinnett, who has recently returned to this country from India.

The address of the President of the Theosophical Society, alluded to in another column, was as follows:—

"No doubt, our guests will expect me to explain what is meant by the word 'Theosophy,' and what are the aims and objects of the Society over which I preside. I will attempt, in as few words as possible, to give a reply to both these questions.

"Theosophy is the science of the Divine. In this age the word science is readily understood; not so the word Divine. We Theosophists understand by the word Divine, the hidden, interior and primal quality of existence; the noumenal as opposed to the phenomenal. Our relations to the Divine we hold to be relations not to the exterior, but to the within, not to that which is afar off, but to that which is at the heart of all being, the very core and vital point of our own true self. To know ourselves, is, we hold, to know the Divine. And, renouncing utterly the vulgar exoteric, anthropomorphic conception of Deity, we renounce also the exoteric acceptance of all myths and legend associated therewith, replacing the shadow by the substance, the symbol by the significance, the great historical by the true ideal. We hold that the science of the Divine is necessarily a science of such subtle meanings and transcendent verities that common language too poorly conveys them, and they have thus, by universal consent throughout the world, found their only possible expression by the medium of types and metaphors. For metaphor is the language of the poet, or seer, and to him alone is it given to know and to understand the Divine. In the picture-world in which he lives and moves all interior and primal verities are formulated in visions rather than in words. But the multitude for whom he records his visions takes the metaphor for the reality, and exalts the idolon in the place of the God.

"The object of the Theosophical Society is therefore to remove this misapprehension; to unveil Isis; to restore the Mysteries. Some of us have doubted whether such act of unveiling and of restoration is altogether prudent, arguing that the quality of mind needed for the comprehension of pure truth is rare, and that to most supernaturalism and even superstition are necessities. The answer to such objection is that the present system of theological teaching has long been and still is an impassable barrier in the way of right thought and action, and of scientific progress; a fruitful spring of oppression, fraud and fanaticism, and a direct incentive to materialistic, agnostic, and pessimistic doctrines. In the interest of science, of philosophy, and of charity therefore, the Theosophical Society has resolved to invite all earnest thinkers, students, and lovers of their kind to examine the system and method it presents, and to satisfy themselves that the fullest claims of science are compatible with, and its latest revelations necessary to, the true comprehension of esoteric religion.

"I have used the word religion. It is a word which has unhappily become divorced from its true meaning, and associated with much that is inherently repugnant thereto. One of the efforts of this Society will be to restore to sacred things sacred meanings. Religion is the science of interpretation, the science of binding together earth and Heaven, the science of correspondences, of Sacraments, or as they were called in all old times, the Mysteries. And the religious man is he who is bound together, in whom heart and head have equal sway, in whom Intellect and Conscience work together and in harmony, who is at unity with himself and at one with the whole world of Being. In this sense we are a religious society, for one of our avowed aims is the promotion of universal brotherhood. We proffer an Eirenicon to all churches, claiming that, once the veil of symbolism is lifted from the divine face of Truth, all churches are akin, and the basic doctrine of all is identical. The guest of the evening, who stands beside me, is a Buddhist. I, the President of the English Lodge, am a Catholic Christian. Yet we are one at heart, for he has been taught by his Oriental gurus the same esoteric doctrines which I have found under the adopted pagan symbols of the Roman Church, and which esoteric Christianity you will find embodied in 'The Perfect Way.' Greek, Hermetic, Buddhist, Vedantist, Christian—all these Lodges of the Mysteries are fundamentally one and identical in doctrine. And that doctrine is the interpretation of Nature's hieroglyphs, written for us in sky and sea and land, pictured for us in the glorious pageantry of night and day, of sunset and dawn, and woven into the many-coloured warp and woof of flower, and seed, and rock, of vegetable and animal cells, of crystal and dewdrops, and of all the mighty phenomena of planetary cycles, solar systems, and starry revolutions.

"We hold that no single ecclesiastical creed is comprehensible by itself alone, uninterpreted by its predecessors and its contemporaries. Students, for example, of Christian theology will only learn to understand and to appreciate the true value and significance of the symbols familiar to them by the study of Eastern philosophy and pagan idealism. For Christianity is the heir of these, and she draws her best blood from their veins. And forasmuch as all her great ancestors hid beneath their exoteric formulas and rites—themselves mere husks and shells to amuse the simple-minded—the esoteric or concealed verities reserved for the initiate, so also she reserves for earnest seekers and deep thinkers the true interior Mysteries which are one and eternal in all creeds and churches from the foundation of the world. This true, interior, transcendental meaning is the Real Presence veiled in the elements of the Divine Sacrament: the mystical substance and the truth figured beneath the bread and the wine of the ancient Bacchic orgies, and now of our own Catholic Church. To the unwise, the unthinking, the superstitious, the gross elements are the objects of the rite; to the initiate, the seer, the son of Hermes, they are but the outward and visible signs of that which is ever and of necessity, inward, spiritual, and occult.

"But, not only is it necessary to the Theosophist to study the myths and symbology of former times and contemporary cults; it is also necessary that he should be a student of nature. The science of the Mysteries can be understood only by one who is acquainted, in some measure at least, with the physical sciences; because Theosophy represents the climax and essential motive-meaning of all these, and must be learned in and by and through them. For unless the physical sciences be understood, it will be impossible to comprehend the doctrine of Vehicles, which is the basic doctrine of occult science. 'If you understand not earthly things,' said the hierarch of the Christian Mysteries, 'how shall you understand heavenly things?' Theosophy is the royal science. To the unlearned no truth can be demonstrated, for they have no faculty whereby to cognise truth, or to test the soundness of theorems. Ours may be indeed the religion of the poor, but it cannot be that of the ignorant. For we disclaim alike authority and dogma; we appeal to the reason of humanity, and to educated and cultivated thought. Our system of doctrine does not rest upon a remote past, it is built upon no series of historical events assailable by modern criticism, it deals not with extraneous personalities or with arbitrary statements of dates, facts, and evidence; but it relates, instead, to the living to-day, and to the ever-present testimony of nature, of science, of thought, and of intuition. That which is exoteric and extraneous is the evanescent type, the historical ideal, the symbol, the form; and these are all in all to the unlearned. But that which is esoteric and interior is the permanent verity, the essential meaning, the thing signified; and to apprehend this, the mind must be reasonable and philosophic, and its method must be scientific and eclectic.

"In the Mahā-Parinibbāna-Sutta, one of the Buddhist theosophical books, is a passage recording certain words of Gautama Buddha which express to some extent the idea I wish to bring before you. It is this:—

"And whosoever, either now or after I am dead, shall be a lamp unto himself, and a refuge unto himself, betaking himself to no external refuge, but holding fast to the truth as his lamp, and to the truth as his refuge, looking not to anyone besides him, self as a refuge, even he among my disciples shall reach the very topmost height. But he must be anxious to learn."

"It may, at the outset, appear strange that there should of late have set in among us of the West so strong a current of Buddhism, and many, doubtless, wonder how it comes about that the literary and thinking world of this country has recently begun by common consent to write and talk and hear so much of the sacred books of the East, and of its religious teachers. The Theosophical Society itself has its origin in India, and the motto adopted by its Fellows declares that Light is from the East—Ex Oriente Lux.

"In all this is the finger of Law, inevitably and orderly fulfilling the planetary cycle of human evolution, with the self-same precision and certitude which regulates the rotation of the globe in the inverse direction, or the apparent course of the solar light.

"Human evolution has always followed the course of the sun, from the east to the west, in opposition to the direction of the planet's motion around its axis. If at times this evolution has appeared to return upon its steps, it has been only the better to gather power for some new effort. It has never deviated from its course in the main, save to the right or left, south or north, in its orderly march westward. And slowly, but surely, this great wave of human progress has covered the earth in the wake of the light, rising eastward with the dawn, and culminating mid-heaven with the Catholic Church. In India first, at the beginning of the cycle, rose the earliest glory of the coming day; thence it broke on Syria and on Egypt, where it gave birth to the Kabbalistic Hermetic gnosticism. Passing thence to Grecian shores, the mysteries of the gods arose among the myrtle and olive groves of Thebes and Athens; and these mysteries, imported into Rome in their turn, became merged in the symbols and doctrines of the Christian Church. And as the cyclic day of human development draws on towards its close in the western hemisphere, the light fades from the orient, and twilight gradually obscures that eastern half of the globe which was erst the spring of dawn and sunshine. What then? When the round of the terrestrial globe is thus accomplished, when the tidal wave of evolution has swept the whole expanse from India to America, it arrives once more at its point of departure. Scarce has day dipt beneath the horizon of the occident, then lo, again the east begins to glow anew with the faint dawn of another cycle, and the old race, whose round has now been accomplished, is about to be succeeded by a race more perfect, more developed, wise and reasonable.

"There are indications that our epoch has seen the termination of such a planetary cycle as that described, and that a new dawn, the dawn of a better and a clearer day, is about once more to rise in the sacred East. Already those who stand on the hills have caught the first grey rays reflected from the breaking sky. Who can say what splendours will burst from among the mists of the valley westward, when once the sun shall rise again?

"Some of us have dreamed that our English Branch of the Theosophical Society is destined to become the ford across the stream which so long has separated the East from the West, religion from science, heart from mind, and love from learning. We have dreamed that this little Lodge of the Mysteries set here in the core of matter-of-fact, agnostic London, may become an oasis in the wilderness for thirsty souls,—a ladder between earth and Heaven, on which, as once long since in earlier and purer days, the Gods again may, come and go 'twixt mortal men and high Olympus."

"Such a dream as this has been mine; may Pallas Athena grant me, the humblest of her votaries, length of days enough to see it, in some measure at least, fulfilled!"

Mr. Sinnett then addressed the meeting, speaking for upwards of an hour and a-half. As the subject matter of his address is dealt with in another column, we refrain from further notice now. It was nearly midnight before the meeting closed.

MR. HUSK'S SEANCES.—We are requested to remind the members of the C. A. S. that subscription seances are held with this medium every Thursday evening at eight p.m., at the rooms of the Association, 38, Great Russell-street. Tickets for admission, 2s. 6d. each, application for which should be made to Mr. T. Blyton, 6, Truro Villa, Station-road, Church End, Finchley, N., or at 38, Great Russell-street, W.C.

PIONEERS OF THE SPIRITUAL REFORMATION.—We have been asked to announce that the subscription list to the initial volume of this series will close on August 30th, and that therefore, those who desire to possess the work will do well to communicate at once with the publishers, The Psychological Press Association. In making this announcement we may perhaps be allowed to mention that the book will contain biographical sketches of three of the foremost figures in what may we think fitly be called the Spiritual Reformation of the Nineteenth Century. These men—Mesmer, Kerner, and William Howitt—were typical of their respective schools of psychological science, and all three may be regarded as the most prominent figures in the mighty movement of Modern Spiritualism. In the sketch of Mesmer's life and labours will be included a large amount of matter new to English readers. It needs no recommendation of ours to assure our readers that this new book will be well worth perusal—that goes without saying as regards anything which comes from so graceful and facile a writer as Mrs. Watts. The publishers inform us that the scale of prices for subscribers and those who obtain the book after it is issued will be rigidly adhered to. Full particulars will be found in another column.

SPIRIT TEACHINGS.

SECOND SERIES.

This series of Spirit-Teachings, like the former, is made up of selections from a great mass which have been automatically written during a series of years. They are selected on no other principle than that of printing what has been valuable to the person for whom they were originally given, in so far as this can be done without trenching on what is merely of personal and private application. The latter consideration excludes a great mass of what would otherwise be interesting and valuable matter. The phraseology has been preserved, as far as possible, intact, names only being omitted. The series follows directly on the first, from which, indeed, it is separated only by the accident of its publication in another journal, and after some considerable interval of time. The publication is resumed in deference to many repeated requests.

M.A. (Oxon.)

No. XL.

[The subjoined communication was written eight years ago, and is an amplification of some previous attempts to give information in the circle. At the time it was given I had no knowledge of the technical terms of metaphysics, or to be accurate, no clear conception of its technical methods, and of the exact sense in which its terms are employed. It is probable, therefore, that that lack in my mind affects the form, though not the matter, of this message.]

The blessing of the All-wise rest upon you. We endeavoured to convey to you truth as far as you can grasp it respecting the origin of spirit. The essential parts of what was imperfectly said are as follows: Spirit, of which you know naught experimentally, is a substance known to us as really as it is unknown to you. Your senses are not made to take cognisance of it. It is too ethereal, and escapes your notice. You can only trace it in its effects. Rarely can you do that, for you are not yet acquainted with the laws which govern gross matter. You are ignorant of many qualities which matter possesses: you do not know the laws which govern its changes, transmutations, and conditions. Still less do you know the far subtler laws which regulate the relation between spirit and matter: the processes by which spirit deals with material objects: the power it possesses of transmuting its conditions, and even of suspending its existence as it seems to you.

To you matter seems solid, objectively palpable, and real. To us it is of all grades or qualities of existence; from that which is barely cognisable—as certain forms of material existence are only microscopically visible to your senses—through the various grades which are best symbolised to you as æriform, fluidic, and solid. Nor is this dependent on any actual change in the objects themselves. When we used the symbol of the microscope we did not intend to imply minuteness. We only wished to convey to you that, as there are forms of material life only cognisable by you with the help of the microscope, so there are conditions of matter which, though perfectly substantial to you, are not so to us; nay, are not perceptible, and this may be, and is, entirely independent of size: taking place in objects respecting the objective solidity of which you would smile if a doubt were suggested. The cause of this is that matter to us is not an objective fact. Spirit is the real substance. Matter is only one of the modes of its presentation.

If you analyse your conception of spirit you will find that you regard it as eminently unsubstantial, vapoury, and formless; it may be that mist will symbolise your idea. If we were to say that the table at which you sit is only substantial in so far as it is spiritual, we should convey to you an idea which would not be comprehensible to you. Yet such is the case. To you the material fibre is substantial and objectively real. To us it is the spiritual part that is real, the material only cognisable by those of us who have become accustomed to visit your earth. A change of state in you would produce a similar effect. At times when we have opened the spiritual senses you have seen as we see. Matter then is shadowy, and spirit is substantial. This, then, is the first point that you must bear in mind. Spirit is a substance having form and shape. So the spirit-world is real and substantial, surrounding and underlying this material world; organised of spirit substance in various grades and degrees from the most impalpable vapour up to the densest solidity.

The realm of spirit pervades your earth; animates all things; and gives to animal, and plant, and vegetable its real existence. You are so constituted as not to see this, save fitfully and by clairvoyance, that is, by the opening of one of the spiritual senses by which you can discern spiritual things. That you do not always see it, is no proof that it does not exist. It only shows the imperfection of your senses, and the low plane of development which you now occupy. One day you will find that all that now seems real to you is only the shadow of the true: all that seems indisputably objective is only a phantasmagorical picture: all that seems drifting, airy, and uncertain is the true and the eternal, of which you only catch distinct glimpses as the mists that obscure your spiritual vision lift for a moment and show you the distinct prospect. So may the traveller pause to view the fantastic grouping of the clouds that dip down far into the valley below him; and as he amuses himself by watching their ever-varying shapes, and picturing to himself a story in their panoramic changes, lo! the breeze drives them aside for a moment, and on his eye burst the massive pinnacles of the everlasting hills which these airy phantasies have hidden from his gaze. The things which he saw were temporal, the things of which he caught only a momentary glance are eternal. Only, good friend, our traveller knows that his mists and clouds are baseless and unsubstantial. You make the mistake of supposing the material part of your world to be real.

That which mankind has thought fit to regard as indisputably real and objective is precisely that which is assuredly phenomenal and unreal. The spirit is the life, the reality, the eternal and essential substance. No one of you, as we have before said, has ever seen a human being. You do but know the shell. You can analyse its wonderful mechanism, complex in its multimorphic variety, but you cannot set it going when once it has stopped. Its variety and complexity no more set it in motion than does the multiplication of wheels give motive power to a machine. When the spirit is gone the machine stops. It is the spirit that is the real man: and instead of speaking of man having a spirit, you should be more accurate, and speak of a spirit possessing a body. And just as spirit underlies man, so does it underlie and inform all matter. All forces that hold the worlds in place and carry them in their orbits, are spiritual. Every force in its last analysis is spiritual. Light, heat, magnetism, electricity, are only the outer coverings of one inner spiritual force, respecting the Protean action of which you have yet all to learn. The time is not yet come. Spirit underlies all, we say. Wherever matter is, there you may unhesitatingly assert the presence of spirit. All that you see is formed, energised, and vitalised by spirit. Its outer material form is only the imperfect representation of its true spiritual form, a rough cast, as it were. It is a material reproduction of a spiritual prototype.

The elements of matter can have, as you must know, no power to assume form and shape; one of the essential qualities of matter is inertia. That your philosophers all admit. In its most subtle form it has absolutely no power of action. The most highly organised form of matter can no more act for itself than can the rock. The marble cannot roll out of the quarry sculptured in human form. The action of spirit must be brought to bear on it before that can be. Nor has law any more inherent power. Your statute books have no power to act. The worlds are not kept in their orbits by law, but according to law. The law is but the external expression of the energising force which underlies it. Those of your philosophers who talk thus of law, should, to be logically consistent, trust in the potency of a statute book, unadministered by any external power. Civil law, in the same way, is only the external expression of the rule and method according to which men act. The law is to the force which underlies it as the body of man to that which energises it. Both are spirit. And this spirit, remember, is substance. It is no abstraction, no impalpable force, but a real and essential substance, having power to grasp matter and wield it at will.

Wherever you turn you see evidence of spirit-action, from the worlds that roll in space to the tiny fern that grows at your feet. It energises all, and by a subtle process of chemistry to which your noblest efforts are puny and trifling, distils from dew and rain and air and light the delicious juices and fragrances, and moulds the lovely forms, to which you are so accustomed that you heed them little. Yet it is a truism to say that Nature makes the violet, the rose, the lily. Tell me, good friend, what is Nature, and what are her processes? By what power is that fragrance distilled? by what pencil was that petal painted? who moulded that symmetric form? You cannot answer. You know not. You have erected an idol and called it Nature, and you have labelled it with some formulae and called them laws; devices to conceal your ignorance. Nature is spirit, and her laws are spiritual. All your material substances, earth and air, water and fire, are the home of spirit

All your material forms, vegetables, animals, minerals even, are but crude disguises for spirit, the outer mask which encloses spirit. It were well that you ponder what has been said. We leave you now.

[On a subsequent day the communication was continued:—]

If you will bear in mind the point on which we have before insisted, much that would otherwise be hard of comprehension will be clear. Man is a spirit, and the spiritual holds together the corporeal. The fluctuating mass of atoms which form the physical body are kept in place and vitalised by spirit. When spirit is withdrawn they fall into corruption, moulder, and pass into other combinations. Spirit is the man; and conversely man, by virtue of his being a spirit, dominates all creation. He is in advance of all, being endued with powers which other created beings do not possess.

Yes, it seems all to work in with an orderly process of development.

Yes, we have told you before, matter on your globe has gone through divers stages from crystallisation—the rudest form of organisation—up to man. The rock and the earth yield to the plant. Vegetable life supersedes mineral. Sensation added, a nervous system given, and another form of more highly organised life is found progressively, being developed from the lowest zoophyte up to man. Each step is an advance on the last, and man crowns the labour of creation. You know of this. What we wish you to remember is that as spirit animates and energises all, so does it animate man: and that man differs in kind as well as in degree from all other entities by virtue of his Divine Soul. Here we pause, for we have completed one branch of our subject. Ponder what we have said, and you will find in it material for thought.

Yes, a good deal is familiar to me already, and it works in thoroughly with what is said in the Bible. What you and Magnus say throws much light on that book.

The spiritual meaning of the Bible is valuable. It is the literal interpretation that misleads.

DIRECT PRESCIENCE.

The following incident was told to me by the young lady herself and by the other members of her family, who were cognisant of it at the time it occurred, about seven years ago. There could be no question either of the truth of the narrator or of the clearness of her recollection. The occurrence is remarkable from the fact that the intimation of the scene she was about to witness, was conveyed without the intervention of dream or vision.

H. WEDGWOOD.

"I was nearly fifteen when the following event occurred to me. I had then belonging to me a tame siskin, to all appearance a perfectly healthy little bird. One night I awoke from sleep with a curiously strong impression upon my mind that my bird was dead. I was not conscious of having had any dream, but the impression was very strong, and a vivid picture was in my mind of my birdcage empty in its accustomed place in the dining-room window, with my mother and sisters standing round it. I had no doubt that my bird was really dead, and I went downstairs in the morning with a feeling of quite certain expectation, and saw without any surprise, standing in the window, the group, as I had imagined it, round the cage where my little bird had died in the night. I told them at once how I had known of this in the night, and that it was no surprise to me.

I have often had vivid dreams since unfulfilled, but this was not such a dream, and never again occurred to me.

THE "ST. STEPHEN'S REVIEW" ON SPIRITUALISM.—The St. Stephen's Review of June 30th contained an article entitled "Spiritualism and Spiritualists," which was written in a very fair and temperate tone. The vast interest now existent in the subject is recognised, and the author comes to the conclusion that there must be something in it. The only error which specially calls for attention is the statement that "Spiritualism, occultism, mesmerism, and Maskelyne-and-Cook-ism are one and the same thing." As regards the Egyptian Hall conjurers this is certainly not the case. They perform their tricks solely by mechanical and other means, and any one who has seen their show and also witnessed the phenomena which take place at seances, will readily see why no comparison can be made between the two. The one is entirely different from the other.

REVIEW.

SPIRIT TEACHINGS. By "M.A. (Oxon)" Author of "Psychography," "Spirit Identity," "Higher Aspects of Spiritualism," &c., &c. London: The Psychological Press Association, 38, Great Russell-street, W. C., and E. W. Allen, 4, Ave Maria-lane, 1883. 10s. 6d.

FIRST NOTICE.

"My thoughts being once seriously busied about the things that are, and my understanding lifted up, all my bodily senses being exceedingly holden back, as it is with them that are very heavy of sleep, methought I saw one of an exceeding great stature, and an infinite greatness call me by my name, and say unto me, 'What wouldst thou hear and see? or what wouldst thou understand to learn and know?'"

"Then said I, 'Who art thou?' 'I am,' quoth he, 'Piemander, the mind of the Great Lord, the most mighty and absolute Emperor.'"

These lofty, albeit quaint utterances from the second book of Hermes Trismegistus, might, with singular propriety, have formed an epigraph to the important work now under our notice. Its author, or more correctly speaking, its scribe, tells us that this volume "is the record of a period during which a spirit of a very lofty nature, calling himself 'Imperator,' was concerned with him."

The name and teaching of the spirit 'Imperator' are already familiar to the readers of "Light." The communications, however, which form the volume now issued by the Psychological Press Association, appeared originally in the Spiritualist newspaper. "They have been"—we are told—"subjected to revision by a method similar to that by which they were first written."

was as follows:—

"The communications which form the bulk of this volume," says "M. A. (Oxon.)," in his introduction, "were received by the process known as automatic or passive-writing. This is to be distinguished from Psychography. In the former case the psychic holds the pen or pencil, or places his hand upon the planchette, and the message is written without the conscious intervention of his mind. In the latter case the writing is direct, or is obtained without the use of the hand of the psychic, and sometimes without the aid of pen or pencil."

"Automatic-writing is a well-known method of communication with the invisible world of what we loosely call spirit. I use that word as the most intelligible to my readers. . . . These messages began to be written through my hand just ten years since, March 30th, 1873, about a year after my first introduction to Spiritualism. I had had many communications, and this method was adopted for the purpose of convenience, and also to preserve what was intended to be a connected body of teach-

Hermes Mercurius Trismegistus, His Divine Pyramider, in seventeen books, translated formerly out of the Arabic into Greek, and thence into Latin and Dutch, and now out of the original into English, by that learned divine Dr. Everard. London: Printed by J. S. for Thomas Brewster, at the Three Bibles, in Paul's Church-yard, near the West End, 1677. [Book Second, called, "Pyramider," p. 15.]

ing. The laborious method of rapping out messages was manifestly unfitted for communications such as those I print. If spoken through the lips of the medium in trance they were partially lost, and it was, moreover, impossible at first to rely upon such a measure of mental passivity, as would preserve them from admixture with his ideas. I procured a pocket-book, which I habitually carried about with me. I soon found that writing flowed more easily when I used a book that was permeated with the psychic aura; just as raps come more easily on a table that has been frequently used for the purpose, and as phenomena occur most readily in the medium's own room. . . . At first the writing was very small and irregular, and it was necessary for me to write slowly and cautiously, and to watch the hand, following the lines with my eye; otherwise the message soon became incoherent, and the result was mere scribble. In a short time, however, I found that I could dispense with these precautions. The writing while becoming more and more minute, became, at the same time, very regular and beautifully formed. As a specimen of calligraphy, some of the pages are exceedingly beautiful. The answers to my questions (written at the top of the page) were paragraphed and arranged as if for the press: and the name of God was always written in capitals and slowly, and, as it seemed, reverently. The subject-matter was always of a pure and elevated character, much of it being of personal application, intended for my own guidance and direction. I may say that throughout the whole of these written communications, extending in unbroken continuity to the year 1880, there is no flippant message, no attempt at jest, no vulgarity or incongruity, no false or misleading statement, so far as I know or could discover; nothing incompatible with the avowed object, again and again repeated, of instruction, enlightenment, and guidance by spirits fitted for the task. Judged as I should wish to be judged myself, they were what they pretended to be. Their words were words of sincerity, and of sober, serious purpose. * * * I never could command the writing. It came unsought usually; and when I did seek it, as often as not I was unable to obtain it. A sudden impulse, coming I knew not how, led me to sit down and prepare to write. When the messages were in regular course, I was accustomed to devote the first hour of each day to sitting for their reception. I rose early, and the beginning of the day was spent, in a room that I used for no other purpose, in what was, to all intents and purposes, a religious service. These writings frequently came then; but I could by no means reckon on them. Other forms of spirit manifestation came too. I was rarely without some, unless ill-health intervened, as it often did of late years, until the messages ceased." The reader is told elsewhere that "M.A. (Oxon.)," in order fully to abstract his mind from any conscious participation in the subject-matter of the "communication," was accustomed to read some book requiring close thought during the time his hand was used automatically by the communicating spirit.

There are further curious facts connected with the production of these "Teachings" which will find their parallel in the universal experience of "Psychics," in whom has been developed to any high degree the phenomenon of automatic writing—or drawing also, which is the picture-writing of the spirits, or teaching by ideographs. "Imperator," we learn, never attempted personally to convey to his pupil the power of automatic writing. From him flowed the teaching, the ideas, the words—probably derived by him from a yet more interior source, still nearer to the sphere of "the mind of the Great Lord, the most mighty and absolute Emperor," as Hermes has expressed it, and whose name or nature "Imperator" appears to bear. "Rector," however, a spirit who was seemingly able to write more freely through "M. A. (Oxon.)," and "with less strain upon him," acted as amanuensis to "Imperator." "At other times," we are told, and "especially since the production of the communications which form this volume, writings have apparently been given by a company of associated spirits who have made use of their amanuensis for that purpose." These facts are highly instructive in this connection.

The "Autobiographical" Element.

The volume consists of thirty-three sections or chapters, each one having affixed to it a short account of the occasion and circumstances connected with the production of the spirit-given communication which follows.

These affixes, records of very remarkable psychical experiences, and possessed of the peculiar interest ever attaching to the nature of autobiography, form an individual and important feature of the work. It is to these prefatory remarks that we owe our knowledge of the great conflict long waging in the mind of the scribe. To "Imperator" had been assigned—as these pages testify—no easy task in the remoulding the very firmly fixed opinions of his charge—opinions cast in the orthodox mould of the dogmatic literalism of the highly-cultured modern theological mind.

The hardest of hard shells of educated prejudice—a wall as of a very Bastille of Literalism had to be broken down—and that by a superhuman power of combined strength and gentleness suggesting as a fit symbol the steam-hammer of Nasmyth, which with force to shatter tons of iron at a blow, yet holding in check its terrific strength, can softly break the shell of an egg. The Divine-leading being of the gentle and persuasive, and not of the aggressive force, as regards the breaking of the iron wills of men, "Imperator's" work was of the most patient and gradual. At length, however, the truth-loving, truth-aspiring inner-nature of the scholar is reached—the prison-house of his mind is broken through, a new light of perception arises for him: he recognises himself as hitherto—though nurtured in the high learning of the schools of the world, as having been blind and in bonds. From his mental eye-sight, now, however, fall the scales, and from his spiritual being the chains, and he has found himself at length seeing and free, a man inspired with the free-spirit, prepared in the school of the Spirit in his turn to become a guide to the blind and a liberator to the bound.

It is only through careful perusal of these interesting autobiographical portions of "M.A. (Oxon's)" book that an adequate conception can be formed of the great task performed by the spirit "Imperator," and this not alone in his especial charge, but also for those who peruse the teachings given through the hand of his pupil, who for their sakes, as well as his own, in truth, wrestled with an angel until the morning dawned.

Here and there, "few and far between," as veritable "angels' visits," in the unfoldings of religious literature has been given forth some book, cast out of the overflowing heart of the writer, a personal record of the mental earthquakes undergone during the process of death to some old faith, and birth into a new one. Such books have won for themselves a sacred niche for all time in the heart of humanity. They have met the needs of countless dumb, but not less earnest and afflicted wrestlers in the great struggle with Divine Truth. Their value is incalculable. They may be regarded as mirrors, wherein the wrestler, in the pauses of his own conflict, may see his countenance reflected and illumined by the uprising sunshine of hope. Such are the "Confessions of St. Augustine" in the old, Newman's "Apologia" in the modern days of the Roman-Catholic Church; the "Apology" of Barclay amongst the early Quakers; amongst the mystical writers the autobiography of Madame Guion, and the much less known autobiographies of the disciples of Nicholas of Basle.

In these world-famous books, however, with which, in some degree, not unadvisedly, we venture to associate this volume of "Spirit Teachings," we find the process of Regeneration wrought out by what we term intellectual reasoning or thought; or else brought about through the emotions of the heart. Writer and reader consider the process one that is simply effected by a far off and veiled operation of the Holy Spirit acting upon the mind and heart.

In the book of "M.A. (Oxon.)," we meet with an entirely new feature; and in this, to the Theologian and to the Psychologist, will consist the primal importance of the book. The process and the results have been the same in all these records of the birth into the new life; but, in the remarkable book now under consideration, we have the modus operandi clearly unveiled to us. In this record—as is the case in all the manifestations of spiritual phenomena of these modern days—when pursued carefully to their source—the machinery which sets in movement thought in the mind, and emotion in the heart, is distinctly made evident to us. Here we can behold at their labours the springs of influence—call them what you will—which are the bearers of ideas from yet more interior sources—the elaborators of the thoughts, beliefs, and actions of men. These supernatural intelligences are shown face to face to us—the curtain being withdrawn between the two worlds. In this book we do not hear alone the soul or mind of man questioning and answering itself, as in a drama with one actor alone, but when the mind of the man questions—the answer comes clear and distinct from the spirit of "the mind of the Great Lord, the most mighty and absolute Emperor," speaking in the voice, or many voices, from the world of spirits, which we clearly now perceive to environ and permeate the world of matter.

In its form of question of the pupil, and answer of the teacher, by which these dignified spirit-communications are conveyed to the world, some readers may be reminded of two renowned ancient religious poems: namely of the "Bahagavat Gita" of India, and the "Imitation of Christ" of Thomas A-Kempis, in its original poetical form in Latin. The mortal pupil Arjun questions the Divine Teacher Krishna, receiving answers from him, as man answering man: the humble monk "asks and receives" in the name of the Lord Christ; both receive spiritual communication of a nature accordant with the age and people amidst which they dwelt, nevertheless marvellously kindred in spirit to each other, and adapted to the universal needs of the spiritual-man of all ages and of all nations. So it is ever with the works worked by "The Spirit," since its laws are universal and uniform. No wonder, therefore, if the children of the Spirit proclaim their high lineage through their strong family likeness. "Imperator's" teachings, universal in their nature, are equally adapted to the mental requirements of their recipient and of the age in which they were received.

To the subject-matter of these "Spirit Teachings" we shall return in a second notice.

A STRANGE PHANTASM.

A curious adventure occurred to me in connection with Mr. Angelo, which I will mention here for the benefit of those who like ghost stories. In March, 1869, alighting from a train at Buckingham, I saw Mr. Angelo get out of a compartment next to mine and walk across the platform in company with a couple of young fellows who were very gay and frolicsome. One of them gave the other a push, upon which the latter said: "Isn't he behaving badly, Mr. Angelo?"

I intended to accost Mr. Angelo, but thought I would wait until he had parted with the two gentlemen, who were strangers to me. Presently they both entered a private carriage, which had come to the station for them, and drove off, but when I looked around for Mr. Angelo, I saw he had disappeared. I imagined he had entered one of the waiting rooms and lingered about the entrance of the station for a quarter of an hour, but he was not to be seen. I thought this rather strange at the time, for the Buckingham station on the arriving side had but one approach, and Mr. Angelo could not have walked away along it without being noticed by me.

In the following week I was at Harrow, and lunching at the King's Head with a young relative of mine, when the conversation fell upon fencing, and the boy casually alluded to his fencing-master as being the successor of Angelo, who was dead.

"Dead?" I exclaimed, "How very sudden. Why, I saw him not a week ago."

"You couldn't have seen Angelo, the fencing-master," answered the boy, "for he has been dead some years."

I really stared. If there had only been the evidence of my eyes as to Mr. Angelo's appearance on the platform of Buckingham station, I should have concluded at once that my sight had deceived me, but I had distinctly heard Mr. Angelo addressed by name. I had the plainest recollection of having heard one of the two young men, in whose company he was, say, "Isn't he behaving badly, Mr. Angelo?" On my return to town from Harrow I went to St. James's-street and had the fact of Mr. Angelo's death some years previously amply confirmed by Mr. McTurk. Here the story ends. Nothing ever came of the apparition I had witnessed. It brought me no portent; it had not been preceded by any thoughts about Mr. Angelo, and it was followed by no circumstances which can throw the faintest light upon it, so that of course I am bound to submit to the inference that I was labouring under an optical and acoustic illusion.

Still I am not convinced of this myself, in my private mind, and I have always thought of the incident as being one of those mysteries which are perhaps thrown into our lives to make us wary of scoffing too readily at strange things reported by others.—From "Seven Years at Eton," edited by James Brinley Richards.

THE SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

A general meeting of the members of this Society took place on Wednesday, July 18th, at Willis' Rooms, King-street, S.W., Henry Sidgwick, Esq., President of the Society, occupying the chair. The attendance was fairly large and representative, what it lacked in point of numbers as compared with previous gatherings, being probably owing to the advanced state of the season. The proceedings were opened by the ## President's Address.

Before the real business of the meeting commences, I should like to say a few words on an important aspect of the programme and work of the Society, which is liable, I think, to be imperfectly understood by friends no less than foes. Of the two, it is more important at present that our position should be as thoroughly and as widely as possible understood by our friends—I mean by those who are willing to co-operate with us; since, up to the present time, those hostile to our work have mostly delivered their criticisms from so very broad and distant a view of it, that it would be too sanguine to hope that they could be affected by any explanations of details.

The point to which I refer is our claim to be a scientific society, and to carry on our work in a scientific spirit and by scientific methods. Some not unfriendly critics have urged on me that this pretension is absurd: "You may be right," they say, "but at any rate it is a pitched battle between you and modern science; if you win, modern science will receive a hard blow." If this were true, I for one should entirely decline so unequal a struggle; but we hold it to be the reverse of true. We admit, of course, that the majority of scientific experts still keep aloof from us, and that the agreement of experts is the final test of the establishment of truths;—indeed we may apply to the scientific world what an eminent statesman has said of the political world, that the main duty of a minority is to try to turn itself into a majority. But this is just what we hope to do; not so much by direct controversy, as by patiently and persistently endeavouring to apply to the obscure matters which we are studying methods as analogous as circumstances allow to those by which scientific progress has been made in other departments.

And even now I conceive that the conflict between our view—either the general assumption on which we proceed or the particular facts which our committees claim to have established—and the views of the majority of scientific men, is really much less profound than many conflicts that go on within the field of recognised science. For there we continually see an internecine struggle of opposing positive doctrines; but what we have opposed to us is not really any positive doctrine or proved method of another school of inquirers—much less any established, positive conclusion of science—but mere sweeping negations of persons who have mostly given no study or thought to the matters about which they deny; or, at any rate, a mere general presumption against what appears to have no affinity to facts already systematised. With the few positive contributions which physicists or physiologists have offered towards the explanation of the phenomena we are investigating, we have no conflict whatever. We recognise in almost all cases a partial truth in such explanations; what we maintain is that a careful comparison of them with the facts shows them to be inadequate.

A very different objection seems to be sometimes felt to our attitude of scientific inquirers by some of the persons who are in the best position for assisting our investigations. I mean persons who believe themselves to have certain knowledge on the most important matters on which we are seeking evidence, who do not doubt that they have received communication from an unseen world of spirits, but who think that such communications should be kept as sacred mysteries and not exposed to be scrutinised in the mood of cold curiosity which they conceive to belong to science. Now we do not wish to appear intrusive; at the same time we are anxious not to lose through mere misunderstanding any good opportunities for investigation: and I therefore wish to assure such persons that we do not approach these matters in any light or trivial spirit, but with an ever-present sense of the vast importance of the issues involved, and with every desire to give reverence wherever reverence is found to be due. But we feel bound to begin by taking these experiences, however important and however obscure, as a part of the great aggregate which we call Nature; and we must ascertain carefully and systematically their import, their laws and causes, before we can rationally take up any definite attitude of mind with regard to them. The unknown or uncommon is not in itself an object of reverence; there is no sacredness in the mere limitations of our knowledge.

This, then, is what we mean by a scientific spirit; that we approach the subject without prepossessions, but with a single-minded desire to bring within the realm of orderly and accepted knowledge what now appears as a chaos of individual beliefs. In saying that our methods are scientific we do not of course pretend to possess any technical knowledge or art, needing elaborate training. "Science," as an eminent naturalist has said, "is only organised common-sense;" and on ground so very new as most of that is on which we are trying to advance, the organisation of common-sense, which we call scientific method, must necessarily be very rude and tentative. Indeed, the value to us of the scientific experts whom we are glad to count among our number depends much less on any technical knowledge or skill, than on the general habit of mind—what I may call the "higher common-sense"—which their practice of scientific investigation has given to them; somewhat greater readiness and completeness in seeing considerations and adopting measures which, when once suggested, are not only intelligible, but even obvious, to the common-sense of mankind at large.

For instance, nothing can be more obvious than the need of making as systematic and extensive a collection of facts as possible, partly in order to establish as fact what we believe, can only be established by such an accumulation of evidence; and partly in order to obtain by classification a general view of the leading characteristics of the facts, so that we may be started in a right direction for investigating their conditions. But this need does not seem to be thoroughly understood. Thus a representative of the intelligent public has informed us that we have now given facts enough, and that the intelligent public now demands from us a satisfactory theory of them. Speaking for myself, I am afraid I must ask the intelligent public to restrain its impatience for a year or two more: a restraint which hardly ought to be difficult, considering the length of time for which it has remained in a state of contented nescience on these subjects. Again, a friend who has sent me a valuable first-hand narrative of Thought-transference at a distance, has thought it needful to apologise, on the ground that we "must be inundated with these stories." Well, it is in one sense true that we are inundated; the stream of them keeps flowing in more strongly than I had anticipated: but we wish to be still more inundated—the tide is a favourable one and it cannot rise too high for our purposes.

And this leads me to speak of the desire which the Council entertain to get as much co-operation as possible in the experimental work of the Society. We have endeavoured by the "Circular No. 1," printed in our last Proceedings, to stimulate the formation of local committees and independent centres of investigation in the subjects, especially, of Thought-transference and Mesmerism. I am sorry to say that this circular has so far produced little effect: I wish, therefore, earnestly to call the attention of our members to it, and emphasise our desire for the kind of co-operation which it suggests. Any great increase in the numbers of the committees appointed by the Council seems undesirable: but these committees would be glad to give the benefit of their experience, in any way that may be desired, to any local committees that may be started on an independent basis for this kind of research—or supposing such local committees to prefer complete independence, we should be no less glad to avail ourselves of their results. In short, if any member or associate of our Society feels moved to assist in any part of our work, and does not find that the circular to which I have referred gives him sufficient guidance as to the best method of doing this, he has only to write to the secretary of the committee whose sphere of operations interests him most, and the committee will do their best to find for him a useful line of co-operation.

I may mention that we had hoped, with a view of interesting our members generally in our work, to arrange for the exhibition of some mesmeric or other experiments at the monthly meetings of which one or two have been held during this season. Circumstances have, unfortunately, prevented this; but we still hope to carry out the plan when these meetings recommence after the long vacation.

I have said that we cannot have too many well-attested narratives or records of experiments, even with a view to establishing the general trustworthiness of the results. The reason for this lies in the impossibility, or extreme difficulty of absolutely excluding, in any one case taken by itself, explanations of the phenomenon recorded which refer it to causes already recognised by science. This leads me back to the question of the scientific method of dealing with the evidence attested; as to which, again, we find ourselves in prima facie opposition with the majority of scientific men. But here, again, as I have said, the opposition does not arise from any general unwillingness on our part to accept the explanations of our opponents; on the contrary, we are especially anxious to give them all due weight in the collection and treatment of our evidence. We only refuse to admit them where we find that the hypotheses manifestly will not fit the facts.

Thus, e.g., before coming to our conclusion as to Thought-transference we considered carefully the arguments brought forward for regarding cases of so-called "Thought-reading" as due to involuntary indications apprehended through the ordinary senses; and we came to the conclusion that the ordinary experiments, where contact was allowed, could be explained by the hypothesis of unconscious sensibility to involuntary muscular pressure. Hence we have always attached special importance to experiments in which contact was excluded; with regard to which this particular hypothesis is clearly out of court.

Again, take Faraday's well-known experiments on table-turning. I have no doubt that Faraday rendered a real public service in preventing ignorant persons from supposing an unknown force to explain the turning round of drawing-room tables when a group sit down to it in an evening party. And if the eminent physicist had been able to explain in the same simple and effective way, the rarer but yet strongly attested cases in which tables are reported to have moved without contact, or to have risen altogether off the ground, he would have "exploded the whole nonsense of table-lifting." But we submit that it is not a scientific way of dealing with a mass of testimony to explain what you can, and say that the rest is untrue. It may be common-sense; but it is not science.

Here, however, our more careful opponents, when they cannot find a physical explanation for the facts related, fall back on various psychological explanations of the fact that they are related. They say that the reporters have been deceived by "conjuring tricks" or illuded by "expectant attention," or led into involuntary exaggeration from the impulse to entertain their hearers with marvels, or have laid undue stress on accidental coincidences, through oblivion or non-observations of instances on the other side:—or when there is nothing else left they simply say, with more or less polite circumlocution, that we must be telling lies.

Here, again, we admit that every one of the suggested causes—not excluding the last—has been, in the history of human delusion, a vera causa of marvellous narratives; and the whole detail of our procedure in the different departments of our inquiry is governed by the need of carefully excluding them. What we venture to think unscientific is the loose way in which our opponents fling them about, without any proper attempt to define the limits within which they are probable.

Thus, e.g., when a man pays a guinea to attend a spiritualistic exhibition in a room over which the recipient of the money has perfect control, it is reasonable to attribute to preparation and sleight of hand whatever of the results could be produced by a professional conjurer on his platform; but it is not, therefore, equally probable that similar results in a private dining-room are due to the hitherto latent conjuring powers of a strange housemaid. When a man goes to a house which he knows to be haunted it is not a noteworthy fact that he dreams of a ghost; or even if he lies awake at night in a nervous condition, he is likely to mistake the rattle and sigh of the wind for evidences of ghostly visitants; but it is not, therefore, plausible to explain by "expectancy" apparitions for which the seers are wholly unprepared, and which they at first take calmly for their relatives. When a marvellous story is told after dinner by a person who heard it from a friend of the brother of the man who was actually there, we may reasonably suppose that an indefinite amount of thrilling detail has been introduced in the course of tradition,—especially if the links in the chain of tradition are supplied by persons who are not accustomed to regard scientific accuracy as important in these matters—but it is not therefore legitimate to explain in this way a narrative which is taken direct from the diary of the original eyewitness.

Our endeavour, then, is primarily to collect phenomena, where these and similar explanations have at least a high degree of improbability. In no case can such explanations be absolutely excluded—for all records must depend, ultimately, on the probity and intelligence of the persons recording them; and it is impossible for us, or any other investigators, to demonstrate to persons who do not know us that we are not fools or liars. We can only hope that within the limited circle in which we are known, either alternative will be regarded as highly improbable.

Reports having been read from the Committees on Mesmerism and Dreams, which, however, are not as yet ripe for publication,

Professor Barrett, F.R.S., presented to the meeting an account of some experiments in the interpretation of muscular indications, made by the Rev. E. H. Sugden, B. Sc.; also of some further experiments in Thought-transference by Messrs. Guthrie and Birchall, of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Liverpool; and the Hon. Mrs. Fox-Powys.

The last named lady had addressed the following letter to the Committee:—

"I send the results of a trial my husband and I had alone. To me it seemed like magic! We had tried, I think, three times before this, just for a short time, with indifferent success. I was the guesser, and he held my left hand with his right, and merely thought of a number. I sat with my eyes closed. It was the rapidity with which it was done astonished us—I cannot say, but the number seemed to flash instantaneously into my brain. In fact, so simultaneous was it that I began to think perhaps that I had flashed the number into Mr. Powys' brain first. However, when we reversed the operation and made my husband guess, he was not at all successful. With single numbers I only had one, and with double numbers two trials.

which makes 10 right on the first trial out of 18; one right on the second trial, and one number reversed.

"We tried again next night, but only got five right on the first trial out of 20, and two right on the second trial. The secret of success the first evening I believe to lie in the fact that I felt absolute confidence in my power to guess correctly, and to this height of confidence I have never since been able to attain, and it was certainly lacking in the former trials."

The proceedings shortly afterwards terminated.

Esoteric Buddhism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In reference to the letter signed "G. W. M.D.," in "LIGHT" of this day's date, will you permit me to express the regret I feel that the writer has allowed himself to use language in speaking of the Indian Mahatmas which must deeply wound the sensibilities of all your Theosophical readers. Controversialists governed by good feeling, not to speak of good breeding, generally refrain from attempts to ridicule that which other men hold sacred, but "G. W." has attacked the esoteric doctrine in the spirit which animates the least respectable assailants of Christianity. I think all Theosophists who interest themselves in the current Oriental teaching will applaud the discretion I showed in refusing to subject the portraits "G. W." mentions to his unsympathetic inspection. I cannot prevent him from insulting a name we revere, since that has been put, by the publication of my first book, within the reach of his ungraceful pen, but I can keep pictures which are my private property from becoming the subject of inappreciative comment.

It is difficult to understand how any man of ordinary intelligence could, without intending to misrepresent the teachings of my recent book, have caricatured these after the manner of "G. W.'s" almost ludicrous epitome; but the letter before me is not worth serious reply in so far as it deals with intricacies of thought the writer has failed to follow, and is even less worthy of this in so far as the vulgarity of its tone here and there eclipses its other peculiarities. But it would be affectation to regard the initials used as disguising its authorship, and this deeply aggravates the offence against good taste involved in its allusions to the Ariat teacher who is generally regarded by Theosophists, both in this country and in India, as entitled to their earnest reverence. It is wrong for anyone to insult the reverential feelings of others, even in careless forgetfulness that such feelings exist, but it becomes disgraceful to do this when it is done deliberately, with full knowledge concerning the nature and diffusion of the feelings engaged.

A. P. SINNETT.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you allow me, as a fellow of the London Lodge of the Theosophical Society, to enter my humble protest against the superficial criticism upon Mr. Sinnett's "Esoteric Buddhism" by your correspondent "G. W. M. D."

"G. W.'s" letter is another proof of the danger of presenting spiritual truths to minds not sufficiently freed from the thralldom of personality to grasp great general principles.

The flippant tone adopted is an evidence, in my opinion, that your correspondent has mistaken his vocation, which should be that of a contributor to some comic serial, rather than that of a critic in matters so vast and deep as those contained in the book which he essays to review.

Notwithstanding the writer's modesty in "restraining his sentiments," his opinion of the work in question lies on the surface, viz., that because he does not understand it, therefore it must be nonsense, a dictum which I am afraid will have more weight with your correspondent than with myself, at least.

The calm, dignified, spiritual manner in which "C. C. M." treated the subject serves only to intensify the poverty of your correspondent's thought, and indicates how ill-qualified he is for the office which he has assumed.

At the risk of being classed by "G. W." in his category of "incorrigible Buddhist and other lunatics," I venture to assert that in the philosophy which is now being unfolded by esoteric teachers through the Theosophical Society, I find the solution of more spiritual difficulties than in any other system; and whilst blessing Mr. Sinnett for striking the rock in the midst of the spiritual desert, I will not complain if, in assuaging my thirst at the life-giving stream, I am obliged to swallow foreign particles which, in a plethora of spiritual knowledge, I might feel inclined to take exception to.

I write simply as an individual member of the Society, without committing anyone else to my opinions, and am, yours truly,

EDMOND W. WADE.

Lee, July 21st, 1883.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—A letter from G. W. M. D. in last week's issue of "LIGHT," cannot be allowed to pass unnoticed and without a protest.

"G. W. M. D." shows from the tone of his remarks that his long association with a society which he now considers it good taste to ridicule, has not been the result of sympathy with the objects to which that society is devoted, and his unmeasured abuse of, and scoffing at, those gifted beings of whose teachings, I, and, up to the present, he also has been a recipient, strike his fellow students of the philosophy with surprise and indignation.

"G. W. M. D." considers the purity and elevation of the higher ones as a fitting subject for jest, and infers that those who reverence them are "incorrigible lunatics." Such may be the opinions and practice of the "higher minds of our Western civilisation," among whom, doubtless, "G. W. M. D." classes himself; but the whole allusion to the baths, fumigations, and glass-case does not shew either good feeling or intelligence, and is certainly not in accord with the sentiments one might expect to animate a member of a society having for its object the development of the principle of universal brotherhood.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

CAVENDISH ROOMS, 51 AND 53, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

That the controls of Mr. Morse should propose to speak upon "The true Eden" was sufficiently suggestive of doubt whether the Garden, so-called, was the place or the condition indicated, to prepare the audience of these rooms, on Sunday last, for the prompt discharge of that particular myth from their mental horizon. The historian may continue to indulge in speculation as to the geographical situation of the place, which may or may not have been in the mind of the Biblical writer; and in its symbolical meaning the story of the associated primitive innocence, and deplorable collapse, of its human tenants may not unprofitably exercise our imaginative faculties; but not as the true Eden.

This represents a condition of perfected existence, with its blissful surroundings, so far unlike the abode of an originally God-like being that its very beauty and sweetness will be the result of the struggle for happiness through knowledge, and an acquired purity of actual life, by man himself. The true Eden of absolute goodness has yet to be built up: it is in no sense a structure of the past, and unlike the fabled domain of innocence, will grow out of the badness of that past felt and resisted; and indicate, by its simple existence, that complete and final subjugation of the grosser, by the unfettered predominance of the higher qualities of Humanity.

The condition, and if we like so to speak of it, the place, having thus to be worked for, will be won only by collected wisdom, strength of mind, and universal exaltation of character, representing the development of the purposes of God by the conscious creatures of His will, as distinct from unfelt because innate and uncontrasted goodness, located on the scriptural garden.

It is of real practical consequence to regard the position as demanding that men's lives shall be the expression of their highest principles, and that the true Eden should equally express the highest happiness of which man is capable upon earth, for until we have mastered the elementary conditions of a progressive system here, we shall find no heaven elsewhere. To labour for such an ideal is to secure fitness for its enjoyment. Complete success may be beyond the reach of the efforts of to-day or of to-morrow, but the earnest struggles of every day, wisely directed by acquaintance with the character of the need, will hasten the hour for its achievement. We were recommended to try a little self-examination—to ask, each of us: "What am I?" "Why am I what I am?" and "Being what I am is it the best that I can be?" for if there is a hell within us there can be no Eden outside of us.

"The Kingdom of Heaven is within you," and we must be individually able to sustain the qualities of Eden life, the harmony, peace, and happiness which belong to and indicate that state of being, if we are ever to realise the beauty of that profoundly beautiful utterance.

The lecture for Sunday, the 29th inst., will be upon "Human Progress: its Source," and the evening of the 5th of August will be devoted to question and answer, the last occasion of the kind of the season.

LIVERPOOL.

In Rodney Hall, Rodney-street, on Sunday morning, July 15th, Mrs. Emma Hardinge Britten gave an inspirational oration, her subject being "The World of Supernaturalism." She rapidly sketched the supernatural gifts and powers which have been manifested amongst all peoples and in all times, and described the wonder-workers of India, the magicians of Egypt, the soothsayers of Chaldea, and the sibyls of Greece and Rome. She traced the history of supernaturalism amongst the prophets and wonder-workers of Israel, claiming that the Spiritualism of the Christian dispensation and the apostolic period formed no hiatus in the chain of spiritual manifestations. Mrs. Britten then dealt with the history of supernaturalism in the Middle Ages, and described the gross ignorance that prevailed on the subject of witchcraft and sorcery. She urged that the discoveries of Mesmer throw the light of science on the world of supernaturalism, and that the development of modern Spiritualism supplemented and explained the supernaturalism of all past ages, and would prove the harbinger of promise that would ultimately unite the long-severed interests of science and religion. In the evening, Mrs. Britten spoke on "Ancient and Modern Freemasonry." The origin of masonry, she said, would be found in the worship of the power of nature. She alluded to the Hindoo, Egyptian, Greek, and Roman mysteries, and traced out their succession from land to land, declaring that the germ of these mysteries was preserved in the Jewish Kabbala. She then enlarged upon the building of Solomon's Temple, and described how the Jewish monarch, unable to find any wise men of the nation competent to interpret the mysteries of the Kabbala, sent to Hiram, King of Tyre, for cunning workmen instructed in the mysteries of building such a temple as she held would correspond to the grand lodge of the universe. Mrs. Britten then dealt with the building of the temple, the institution of three degrees, the legend of the master mason's degree, and the four subsequent degrees which culminated in the royal arch. The proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to the lecturer.—Liverpool Mercury.

THE GOD-IDEA.

PART I.

In writing about the massacre of the innocents at Sunderland, the Spectator raises that old and perplexing question, the inscrutable nature of the Divine Will. Such considerations as the following must have presented themselves to every reflecting mind when now and again some desperate catastrophe shocks and saddens us, and even when it meditates on the daily tale of human suffering and sorrow, or on the way in which the weak, however pure and good, are ground down and tortured by the strong who prey upon them.

The Spectator meditates thus:—

"What should we say of a man who, merely by putting a thought into Mr. Fay's head, the thought to stand at the gallery-door and see the children out in batches, could have prevented that ghastly massacre, and did not put it? Yet that must be true of the Almighty, if any one of our ideas about His attributes is true, if He foresees, if He is all-powerful, if He has free-will. Apart from the suffering—suffering often to the good, for it was probably the kindest parents who sent their children to the show—why does He allow all that monstrous waste of life among the innocent, that destruction of potential usefulness? The only answer is the simple and unsatisfying one that we know nothing about the matter, and never shall know all, though we may know much more than we do now. Man cannot know the policy of God, which is not shewn as changed, but as always the same, in these great catastrophes. They do but concentrate a process which never stops. Taking Asia and Europe together, the half of all children born die before they are two. It is certain that more children died in London in the week of the catastrophe, unnoticed, than died in Sunderland to the horror and pity of the world. It is quite probable, though there are no statistics, that more children died in the United Kingdom still-born on Saturday than died in that staircase shambles. Vast, unending, inexplicable waste of life, never utilised even for a little while, is the law of the planet, the will of its Creator, as little to be made intelligible by thought as the endless mystery of non-educative pain. Theology gives us no more light on the subject than Science does, and though it is best, or at least most comforting, to think that the children are the happier for escaping this life and its miseries, there is no proof of that—rather evidence from analogy that they lose an opportunity which would have been to their profit. Why not, if the world, and life in the world, are, as we all suppose, of any use at all? Men are not the better for escaping, but for fulfilling, duties. There is no explanation whatever to be found, nor is there any need of one. If man acknowledges God at all, he must acknowledge a Being whose wisdom must be so far above his own that failure to perceive it is failure in the creature, not in the Creator. It may not be an absurdity, though it seems one to us, to recognise God, and yet think that He can err; but it is certainly a folly to think that we can detect error in Him. The theologian, like every other man, is studying the Infinite, and when he has thought himself out, he can only acknowledge that he is always at last face to face with a mystery past his solution. Thought sometimes only helps us to pile up more figures on the recurrent decimal."

Is there any answer to this? On the Spectator's assumption of a Personal God, who is omnipotent and omniscient, and who possesses free-will, I can see none whatever that is even moderately satisfactory. I can find none that does not do dishonour to my idea of God: none that would not revolt the moral consciousness, to say nothing of the affections of an average human father. We must apply to God our own standard of morality, or we shall become involved at once in difficulty. And to consider for a moment that heartrending catastrophe was Divinely foreseen, could have been and was not Divinely prevented, is to call up to the mind a picture of the Deity which one does not like to glance at for a moment. That there is no intellectual need for any explanation of this mystery, I cannot agree. The Spectator feels the need, or it would not waste time in such discussions. Have Spiritualists any light to throw upon the subject—the old Free-will and necessity difficulty in one of its many forms?

I am not prepared to discuss the question on metaphysical grounds, nor to offer any opinion, here and now, on the explanation which Mr. Sinnett, in his recent book, gives of this and similar difficulties. If there be, indeed, no heart in the government of the universe, nothing but the ceaseless march of inexorable law, then there is no more to be said. To complain that the feelings and affections are shocked by any product of a law is merely foolish, if there be no law-giver with "a heart of ruth" in him who can be touched by our supplications. Nor is it relevant here to apply the words of any revelation to the settlement of this question. For those who accept as final the revelation made to man by Christ the question is already closed. For those who desire reverently to apply their knowledge of the things of spirit, experimentally gained, to supplement and support that belief which is of Faith and not of Sight, the question is an open one. Nor need the description be tainted with any word or thought that lacks the fullest reverence. There is nothing necessarily irreverent in the most free and searching discussion of any question that touches religion; though many, no doubt, shrink from applying to what belongs to their peace here and hereafter the methods of thought and analysis which they use in every other inquiry. There is nothing irreverent in free handling, though many will be ready now, as heretofore, with the parrot-cry: "This blasphemer saith." But Spiritualists are used to that. What have they to say, then?

This first. We are hampered in our most elementary attempts to grasp the idea of God by the difficulty most of us feel in conceiving intelligence without the limitations of a personality, such as that with which we are familiar in ourselves. Few have grasped the notion that in the higher development of spiritual life this personality may be done away, and what we loosely call the individuality, now so prized, be lost for ever. I am not pretending that this is so: I am merely saying that it is difficult for many, whose thoughts have never run in this direction, to conceive of it as possible. Most people, consciously or unconsciously, associate the idea of a Supreme Intelligence with their highest ideal of human perfection. Their God is, in fact, a glorified man with all human faculties and qualities developed to the pitch of perfection: a Being of perfect power, wisdom, and beauty, but a Being in the form of man.

Again. Spirits who return to earth have little to tell apparently of God, except in cases where the subject matter of the communication is manifestly tinged with the private opinions of the medium. But, putting aside such messages as quite unauthoritative, the general drift of spirit-teaching is curiously in the direction of what I may call a refined and spiritualised Pantheism. It seems as though the dissolution of the "prison-house of the body" had removed the great barrier to the conception of a Supreme Intelligence, a Great Over-soul, untrammelled by the limitations that we throw around our conceptions of Him. We hear little of the Great Judge, of the King of Heaven, of the Ancient of Days on His throne "high and lifted up." We hear much of the tender care of the guardians, of their benevolent interference with this world, of the educational methods that they employ. To their listening ear comes the cry that brings willing aid and loving sympathy, and not, as it seems and as is indeed probable enough, to the ear of the Supreme. Of Him (if we must still speak of Him under human limitations) we hear little, and of Him they who come to us evidently know nothing of a surety. How should they? Yet they say much of the blessing that comes of earnest prayer, and inculcate the duty upon us. Its reflex benefits, as well as its direct blessings, are uniformly insisted on. But it is the intermediary agent that hears and responds.

If this conception be in any degree approximate to truth, it is manifestly erroneous to speak of God permitting, or not preventing, or specially arranging events and occurrences on this earth. Such terms are inapplicable. To talk, therefore, of "vast, unending, inexplicable waste of life" as "the will of the Creator," is to convey a misconception as great in a different way as that other strange saying of the Spectator's, that "no explanation is needed" of this perplexing waste of human life, "this mystery past solution." All our glimpses behind the veil that enwraps the future in obscurity, go to shew us a battle-ground of contending powers of good and evil. We dimly see that the human spirit is strengthened by conflict, perfected through suffering, nerved to resist temptation by reiterated assault. The powers of evil wage war with the good, and it is the din of strife that fills our ears. Over all it is a pious belief that there reigns the Supreme Power, aloft, enthroned in eternal calm, while the ministers and messengers discharge their several duties of succour and support, and while the adversaries, hating light, and warring with the good because it is good, carry on the conflict out of which issues development and progress for humanity. But, be this as it may—and we must betake ourselves to the Bibles of various faiths to trace the development of the God-idea—to represent this Supreme Being as, in the anthropomorphic conception of a vulgarised theology, He is represented, is to substitute for the reticence of an ignorance that preserves its reverent faith the crude and foolish imaginings of a mind that has lost its reverence in the mazes of audacious speculation. When God is pictured for us as a man of infinite power and wisdom, and yet as careless of our lives, and heedless of our woes, the mind that thinks at all rejects the idea as that of a God palpably made in the image of man, the outcome of his crude conceptions, and having no probable existence or verisimilitude.

Better far the vague conception of an Over-soul, a pervading Spiritual Essence, impersonal though it be, and interfering, perhaps, in no wise with the affairs of this world of ours, than the most definite and highly-coloured conception of a glorified man, who is at once able to do all we need, whom our cries can reach but cannot touch, yet who is idly careless of our fate, as he leaves us struggling in the meshes of the pitiless and tyrannical law which encompasses us on this side and on that. Such a God is too obviously human; too crudely anthropomorphic to be taken seriously. The higher Spiritualism has done much already to break this image, and if it does not replace it by another, it, at least, leaves the domain of faith where mystery reigns, undisfigured by the intrusion of a palpable Fetish. It leaves the Great Spirit Supreme, but it refuses to avow and illustrate its ignorance by imposing upon Him limitations of "body, parts, or passions," or comprehending Him in human form. Still less does it depict him as the impossible tyrant that vulgar theology has made Him.

THE SEYBERT BEQUEST.

A special telegram to the Chicago Tribune, from Philadelphia, Pa., says: "The late Henry Seybert, who gave the new bell for Independence Hall, left a large number of bequests, amounting to over half-a-million, for public and charitable uses, among which was one of 50,000dols. to endow a chair of moral and intellectual philosophy in the University of Pennsylvania, with the expressed wish that the university would respectfully and thoroughly investigate Modern Spiritualism, in which he was a firm believer. The university accepted the bequest, and has now begun steps to carry out the wish of the testator. A commission has been appointed of which the chairman is Dr. William Pepper, the Provost of the university, and a gentleman of acknowledged scientific attainments of a high order. There is now on hand available for the prosecution of the investigation the sum of 1,000dols. No formal meeting of the commission has as yet been held, although there exists among the members a general understanding of the work and the necessities of the investigation. No member thereof is openly committed to a belief in the 'so-called Modern Spiritualism,' so that it is doubtful whether they will be able to arrive at those conclusions which would have been most gratifying to Mr. Seybert." It further appears that the commission does not view with much favour the examination of spiritual phenomena. The Religio-Philosophical Journal thinks this episode shews the supreme folly of a Spiritualist, with plenty of money and a desire to advance the interests of Spiritualism, who delays doing his duty in his life, and then leaves a large sum for the purpose in his will. Instead of using the money as intended by the donor, it is to be prostituted by the opponents of Spiritualism and spent in fighting the theory of spirit communion. We hope there may possibly be some way by which the University of Pennsylvania can be compelled to constitute a commission which shall carry out the intention of the donor, but it is doubtful.

WHO SHALL SAY

That from the world of spirits comes no greeting?
No message of remembrance? It may be
The thoughts that visit us, we know not whence,
Sudden as inspiration, are the whispers
Of disembodied spirits speaking to us
As friends, who wait outside a prison wall
Through the barred windows speak to those within.

—Longfellow's Michael Angelo, in Atlantic Magazine.

The current issue of the Fortnightly Review contains an article by Dr. Donkin, entitled "Miracles and Medium Craft," upon which we shall have something to say shortly.

"WHAT WENT YE OUT FOR TO SEE?"

The Religio-Philosophical Journal of July 7th, has a spirit message entitled "What went ye out for to see?" which is full of sound common-sense. We make a few extracts:—

The Popular Estimate of Spiritualism.

Examination into a subject embracing so much that is beyond the limit of physical sight and hearing, requires far more skill than is required to decide upon a case based simply upon obtainable evidence. And yet some of the most intellectual among men, do not hesitate to condemn any and all phases of spiritual phenomena, and their decisions are accepted by the world as final. Because an opinion has obtained popularity, is no evidence that it is right, and should not be appealed from. Experience proves that the majority is as liable to be in error as the minority, and we will go still farther and say that in the majority of cases the minority is more apt to be right than the majority. Numbers may add weight, avoidupois, but it is questionable whether they always embrace the greater amount of intelligence. Therefore, in forming an opinion, it is unwise to accept the opinions of numbers without examining into their intellectual attainments.

The Motives Actuating Investigators into Spiritualism.

The spiritual séance is not a place for curiosity seekers. If there are no higher aims than to gratify this morbid spirit, then it were better that the doors of the séance room be closed against them, regardless of what they may say or do. There is no safety for mediums or honest investigators so long as the spiritual séance is made a public highway, and every one applying for admission should be asked: "What came ye for to see? A reed shaken by the wind, to see a table tip, to hear a rap, to see a materialised form? What did you come for? What are your motives?" Such questions might be considered impertinent, but they are in every sense proper. What man will admit a stranger into his home without inquiring the nature of his business? What man will allow another to call him friend, without first informing himself whether the one professing friendship is every way worthy? There is no necessity for yielding to former customs when they have been proved detrimental to the general welfare of mediums and inquirers into the truths of Spiritualism. When investigators learn to deport themselves as they would have to upon entering any church or religious gathering, and respect the feelings and opinions of Spiritualists, it will be time enough to admit them, and not before. We hold that there is no place so holy as the séance chamber; it is there you meet with those who have passed to the better land; you are holding communion with the spirits of those mourned as dead but who, in the kindness of their souls, return to assure you that they still live. And if any human being is entitled to respect, it is the returning spirit.

The Real Meaning of Spiritualism.

We regard the words chosen as a basis for our remarks quite as applicable to Spiritualists as to those beginning their investigations into the subject; and we would recommend all to ask themselves what they are looking for; if only a reed shaken by the wind or by spirit power, to go to their homes and remain there until they are duly prepared to continue their investigations. There are vast numbers who seem to think that witnessing phenomena is the whole of Spiritualism; they never, after witnessing the phenomena, think it necessary to search for the laws underlying these manifestations, and if asked to explain some of the principles they profess, are wholly incompetent to do so; the most they can do is to relate what they have witnessed, and are often surprised that the whole world is not converted to Spiritualism. Let such persons count up the number they have been instrumental in bringing into the spiritual fold, and their wonderment will cease to astonish them. Another class ignore all phenomena, and seek only for what they are pleased to term the more intellectual phases, but this is like teaching the child its alphabet; they carry with them their old ideas of people entering heaven in droves, which cannot be done; no man can enter a heavenly state until intellectually qualified to comprehend what that state is. Men never attain eminence at a single jump; every step of the way must be carefully studied; our most prominent lecturers, besides having abilities, make use of every opportunity to cultivate their natural inherited gifts, and what is beneficial in one department, will be found equally so in every department.

"What came ye out for to see?" Is there anything about Spiritualism that is not explainable? Do you expect to see a miracle wrought? If so, you will be disappointed. And yet you may witness similar manifestations to those occurring in the presence of the medium of Nazareth. The people called the healing of the sick a miracle, because the methods adopted were new to them. But there is no mystery about this kind of manifestation to-day; they are so common that people have ceased to wonder at them or to relate them to their neighbours. In the early days of spiritual dispensation the healing of a sick person by laying on of the hands, would have been, and no doubt was, the wonder of the age. But the present race have become familiar with those things and pass them by with as little concern as they would the most trivial circumstances in every-day life. A few years ago a materialised spirit form would have filled the world with wonderment, but it is not so now. You speak of such manifestations as among the common occurrences of life, and yet how few there are even with all the enlightenment of the age, that fully realise that when they look upon a spirit form, or listen to a spirit speaking to them, that things are what they purport to be. You don't seem to grasp the reality of the matter; only think for a moment that what has been the burden of ages from remotest time down to the present, the cry has been, "O God, give us some proof of a future life;" but age has followed age into the bottomless abyss of time and space, and these anxious souls have, one by one, dropped out of the line of march, without any proof of immortality. But how is it to-day with the gates of the spirit-world flung wide open, and the so-called dead coming back and taking upon themselves temporal bodies, and controlling another's ignorance of speech—for what purpose? Simply to answer the prayers of the ages, to prove that there is no death. Do you love to hear them tell of their homes in spirit life? Does it bring you any nearer the great Over Soul? And do you feel to thank all the powers that be, that your lot has been cast in such heavenly places? We are afraid a great many may forget even themselves upon such occasions, and treat the returning spirits with less consideration than they would a boon companion returning home from a journey.

Modern Spiritualism is peculiarly adapted to meet the wants of all truth-loving souls. There is not one grain of sense in the structure of mankind but what is appealed to, and all that is required is for mortals to lay hold of the facts before them and profit by them. Spiritualism to become a success, must be separated from immoralities; whatever appeals to the baser passions, and tends to degrade mankind, must not be saddled on to the already loaded backs of spirits. Let mortals bear all their own burdens of this character, and study how they can rid themselves of all that is vile and unseemly in them. Let your investigations be made in a spirit of earnestness, with humility and candour, and we promise you, you will not return to your homes unrewarded. The people of this age seem not to understand how much they are aroused above all preceding ages, but we trust ere long that there will be a general awakening of the people to their own best interests. We are not travellers here, bound to some distant clime. This is your home, you are in your school boy days, learning a little every day. May we continue to learn through the unmeasurable entries of the future, and find that happiness which can only come from honest motives and manly endeavour.

SPEAKING MEDIUMSHIP.

M. Alexandre Vincent, one of the contributors to our contemporary, Le Spiritisme (Paris), continues his correspondence with the "Docteur incredule." His last letter treats of "Speaking Mediumship;" he says:—

"This is one of the most remarkable phenomena met with in the study of Spiritualism. What is said by spirits through mediums varies much in quality, due sometimes to the former, sometimes, from defectiveness of one kind or other, to the latter. Mediums are entranced more or less deeply when they are thus used; the entrancement is a preliminary condition. The controlling action of the spirit may be imperfect, or it may be so complete that it might be regarded almost as a temporary incarnation; through some peculiar sensitiveness of the medium's nervous system the spirit seems, in such cases, so completely to possess himself of his organs, presents such characteristics of individuality, that the medium's own personality seems quite effaced.

"The possibility is suggested by you, as it has been by many others, of such persons playing a part, but playing such parts would require a perfection of high histrionic art, of which these persons, these mediums, are known not to be the fortunate possessors. I have been present when one of them has passed through seven or eight trances; the control of one spirit ceasing, the medium has lapsed into a state of complete passivity, to rise presently under that of another, each in succession manifesting a totally different character and individuality. I remember once, at the commencement of a seance, the medium passing under the control of a spirit whose influence induced a kind of epileptic fit, and this, passing off through a magnetiser present breathing upon the medium's epigastrium, another spirit controlled him, and gave an instructive explanation of the incident. One plays for diversion or profit; there was neither in this case to the medium.

"Remember that all these phenomena are presenting themselves wherever Spiritualism is investigated. Is it to be supposed that a great number of persons, foreign to each other, in all quarters of the globe, could arrange for so extensive a mystification of this kind?"

"Then comes your suggestion that if not 'playing a part' it may be hallucination. But I would ask you what kind of hallucination is that in which the subjects of it exhibit enviable powers of sustained and elevated reasoning?"

"No, the simplest, easiest, and most rational conclusion one can arrive at from a consideration of the facts is that spirits of those gone before manifest themselves thus, and communicate with us. Such is the representation that they themselves make, and it is confirmed by their furnishing verifiable particulars of their personality and history."

MAGNETISING INANIMATE OBJECTS.

Herr Wiesendanger, a surgeon of Hamburg, writes to Licht that he made the acquaintance a few years ago of an honest workman, whom he found possessed of a clear intellect and a strong desire for knowledge, and to whom he introduced the subjects of Spiritualism and magnetism. His new disciple made some good cures by magnetising; but about them there was a singularity. After the first few magnetisations the patients had vomiting, after which the cures advanced rapidly. At spiritualist seances his presence was proved to be so unfavourable to the evolution of phenomena that he ceased to attend them, reserving his studies entirely to magnetism.

"Last Christmas," to quote from Herr W.'s letter, "he came after a long absence, and said that he had been experimenting upon inanimate objects—wands, canes, umbrellas, &c. He could not, he said, repeat any of his experiments then, for he was not in the right condition; his capability was intermittent."

"He came a fortnight afterwards, and we witnessed a phenomenon of so singular a kind that I engaged him to reproduce it, if possible, before a few scientific friends. He agreed."

"At the appointed time he came. All being arranged, he received a walking cane from one of us, turned his face from us, in order, he said, to avoid abstraction of his attention; then having given the cane a vigorous rubbing with his hands, he rested its end on the floor and with his fingers supported it at an angle of 20 or 30 degrees; having concentrated his gaze upon it for some seconds, he withdrew his fingers, and the cane remained standing in its oblique position; continuing his gaze, he slowly drew back, making energetic drawing passes, and the cane followed him with a continuous tremulous movement."

"The experiment was repeated several times in the course of the evening. A penholder on the table also followed, with little jerking movements, the direction given to it by his will."

Since then Herr W. reports, and his report is confirmed by other letters from Hamburg,—that the phenomenon has been produced before many persons, and is exciting attention among the scientific. The editor of Licht concludes: "The record of objects charged with vital magnetism, moving without contact of the magnetiser, is a very long one, and is well-known to all students of magnetism, and it might be made a great deal longer. The question interesting to us is—how far the agents—the visible agents—power as magnetisers is complicated with some power in them as mediums. We are convinced that Spiritualism, in one of its divisions, and magnetism are branches of one science. A comparative study of spiritual and magnetic phenomena would throw light upon each other, and would enable us to solve certain obscure problems in mediumship. It would also afford additional light to those who at present do not see cause enough to attribute mediumistic facts to anything but some unconscious operations of a 'Psychic force.'"

"UNCONSCIOUS MEDIUMSHIP."

The following extracts from the life of the celebrated Charlotte Brontë, by the late Mrs. Gaskell, will supplement Miss Theobald's article bearing the above title.

It is interesting to find this testimony borne to the truth of "inspirational theory" of literary composition by one of our most highly imaginative and popular female novelists.

Hears a Spirit Voice Speaking in Verse.

"She (Charlotte Brontë) told me ('Mary,' her early school-friend) that one night, sitting alone, she heard a voice repeat these lines:—

'Come, thou high and holy feeling,
Shine o'er mountain, flit o'er wave,
Gleam like light o'er dome and shieling.'

"There were eight or ten more lines, which I forget. She insisted that she had not made them; that she had heard a voice repeat them. It is probable that she had read them and unconsciously recalled them. They are not in the volume of poems which the Sisters published."

Mode of Composition.

"I remember many little particulars which Miss Brontë gave me," says Mrs. Gaskell, "in answer to my inquiries respecting her mode of composition. She said that it was not every day that she could write. Sometimes weeks and even months elapsed before she felt that she had anything to add to that portion of her story which was already written. Then some morning she would wake up, and the progress of her tale lay clear and bright before her in distinct vision."

Of the composition of "Villette," Miss Brontë thus writes to her publishers: "It is not likely that my book will be ready at the time you mention. If my health is spared, I shall get on with it as fast as is consistent with its being done, if not well, yet as well as I can do it. Not one whit faster. When the mood leaves me (it has left me now, without vouchsafing so much as a word or a message when it will return), I put by the MS. and wait till it comes back again. God knows, I sometimes have to wait long—very long. . . . However, I can but do my best, and then muffle my head in the mantle of Patience, and sit down at her feet and wait." Mrs. Gaskell observes that at such times when she could not write "She could not see her people nor hear them speak; a great mist of head-ache had blotted them out; they were non-existent to her."

Inspiration During Sleep.

"I asked her," writes Mrs. Gaskell, "whether she had ever taken opium, as the description given of its effects in 'Villette' was so exactly like what I had myself experienced—vivid and exaggerated presence of objects, of which the outlines were indistinct or lost in golden mist," &c. She replied that she had never to her knowledge taken a grain of it in any shape—but that she had followed the process she always adopted when she had to describe anything which had not fallen within her own experience: she had thought intently on it for many and many a night before falling to sleep—wondering what it was like, or how it would be—till at length, some time after the progress of her story had been arrested at this one point for weeks, she awakened in the morning with all clear before her, as if she had in reality gone through the experience, and then would describe it word for word as it had happened. I cannot account for this psychologically; I only am sure that it was so because she said it."

PAINLESS SURGERY.—Dr. Chazaraïn sends the following note to Spiritisme (Paris): "Madame D.'s nursemaid Julie came to me suffering from neuralgia. I discovered that it arose from some decayed teeth, and told her they would have to be extracted. She required a little time to think about that. Returning home, her mistress thought of magnetism and made passes over the face; this gave relief but it did not last. In the course of the day, Madame D., who is a medium, received a communication from her guides to the effect that Julie's teeth might be extracted without pain if she were put to sleep, and that they would help. Madame D. sent a note to me informing me of this, and asked me to appoint some hour next day for performing the operation. I appointed the hour and went accordingly. Julie was ready, and after a few moments' application of Madame D.'s hands to her face passed into the somnambule sleep, during which she answered questions and observations quite well. I removed three teeth without her flinching, and at my leisure arrested a considerable bleeding from the disrupted vessels by applying perchloride of iron. During the whole time Julie gave no sign of pain or uneasiness, and when she was awakened she evidently knew nothing of what had passed."

THE DIVINING ROD.

There are few unexplained phenomena more remarkable than the peculiar "gift" which certain people seem to possess of discovering a subterranean well by the aid of a branch of the common willow. Those who possess this gift are so few that one might be inclined to think that the phenomenon is merely an illusion, but several recent examples have shewn that this is not the case. We are, for instance, informed among others on the most reliable authority that there is a man living at present in the parish of Hultsjö, near Jönköping, in Sweden, who has on several occasions demonstrated that he possesses the gift in question. The gift has thus on many occasions been called into request by farmers desirous to obtain water from subterranean wells.

The proceedings are very simple. The person who possesses the gift provides himself with a willow branch with three sprigs, which he grasps firmly with both hands in such a manner that one of the sprigs points upwards. With the branch in this position he walks over the ground where water is wanted. When approaching the spot where the well is situated a peculiar trembling of the willow branch occurs; it begins to twist and crack in the carrier's hands, and when on the actual spot where the well is, the sprig pointed upwards immediately bends to the earth. The distance between the spot where the trembling of the branch began and where the sprig struck, indicates the depth at which the well will be found. If borings are effected in this spot water will most certainly be found.

If the above-quoted example was all that existed in support of this strange phenomenon, a great deal of doubt might still attach to the belief in its existence. We find, however, that at a recent meeting of the Scientific Association of Christiania, which is constituted of the most learned Norwegian scientists of every branch, the phenomenon formed the lecture of the well-known Professor Lochman, of the Christiania University, undoubtedly the most distinguished physiologist Norway can boast of, who not only expressed his belief in the existence of such a gift, but stated that he himself possessed it. He had not formerly believed in the same until he discovered that he possessed this peculiar gift, which he had over and over again tested by experimenting on the subterranean water conductor at his country house. He could, however, give no explanation of the cause of the phenomenon, and he, therefore, urged that the Association should effect experiments with such persons who were shewn beyond doubt to possess the same gift, which would, perhaps, in time explain its cause. He himself thought that the phenomenon was of a physiological nature, and of similar character to that of certain metals exercising a peculiar influence over certain individuals. Professor Monrad, an eminent confrère, believed the phenomenon to be of a psychological nature, and might be referred to those termed "presentiments." Professor Schütz did not consider it to be of a physical nature.

The existence of the phenomenon has thus been asserted beyond doubt. It would be a matter of great interest to unravel its nature.

C. S.

The third part of the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research is now out and may be obtained at this office.

Spiritualism does not seek to undermine religion, or to render obsolete the teachings of Christ. On the contrary, it points out and leads by a scientific method thereto. It can evidence, illustrate, and confirm His work and words. In an age when faith is weak and hard pressed by Science, it can testify by actual knowledge, and render certain what to many minds had become doubtful. It does not ask a Christian to disbelieve his Bible, but only to understand it. It can help him when his knowledge of the original tongues, however profound, affords him no satisfactory aid; and it is only Modern Spiritualism that can bring many statements into the region of fact.

A GHOSTLY NARRATIVE COMMUNICATED BY A. M. H. W.

How Sam Bough Crosses a Haunted Hill.

May, 1882.—My cousin, Mrs. James Macdonell, communicated to me this experience of the late well-known Scotch landscape painter, as related to her by himself. Sam Bough's life was full of strange adventure as quaint and original as himself. This incident must have occurred during the earlier period of his career. I have endeavoured, as nearly as possible, to reproduce each word as I heard it.

Sam Bough had been hard at work with some men lading a vessel with ballast somewhere on the northern coast. It was evening; Sam Bough and his companions were tired with their hard labour, and had some distance to walk to the public-house where they were to sleep.

Two roads led to this house. One, the longer way, round the foot of the mountainous hill, the other, much the shorter, across the hill. It was rapidly growing dark. "There's the house across the brow of the hill—there," said Sam Bough to his companions; "what do you mean by taking this lower road?" "We won't cross that hill at dark!" returned the men. "No, not for anything—not us! It's not canny!"

"Stuff and nonsense!" answered Sam Bough, and whistling his dog to follow him, up the hill he went. "We'll see, my friends," said he, "who will first reach the public-house."

"So," said Sam Bough, "up the hill I went, up and up. It grew darker and darker. At length I drew near to a small wood on the hill-side. I began to feel queer. Not that I saw anything, nor that I heard anything—but I felt something! It was very odd! My knees were weak; my breathing was queer. I was queer all over. Still, I was determined that nothing should stop me. I was not afraid of ghost or devil—what was there to fear? I felt queerer and queerer! I burst out into a sweat all over me—a cold sweat. I lifted my hands to my head, and I felt all my hair standing up from my skin. My hair lifted my hat! I looked at my dog. He was hanging his tail between his legs—I could just see that in the dark. I whistled to him, but he turned suddenly round, and fled back again down the hill as fast as he could go. Well, I was very queer. I could scarcely move. But push on I would, all in the sweat as I was. Once through the trees, and across the brow of the hill and beginning to descend on the other side, I was better. My knees were less weak; and gradually the queer feelings passed off."

"I was the first at the inn after all. So soon as I got inside the door, I dropped down into a chair."

"What's come to you, mister?" asks an old woman in the room, "What's come to you?"

"Nothing," said I.

"Hasn't it then?" says the old woman; and she takes down a bit of a broken looking-glass from the chimney-shelf, and shews me my own face in it, white as a sheet.

"You've been through the wood and across the hill!" says she, "there's no mistake in that!" and she runs out and brings me some brandy. And very thankful too I was to drink it," added Sam Bough.

SPIRIT TEACHINGS.—A lady writes:—"This book of 'M.A. (Oxon)'s' ought to have a wide sale amongst 'inquirers' as well as amongst confirmed Spiritualists, since it is quite a unique book, not from the fact of its automatic production, but from its giving the chronicle of the growth of a highly cultured mind into freedom of the spirit through converse with a spirit. No doubt mental growth is in thoughtful minds usually thus produced, but the process is in this remarkable book unveiled to us."

Now, as in all times past, there are two kinds of Spiritualism—the one lawful, reverent in its attitude, and pre-eminently beneficial in its results; the other unlawful, and as irreverent and baneful. A most clear and marked distinction is drawn between the two—i.e., between necromancy and a lawful communion with the dead. Paul refers to both. While condemning witchcraft and sorcery on the one hand, he extols spiritual gifts on the other, even going so far as to counsel the seeking of the best gifts.

The credentials which Spiritualism has to offer are indisputable facts—facts as hard and stubborn as those which have been deduced from any physical science. The witnesses of these facts are innumerable, and the character of many unimpeachable. Upon this basis we may well be content to rest our raison d'être. Spiritualism does not fear inquiry: it has nothing to lose, but everything to gain thereby. All that it desires is a candid and honest method of investigation, and not a rough and ready mode of settlement, as too many scientists, unfortunately for themselves, have adopted.

SPIRIT TEACHINGS. By "M.A. (Oxon):" Author of "Psychography," "Spirit Identity," "Higher Aspects of Spiritualism," &c., &c. London: The Psychological Press Association, 38, Great Russell-street, W.C., and E. W. Allen, 4, Ave Maria-lane. 1883. 10s. 6d.

SECOND NOTICE.

We now turn to consider the philosophy, together with the varied subject-matter which form the contents of the book.

Its philosophy may be more justly termed a lofty Theism than that which ordinarily would be understood as constituting the philosophy of orthodox Christianity.

The Christ as, through His own words, He is revealed to us in the Gospel as the Holy Anointed-One, is upheld throughout these "Teachings" with reverence and beauty. He is consistently manifested as the perfect and lovely ideal of Humanity—the Man-Divine, after whose full stature of beauty and grace man must ever aspire. The Christ-life of self-sacrifice, of obedience to the voice of the "in-dwelling" Father, of the strength combined with the gentleness of pure and perfect love, is shown as "the Way" alone, whereby the children of the New-Life can press on, ever ascending to the Father of the Christ—and their Father; to His God—and their God.

The avowed object, in short, of these writings is, according to "Imperator," to help onward the advent of the time, "when the pure Gospel which Jesus preached shall find its counterpart again on an advanced plane of knowledge." Also to manifest unmistakably that God's "dealings with man have been uniform through the ages, intimate in proportion as man cultivates spirituality, remote as his animal nature asserts itself, and he becomes corporeal and material in his instincts."

From the advertisement in "LIGHT" of the contents of the "Spirit Teachings," the readers will be aware how varied is their character, how wide the horizon embraced by them. Suffice it now, therefore, to summarise the most salient heads—not, perhaps, exactly in sequence as they appear in the book itself, but as they have left impress upon the mind.

The Christ-life, as already observed, is set forth pre-eminently as the earthly and heavenly ideal prepared for each human soul called to enter upon its sublime pilgrimage towards God. The new birth of the soul in varied aspects; the death of materialism and literalism, both in doctrine and life, are manifested as the great work now being wrought by the Holy Spirit—and this through the agency of messenger-spirits: esoteric and exoteric aspects of truth considered: the symbolic aspect of the Christ-life and mission, and its relation to Life and Law-Spiritual: also the symbolism of Revelation and Nature. The means employed by the Messenger-spirits to enlighten and instruct man, the difficulties to be encountered by them, and also by psychical persons who come into communication with supernal influence. Realm of the Antagonists: conflicts with the Antagonists: the issues for good resulting from these conflicts of ever-renewed antagonism. Error and sin; terrible evils which the unregenerate man draws to himself, here and hereafter, when he ignores, runs counter to, or wilfully breaks the true Divine laws of his being—self-renunciation, love, harmony, peace, and union with the indwelling spirit of the universal Parent-God. Conditions of varied classes of unhappy disembodied spirits, showing in what really consists the state, called by the orthodox believers "Hell"—the hell of spiritual purgation from evils. What spirits teach regarding "Judgment:" literalism of the childhood of man, and of the childhood of faith. Residuum of truth to be discovered in every form of faith and in all creeds. Outlines of various religions. Prayer: its vital reality as a force and its varied uses. Attitude of the world ever against new truth: man's future destiny, &c., &c.

Interspersed amidst these more abstract subjects of speculation and thought, the reader will find contained in the autobiographical prefixes to the sections, various highly noteworthy cases of Spirit-identification, not the least interesting portions of this deeply interesting and instructive volume.

A Proposal to Circulate "Spirit Teachings."
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you allow me to make a suggestion with reference to "M.A. (Oxon's)" recently-issued volume of "Spirit Teachings"? It is a book which I believe to be invaluable, and to contain matter specially suitable and useful for these times, when the minds of all thinking men and women are looking for a fresh development of religious truth. It seems to me that it will not only prove of value in indicating to many an earnest seeker the very means of escape from the agnosticism of the day, for which not a few are now looking, but that it will also exercise a very marked influence in disabusing the public mind of the idea that all spirit communications are trivial and worthless. This volume is, at any rate, whatever it may be else, a complete answer on that score.

I would suggest therefore that an effort should be made to circulate copies of this volume in influential quarters where its contents are likely to be appreciated, and to result, in some cases, in their wide diffusion. Amongst those who are chosen to become the recipients, I would recommend clergymen whose views are known to be liberal; the tables of reading-rooms, and the shelves of the numerous libraries scattered over the kingdom. The details of the plan could, I think, be safely left to a committee appointed for the purpose. The book is issued at 10s. 6d. per copy, but on inquiry the publishers have very kindly offered very liberal terms if this suggestion is carried out, and are prepared to supply them at the rate of four copies for £1. I think we should aim at sending out at least 500 copies. The result could hardly fail to lift our cause in public estimation.

THE SPIRITUAL RECORD. August, 1883. London: E. W. Allen, or Office of LIGHT, 38, Great Russell-street, W.C.; Glasgow: Hay, Nisbet, and Co., 38, Stockwell-street. 6d.

In the number before us, Dr. Nichols continues his article on "Direct Spirit Drawings and Writings," copious fac-similes illustrating the text. Then follows "Testimony of Two Earls of Dunraven," dealing principally with the now well-known records of "Experiences" printed, in the first instance, for Private Circulation only. "Materialism" also, like the two preceding papers by Dr. Nichols, deals with the points of difference between the Materialistic Cosmology, and the Spiritualistic Cosmology, the difficulties of the former, and the solutions given by the latter. A case of "Spirit Identity," first related by Mrs. Watts to "M. A. (Oxon)," is reproduced with additional evidence from the narrator's diary, and "Signor Damiani's Message," together with an article on "The Second Light and the usual Notes," completes a number singularly rich in narrations of facts.

Speculative Philosophy.

SIR,—“Now the Spirit saith expressly, that in later times some shall fall away from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of demons.” With the instinctive reverence of humanity for what is called the Supernatural, it is not surprising that many investigators of Spiritualism should have been ready to accept doctrines coming to them across the river of Death, and we find that men whose intellects are too powerful and too discriminative to accept the doctrines of the New Testament, and what they call the absurdities in the Bible, consent, on the most slender and shadowy evidence, to receive and publish doctrines and systems possessing far less antecedent probability than must be allowed for Christianity, and which, though of great antiquity, can show through the long course of ages no such results on the progress of humanity as can be clearly traced to Christian teaching. In this day, when we can see abundant fulfilment of the prophecy “many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased,” have we not also evidence that the stone, cut out without hands, has long since smitten the image, now being carried away, and has become a mountain, giving even at the present time signs of its filling the whole earth?

The great feature of Christianity, as of its precursor Judaism, is its appeal to a personal God, the Creator, Sustainer, and Regulator of life in all its forms, who is Himself accessible to all that seek Him in the right spirit, and is ready to answer their prayers. Happiness is attained by working in submission to His will, made known to us by Him. He has allowed us, in our own wills, to take on ourselves the government of the world, with results of which we have no reason to be proud, but men are gradually coming to understand that His will is better for them than their own, and all must learn to do His will, not in blind, but intelligent submission, ere happiness can be attained. He who is Almighty and willett not the death of any, but that all shall return, repent and live, has provided the way for all to learn this, and ultimately to reach the rest for the people of God, a condition much misconceived by the theorists who tell us of absorption into the Deity, or of Nirvana.

One charge brought against Christians is that they are Anthropomorphologists. Some Christians might deny the impeachment, but I count it a boast of Christianity, and maintain the view that one of the senses of the declaration, “God made man in His own image,” extends to the outward form, though I readily admit that the most important meaning of the passage is its declaration of the similarity of our spiritual being to that of its Creator, of whom we are truly the children. In this all Christians will agree. This doctrine was a distinctive peculiarity of the Hebrew revelation, and, be it remembered, it ran counter to the ideas of the Semitic race, who deified flies, serpents, fishes, &c., as well as the heavenly bodies; also to those of the Aryan Orientals, whose deities were provided with fifty hands, three or four heads, or, like Ganesa, wearing the head of an elephant. It was also opposed to the Hamitic views of deities, for these were, like Anubis or Ptah, made with the heads of the lower animals, though this race also worshipped gods of human shape. The Greeks, on the other hand, recognising instinctively that the human figure is the most beautiful form in creation, represented all their gods as of human shape, and herein set up a standard similar to that of the Christian, in that the perfections of Deity differed from those of humanity, not in kind, but in degree. Thus they encouraged men to look up to the gods and aim at their perfections.

Coming farther westward, it is interesting to look at the teaching of the Druids in these islands 2,000 years ago, condensed by Robert Southey into the following passage from “Madoc”:

“Thee, Lord! he sang—
O Father, Thee, whose wisdom—Thee, whose power, Whose love—all love, all power, all wisdom. Thou!
Tongue cannot utter, nor can heart conceive.
He, in the lowest depth of Being framed
The imperishable mind; in every change,
Through the great circle of progressive life,
He guides and guards, till evil shall be known,
And being known as evil, cease to be;
And the pure soul, emancipated by Death,
The Enlarger, shall attain its end pre-deemed
The eternal newness of eternal joy.”

This passage may be amplified and explained by the following extracts from the “Bardic Triads”:

“There are three circles of existence;—the circle of Infinity, where there is nothing but God, of living or dead, and none but God can traverse it; the circle of Inchoation where all things are by nature derived from death—this circle hath been traversed by man; and the circle of Happiness where all things spring from life,—this man shall traverse in Heaven.”

“Animated beings have three states of existence;—that of Inchoation in the great deep, or lowest point of existence; that of liberty in the state of humanity; and that of love, which is happiness in Heaven.”

“All animated beings are subject to three necessities;—beginning in the great deep; progression in the circle of Inchoation; and plenitude in the circle of Happiness. Without these things nothing can possibly exist but God.”

“Three things are necessary in the circle of Inchoation,—the least of all, animation, and thence beginning; the material of all things, and thence increase, which cannot take place in any other state; the formation of all things out of the dead mass, and thence discriminate individuality.

“Three things cannot but exist towards all animated beings from the nature of Divine justice: co-sufferance in the circle of Inchoation, because without that no one could attain to the perfect knowledge of anything; co-participation in the Divine love; and co-ultimity from the nature of God's power, and its attributes of justice and mercy.”

“There are three necessary occasions of Inchoation: to collect the materials and properties of every nature; to collect the knowledge of every thing; and to collect power towards subduing the adverse and the devastative, and for the divagation of evil. Without this traversing every mode of animated existence, no state of animation or of any thing in nature, can attain to plenitude.”

“By the knowledge of three things will all evil and death be diminished and subdued; their nature, their cause, and their operation. This knowledge will be obtained in the circle of Happiness.”

“The three excellencies of changing the mode of existence in the circle of happiness—acquisition of knowledge; beautiful variety; and repose, from not being able to endure uniform Infinity and uninterrupted Eternity.”

“Three things none but God can do: endure the eternities of the circle of Infinity; participate of every state of existence without changing; and reform and renovate every thing without the loss of it.

“The three plenitudes of Happiness:—Participation of every nature, with a plenitude of one predominant; conformity to every cast of genius and character, possessing superior excellence in One; the love of all beings and existences, but chiefly concentrated in one object, which is God; and in the predominant One of each of these will the plenitude of Happiness consist.”

This is a system which very closely resembles that underlying the Hebrew Revelation.

In this day of speculative inquiry men are no longer satisfied to sit down and allow others to think for them, and it is far better that minds should live and think, though at times led away by error, than that they should remain in a state of somnolent acceptance, even of what may by chance be right. I have no desire to arrest study, or even speculation, but to call attention to the foundations of the various superstructures offered as solutions of the great problem of existence. It is a satisfactory and highly instructive feature of most of these theories advanced at the present day that so far as concerns their practical application to this earthly phase of existence, they generally converge pretty nearly to the one point, agreeing with the teaching of the Founder of Christianity, which is love to all mankind.

The theory of Re-incarnation which was principally held by continental Spiritualists, appears to be spreading in England as well as in America, notwithstanding that there is little to support it, save dogmatic assertion, much of it coming, no doubt, from the other side of the river, but certainly not on that account to be relied upon. Certain facts and analogies are, indeed, advanced to support it; but these are all explicable fully as clearly, and in most cases much more readily, in accordance with the Christian system, and there is absolutely no evidence, philosophical or logical, which has yet been offered in proof of Re-incarnation. It must be admitted that evidence to disprove it is but scanty, but the propounder of a theory, like the suitor for the recovery of an estate, cannot obtain credence on the weakness of his opponent's case; he can only succeed from the strength of his own.

The latest development of the theory of Re-incarnation has come to us from its birthplace, and is worthy of its Hindoo origin, being strikingly suggestive of the same class of mind that could count its gods by the lakh and represent the saints as arriving at perfection through such exercises as standing on the tip of one toe for 500 years, or sitting for a few centuries on the point of a spike. The propounders of this theory, oddly enough, style themselves Theosophists, though denying the existence of Theos, a personal Deity. Judging from the letters of "A.P.S.," which have appeared in "LIGHT," Theosophy admits some creative power, not very clearly defined, but which seems to be a principle inherent in something. This power, styled Akasa, though impersonal, has by its action produced spirits with personal identities, but having started them, as well as the rest of creation, ceases to interfere further, leaving all to develop according to immutable laws, of which we are not told that there has been any lawgiver. Under those laws the spirits take upon themselves material clothing, time after time, with intervals of dreaming, until, ultimately, Nirvana is reached. It seems that each of us has to inhabit, in succession, seven planets, performing in each seven rounds of existence, each round consisting of seven races. Each race, in its turn, consists of seven subdivisional races, and each subdivisional race of seven branch races, through all of which we have to pass seven times. This gives us a grand total of 163,849 successive material bodies to be inhabited. After each successive incarnation or Karma, the spirit passes into a pleasant dream or period of Devachan, in which he surrounds himself with whatever he likes best, and may have the company of those whom he most desires, though they themselves might be elsewhere enjoying themselves with others, or performing their next Karma, or even have been for their own demerits, annihilated. These periods of Devachan vary from a few years to several hundred years of our time in length, according to the merits of the previous Karma, and the spirit, after enjoying this dream as a reward, goes into a fresh body, in which he advances further, but has also to make propitiation for the sins committed in his former material clothing. I am not concerned to deny the possibility of these theories, but to me it appears most unreasonable and improbable that after a man has spent fifty or sixty years in doing good to his fellow creatures, much of this consisting, it may be, in affording them aids to their spiritual growth, his best reward should be an unsubstantial dream in which he obtains neither knowledge nor strength, instead of that promotion, typified by Christ as having dominion over ten cities, to a sphere in which his powers are strengthened by still working in a higher employment of his energies, to carry on the purposes of his Creator. It further seems to me most unreasonable that after the enjoyment of his reward, he should simply go back pretty nearly to where he had left off, and take up a fresh round of life, burdened with the sins committed in his cast-off body. The ultimate reward, Nirvana, is also, in my view, thoroughly irrational, for it seems that we are to sink into a sort of nothingness, in which we shall have nothing more to do, and nothing more to learn. It is a purely finite conception, traceable, as it seems to me, to minds engaged in watching the operations of nature, and especially in tracing the analogies of insect life, and applying them to the soul, a favourite study of Orientals, whence came the symbolic representation of the soul as a butterfly. The hibernations of vegetable life, followed by the not infrequent cases of the peculiar imperfections of the last year's growth being reflected in the growth of its successor, would have afforded further aid in the development of this theory, which is as clearly earth-born and earth-tinctured as if its framers had spent their time in culling "simples, with a broad clown's back turned broadly to the glories of the stars." It bears upon its face and in its details the aspect, not of a revelation of truth, but a conception of finite, not to say puerile minds, continued in its elaboration of details by intellects not yet sufficiently advanced to perceive the pettiness and childlikeness of their ideas. It is introduced to us with a flourish of authority, and no more confident claim has been advanced by any prophet, apostle, or pope, than is made by "A. P. S." for the authority of the Occult Brothers in India, from whom he has received this new revelation. I am by no means unwilling to allow to these brothers the possession of remarkable mediumistic powers, even were they such as Bulwer represented Zanon as possessing, but I have yet to learn that the possession of these powers is a guarantee of perfect wisdom, or even of accurate knowledge in spiritual matters. I have never been able to see that miracles are the strongest proof of the truth of Christianity, and have always thought it a remarkably weak point in the writings of so able a logician as the late Archbishop Whately, that he should have stated this. I think the strongest rational or philosophic evidence of the truth of the Holy Scriptures is the fulfilment of prophecy, and that from what is fulfilled we have just grounds for believing in the fulfilment of the rest.

With regard to the revelations of those who have been favoured to view the spiritual world, we have all, within the past twenty years, learned enough to warn us against any hasty acceptance of their accounts. We know well how the character and ideas of the medium tincture the understanding of spiritual things. We have had revelations from spirits of all kinds; communications have been received from Jews, Mahomedans, Buddhists, Atheists, and even of a denial of continued existence, for at least one case has occurred where the communicating spirit denied that there was any future existence after the death of the physical body, and asserted itself to be the spirit of one of those present in the flesh. We have nothing to do but to cultivate communion in a given direction, and we may readily become fooled to the top of our bent. These Occult Brothers are set forth by "A. P. S." as "the heirs of all the ages in the foremost files of time," and he says that for more centuries than he dares tell about, the accumulation of this occult knowledge has continued. Now, knowing what we do of Spiritualism, and a few centuries are nothing in the spirit-world, it is easy to understand the perpetuation and elaboration of the Pythagorean doctrine of metempsychosis by the spirits of those who held it on earth communicating with their former disciples. I have the highest respect for Emmanuel Swedenborg; but I do not, therefore, accept as gospel all that he thought he saw in the spirit-world, and I do not see that the claims of the Adept Brothers are, so far as has been yet shewn, at all so strong as those of Swedenborg. Are they better than those of St. Paul, who tells us that he was caught up to the third heaven; or than those of St. John revealed in the Apocalypse? These theories of the future cannot be received on the dictation of any man. They must be tried by the one test, set forth in the oldest book which exists, in these words—"There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." We must bring all these theories and revelations to this test, and accept or reject them according to its dictates, not merely as to their general scope, but in all particulars. We have all access to this unerring monitor. The remarkable theory of Mr. F. F. Cook, of Chicago, that our spirits are embodied piecemeal in successive incarnations, so that we ultimately become groups of successive identities, is amusing, and needs no further reference, though I fully recognise the true Christian spirit displayed in his letters as well as that they contain much that is worthy of consideration.

I need not again travel over the ground worked by Dr. G. Wyld, to whom we are all much indebted for his remarks on Occult Buddhism; but I may repeat that the teachers of this doctrine can point to no great results from it during the many centuries of its existence. There are giants who stand out as landmarks in history, for whose achievements neither creeds nor nations have any real claim to honour. Their greatness belongs to humanity at large, but no creed or philosophy can show such results on the masses of mankind as are distinctly traceable, especially in these latter days, to Christianity, from which have sprung all the great educational and philanthropic movements now working with it, in elevating mankind from the condition of disjointed, selfish beings, into one already approaching to a vast brotherhood. Judaism among its own race did, to a large extent, accomplish this result, and art and science were promoted by the Greeks and the Arabians; but nothing like true or comprehensive ideas of liberty, love, and philanthropy have been ever developed save through Christianity. "A. P. S.," and most of those who write on religion, are constantly making the same mistake as runs through all the arguments of Bradlaugh. They confound theology and pulpit-teaching with Christianity, instead of looking into the New Testament to find out what Christianity is. And though the New Testament is supposed to be the basis of these teachings, and of theology, it will often be found to differ much from them.

I cannot conceive how Akasa, a principle inherent in something, or nothing, or a power analogous to motion or magnetism, could evolve conscious identities and start them on unerring rounds of millions of ages through their 100,000 incarnations, with the intervals of Devachan; and I cannot imagine a wise almighty, and beneficent Creator so poor in resource as to have no training for the spirit but these endless rounds. There are none of these philosophies into which much that belongs to the Christian scheme might not be made to fit with skillful reasoning; but such arguments work both ways, and I take Nirvana, as well as the doctrine of the absorption into the Deity, to be a misconception of the Christian view, which is much more nearly approached in the Bardic Triads. The true Nirvana is attained when the spirit has come to see, beyond any doubt, that the will of God is better than his own; to submit himself, not blindly, but with rational conviction, to the will of his Creator, and to work in full unity with Him. This is the condition of rest, not in a quiescent and idle state, but of full understanding that the spirit is working with the Creator, and that therefore his work is efficient. He that has reached this state fulfils the prayer of Christ Jesus, "that they may be one even as we are One. I in them and they in Me, that they may be perfected into one"; and this, without any loss of distinct identity, is what has been misunderstood as absorption into the Deity.

This condition, moreover, though it may be difficult of attainment, can be reached even while in the body, and the Apostle Paul, although he speaks of himself with modesty, "not as though I had already attained," had evidently begun to enter into it. And here we have further the evidence of the attainment of Jesus, the Anointed, and His thorough rest in the will of His Father. He says, "He that believeth on Me hath" (not shall have) "Eternal Life."

Seers trained in these Buddhist doctrines are exactly those from whom we might well expect the accounts of Devachan, and these afford strong evidence of their want of exalted spiritual perception. Devachan is evidently the state of spirits enveloped each in his own earth sphere, a condition very likely to endure for a long period with a Buddhist dreamer, as well as to be so dense as to admit light with the utmost difficulty. The subjective surroundings of what they have taken with them from earth, and their carelessness of aught further, are strong proofs of this.

All the so-called Rational schemes, Agnosticism, Deism, Platonism, &c., as well as these Buddhism revelations, lack the power of appealing to human nature, and, whatever may be said to the contrary, human nature, from the earliest flint-chipper to the present day, and from the Andaman islander even to exalted spirits, remains much the same. Among men have always been a few philosophers given to abstract and abstruse speculations, but their recondite theories have never taken hold save among a few even of their disciples, for to the bulk of humanity they have no meaning. The masses cannot be moved save by the appeal to a personal God, and in the Christian plan we can trace the finger of Him who "knew what was in man." No mean evidence of the truth of Christianity as revealed in the New Testament is its being so readily intelligible to all who will receive it "as a little child." Christ came to direct us to the Father, and the Comforter sent by Him to teach us comes to all who seek Him aright.

"In vain Thy creatures testify of Thee,
'Till Thou proclaim Thyself. Thine is indeed
A teaching voice; but 'tis the praise of Thine,
That whom It teaches, It makes prompt to learn,
And with the boon gives talents for its use."

Esoteric Buddhism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I should be glad to say a few words in reference to the letter from "G. W., M.D.," in your issue of July 21st. Perhaps some of your readers may not object to a criticism on this letter from a European, though I will not add arithmetical standpoint also. By esoteric, I maintain that the word simply implies the inner meaning, as applied to the outer signification. It does not mean the sacred innermost; there is, of course, no word for that. Esoteric Buddhism means simply the non-illusory version of Buddhist doctrine as compared with the illusory side. Just as Esoteric Christianity means, I conclude "G. W." would consider, the non-illusory version of it understood by the few compared to the illusory version of it, which is the creed of the many, necessarily changing with each generation. The non-illusory or esoteric teaching tells us that the Psalmist plainly said that "We cannot, by searching, find out God." The Jehovah of the Hebrew Scriptures does not in this esoteric teaching take the place of the First Cause, spoken of by "G. W."

Can he prove that his Jehovah exists, and is the First Cause? if not, he is as atheistic as the esoteric teaching. This teaching simply widens the mental horizon so indefinitely and infinitely, that finite man is compelled to bow the head, and say the time has not yet arrived for mortal man to dare to define any idea even of God. The lower the idea of God, the easier it is to define Him. The higher one goes, and wider and ever wider grows the conception, but an end comes and inconceivability arises. Enough for us that we have some guardian of our planet, our little planet which is known even astronomically as a speck in the boundless universe. To me there is always something savouring of savagery and of primeval races, this insistence upon our God as the only one and the greatest. What right have we to say so? When in the course of the ages open to every one of us, our horizons widen, doubtless we shall think of our present conceptions of the Deity much as cultured men of the present day look upon the crudest anthropomorphism of early times. There is no Atheism in the assertion that the Brothers do not teach a Personal God; and, moreover, that "no such conception enters into the great esoteric doctrine of Nature." Hitherto, with our imperfect knowledge, we have been in utter confusion respecting our "Gods." For the first time in our history is this mystery cleared up as taught in Esoteric Buddhism. There we learn that we must be silent on subjects of which we know nothing, and that is the First Great Cause, confused by "G. W." with the Jehovah, the Christ of the Bible, and made still more impossible by the teachings of modern theology. The mistake of the mysticism, as understood by "G. W.," is its limitation. It teaches the life and destiny of one individual in one earth-life, no further. It is Esoteric Christianity certainly, and true in its circle, but it does not get out of that circle, the one earth-life of man; whereas, the teaching of Esoteric Buddhism takes in Esoteric Christianity and every truth of science and history, everything in its vast arms, and proclaims, not only the destiny of the individual but the destiny of the race, the cosmogony of the universe. He who runs may read, and the same criticism may be applied to Mr. Sinnett's work as is applied to the Bible by its devoutest believers; they don't know who the authors really were, they simply say, "Its internal evidence is a proof of its authenticity."

I don't find anywhere, though "G. W." does, that we are threatened in any way with punishment for non-belief by the Brothers. This is a singular reading of doctrine, altogether opposed to the idea of arbitrary punishment in any case. We are told certain things; those of us who can receive them, do, and it is better inasmuch as it shews receptibility to higher truths, just as a mathematical problem is received by a student of mathematics as a lucid idea; to a drayman, the problem is not even a problem—it is gibberish; but the drayman is not punished, only the master might blame himself for casting pearls before swine, and offer his problem to a more educated mind.

Now, with regard to what "G. W." says of Koot Hoomi being to blame for not doing this and that and the other, allow me to say "G. W." is to blame in talking about matters of which he is necessarily incapable of judging.

To begin with, "Is it a proved historic fact that the Jesus of the New Testament is an exact historic personage, and that 'G. W.' has an absolute right to claim him as a real historic being whose ways and doings and actions are thoroughly known and understood and truly recorded?" If not, he has no right to draw the comparison. Possibly, if more were known of the Adept, the Rabbi Jeshua or Jasher (I don't know which,) a more correct, not comparison, but parallel might be drawn. As it is, the old adage applies; comparisons are, and always will be, odious.

"G. W." seems always tormented by the word "secrecy." I agree with him it is a hateful word, and should not be used in its ordinary and abused sense. In its proper sense it is not objectionable, and to be the recipient of a secret need not be necessarily unpleasant, yet somehow, the word has an ugly sound. Let us drop it, for it is the word employed, not by those who are in the receipt of knowledge, but by those who want the knowledge and won't work for it. Esoteric wisdom is freely opened to those who seek, and who prove themselves worthy to seek; but it is hidden or veiled from those who sit still and expect to be told everything, for they could not understand. Darwin might have expounded the whole of his system to a navy by the wayside, but it would still be a secret to the navy. Nevertheless, had the navy had some sort of education and some conception of general truths, the mystery would have "some show of reason" to him. All occult doctrine seems taught in the same way, being truth according to the capacity for receiving it; and as we prove this in ordinary education, why cannot we receive it on higher grounds?

"G. W." has written an exhaustive list of objections, most of them arising, I assume, from ill-digested perusal of the work in question, and also from an unhistorical and unphilosophical comprehension of the effects of Christianity. Ordinary orthodox Christianity would extremely resent any confusion with Unitarianism, and "G. W." should therefore define what his Christianity means, if he allows breadth of views to himself but not to others. Unitarianism is an anathema maranatha to Roman Catholics, Ritualists, as well as to the countless varieties of catechisms long, middle and short of the Scotch Church. Christianity, therefore, being burdened with these ever widening differences of opinion, deserves the name of no doctrine at all. Esoteric Christianity doubtless is the true doctrine for one man and one woman in one short earth-life, but it is reserved for "Esoteric Buddhism" to unfold to us the glorious horizons and the ultimate destiny of man; the first time in history that we have given to us a foundation on which we can raise the superstructure of the science of the future; and on which we can build without fear our hopes for the human race.

ISABEL DE STEIGER, F.T.S.

I should like to add a protest, in which I am sure all Theosophists would join me; and that is against the use of any unparliamentary expressions in writing in "LIGHT" on such important matters, such as "an awful cram," and "mad as a latter." They should be withdrawn.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The letter of "G.W.M.D." in your issue of the 21st July is indeed surprising. It is surprising on the following grounds:—(1) That it is the production of a Theosophist at all, and (2) that it should come from the pen of one who has been credited with knowing much, and after all has known so little.

"G. W." begins with an attack on the use made by Mr. Sinnett of the expression "Esoteric Buddhism." His assaults, however, are so puerile that it would be energy mis-spent to undertake a serious repulse.

He then goes on to represent "The Brothers" as so many Papal tyrants forcing their dogmas upon the "enlightened West," just as Frenchmen stuff the Strasburg geese. But we know that it is far otherwise—that their sentiment is "Knock and it shall be opened unto you," or, in the language of Koot Hoomi, "Deserve much and we will prove honest debtors; little, and you need only expect a compensating return."

Mr. Sinnett is not inclined to shirk the question why "The Brothers" do not sport themselves before the Thomases of the ordinary world. On pp. 7 and 8 of the Occult World we find the matter openly and fairly argued, and I need only quote one sentence, which, by its suggestiveness, is a complete reply: "Indeed, the reader will not go far in an examination of the nature of the powers which proficients in Occultism actually possess, without seeing that it is supremely desirable," yes, as the present writer has reason to know, absolutely necessary, "to keep back the practical exercise of such powers from the world at large."

"G. W." then goes into arithmetical calculations in a spirit of cheerful pastime, and deals with the human Ego much as school-boys treat their football. He laughs to see it bound, rebound, and bound again. But "The Brothers" put a value on the facts of science in proportion to their moral and philanthropic bearing upon humanity, and whether "G. W." will have 4,802 divisions of existence, or not, is to them and to us a matter of really little consequence.

"G. W.M.D." then goes on to pose as the martyr to virtue. "You must be on the wrong track for truth," he says in effect, "because you do not assert, as I assert, that there is a Personal God." Can it be that we are not so reverent as "G. W." and are sinning daily in our searchings after the Divine? or can it be that we have gone too deep for "G. W.'s" intellect and heart? I humbly prefer to yield an affirmative to the latter. Again I refer to a writing by Koot Hoomi. He says: "If we had the powers of the imaginary personal God, and the universal and immutable laws were but toys to play with, then, indeed, might we have created conditions that would have turned this earth into an Arcadia for lofty souls. But, having to deal with an immutable law, being ourselves its creatures, we have had to do what we could and rest thankful."

"G. W." lays great stress on the spirit of Christianity. "The Brothers" would go much further in this respect than "G. W." It is that spirit which it will be their aim and ours to make universal, and we would close this letter by asking the question: In the lengthy letter of "G. W.M.D." is the aforesaid spirit not conspicuous by its absence?—I am, Sir, yours truly,

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM.

CAVENDISH ROOMS, 51 AND 53, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

"Human Progress: Its Source." The controls of Mr. Morse introduced their views upon this subject, on Sunday last, by an explanation of the character of the progress. They were thus constrained, with considerate tenderness but fervent zeal, once more to question the literal truthfulness of records which represent man as originally a perfect being, whose fall would be an impeachment of Divine goodness, or wisdom, or power, and to start with the fact of savage nature, which they fitly described, in its relation to human progress, as zero. Hence, by experience and resulting knowledge, a condition was speedily reached which permitted the suggestion that the source of development is threefold. We were urged to recognise it in the sufferings of humanity, in the inspiration of internal light, and in the heart and consciousness of Deity. Suffering is salvation in so many departments of life: pain is mitigated by a pleasurable or beneficent issue in so many ways: the mistakes, darkness and misery of one age have been so commonly the precursors of the liberty and strength of the next: bodies are so clearly strengthened, minds enlarged, affections cultivated under and by trial and struggle, that it is impossible to doubt that progress is born out of suffering. Nor would any Spiritualist traverse the assertion that the intervention of the spirit-world largely influences the growing results also, for besides the very probable fact, advanced as such by the controls, that much of the effort after better things which is due to the healthy, open and earnest thought of the race, at all times, is suggested by the friendly control of the other side, it was judiciously and eloquently maintained that spirits, retaining their recollection of earthly experiences and needs, and finding their own status affected by the activity of their love for their fellows, bring always a completeness of appreciation of the ever varying wants of humanity which is a guarantee for the eventual successful application of means more or less suggested and sustained by themselves. Upon the third head, associating progress with the Deity, the controls, without entering upon detailed analysis of probably conflicting views of first principles, affirmed their own acceptance of the existence of God as of the one supreme, omnipotent, omniscient, and omnipresent source of human unfoldment. That conception, they said, was binding upon them and upon all who received it, and they argued that the power and wisdom involved in the idea, implied, at the least, a measurable expression of the purposes of the Deity in the progress of man. The motives and principles of growth are thus created by an all-wise intervention, stimulated into untiring activity by spiritual co-operation, and sustained and developed by suffering and hope. In a peroration of singular beauty, overflowing with human kindness, we were charged, in our daily lives, to do no discredit to so truly noble a creation as progressive man.

Special attention is directed to the advertisement, on another page, that the evening of Sunday, August 5th, is to be devoted to Question and Answer. Inquiries, under cover and signed, upon subjects of general interest, are invited from all who attend the services of the Lyceum.—S.E.

In Dr. Anna Kingsford's address in our last issue, page 337, column 1, line 24, for great historical read quasi-historical.

The Rev. Maurice Davies has brought an action for libel against Dr. Williams, of Grahamstown, South Africa, who has been committed for trial on the charge. Altogether, the clergy in our Southern possession do not seem to get along amicably without a head. Bishop Colenso's death having left the Church without a Bishop legally qualified to act in matters of this kind. It would certainly be a Godsend to the cause of religion and peace if Bishop Webb, the newly-elected Bishop of Grahamstown, could see his way to putting an end to the wretched division which now exists.

History is the Newgate Calendar of kings and rulers. It finds no materials in the happiness or virtue of States, and is therefore little better than a record of human crime and misery.

WHAT IS SPIRITUALISM?—The fundamental principle of Modern Spiritualism is that there is a possibility of communion between this world and the unseen world of spirit, whereby, through the medium of certain abnormal phenomena as yet little understood, evidence of a life to come is afforded.

The phenomenal evidences of a continued existence, which Spiritualism supplies, do not interest those who have rejected all belief in a future life, because in their researches they have come across no facts which demonstrate the same! Very good! Be it so. But having adopted this course, they have no right to a hearing when dealing with this question of the duality and continuity of life. By thus refusing to consider all the evidence relating thereto, they have thereby abdicated the honest, manly position of an impartial inquirer, and have fallen to that of special pleaders.

THE GOD-IDEA.

PART TWO.

In writing last week about the God-Idea, I said that the limitation of Personality as applied to the Supreme was a mere human conception, and that the consensus of Spirit Teaching inclined to a refined and spiritualised Pantheism. I am fully conscious that this will not commend itself to all my readers; and that to some it may seem as irreverent to dispute the existence of a Personal God—by which is understood a God in human form—as it does to a late Quarterly Reviewer that the author of "Ecce Homo" should express himself somewhat similarly in his recent work, "Natural Religion." Such a doctrine, he protests with abundant energy and much iteration, is neither natural nor religious. And he more than hints that during the sixteen years that he has been waiting for the fulfilment of the promise held out in "Ecce Homo," "that Christ, as the creator of modern theology and religion, will make the subject of another volume," the author's faith has suffered shipwreck. That most pestilent book ever vomited up from the jaws of hell, as it occurred to a distinguished and representative Evangelical to describe a most reverent inquiry into the bases of revealed religion, adorned with a style almost without parallel in its fascination—this work of the devil has had its poisonous effect, and "at last we are put off with a farrago of science and culture, a pseudo-religion, from which Christ and God have been ejected to make way for Humanity and Nature." It is needless to say that I accept no such criticism as fair and true. I may, perhaps, illustrate what I have said before by some account of the natural religion which has so alarmed the Quarterly Reviewer.

I may say at once that it differs materially from those conceptions which have been propounded by previous thinkers. It is not on the lines of Clark, Butler, nor Paley. It has little affinity with Voltaire or Rousseau, or with the speculations of Professor Jowett or Professor Max Müller. Nor does the author need for himself the cirenicon he propounds. He says of himself that he "can conceive no religion as satisfactory that falls short of Christianity." But he sees around him an increasing number of able and profoundly earnest persons who have lost their hold on the old faith, "to whom Nature alone appears to be real, and who look upon the knowledge of the laws of co-existence and succession in natural phenomena as the only knowledge within human reach." These men are moulding the thought of the age, influencing the public, "while they pursue their various ideals in a science, an art, a philosophy, a general culture from which God is ostentatiously excluded." I may demur to this sweeping allegation, but I have repeatedly expressed similar sentiments in discussing the future of Spiritualism as a religious and educational influence. The old faith, with all its pile of human accretions, has lost the power that was born of the simplicity and sincerity of its Founder, and an effete and tyrannical ecclesiasticism, with pretensions that would be ridiculous if they were not dangerous, imposes on the intellect and conscience of mankind a burden that it is impossible to bear. So far the author says in other words what I have been long saying myself from quite another standpoint.

The author of "Ecce Homo" agrees further with my contention that this dethronement of God is more apparent than real. It is not God that is obliterated from His universe by the most honest and capable students of its mysteries, but only that anthropomorphic idol that human speculation has erected where no image should intrude. It was the Bishop of Peterborough, in one of his most eloquent sermons, one delivered before the British Association when it met in his diocese, who spoke of the High Priests of Science standing with bowed heads and veiled faces before the mysteries that confronted them. Our author in like manner sees the agnostic scientists of to-day standing humbly before Nature as the priest stood humbly before his God. "Both earnestly protest against human wisdom. Both wait for a message which is to come to them from without. Religion says, 'Let man be silent, and listen when God speaks.' Science says, 'Let us interrogate Nature, and let us be sure that the answer we get is really Nature's, and not a mere echo of our own voice.' . . . Both agree in denouncing that pride of the human intellect which supposes it knows everything, which is not passive enough in the presence of reality, but deceives itself with pompous words instead of things, and with flattering eloquence instead of sober truths."

To these men Natural Religion appeals with a demonstration, as Mr. F. W. H. Myers well puts it, "that their argument lies deeper than their differences, that the enemy of all is the same; that for the most part they are both looking at different sides of the shield, whether they worship the Unity of the Universe by the cold sober light of His power and reality, or in the golden radiance of His love. And thus the author claims for all forms of enthusiastic admiration of truth, beauty, goodness, the title of religion, which he deems theirs by right both of logic and of history, and urges all parties to march side by side, so far at least as they may, in the self-elevating culture which is itself a worship—in the actively beneficent civilisation which is the missionary aspect of the higher life." Nor will the author by any means allow that the most agnostic questioner of Nature may not be a purely religious man.

These men, he contends, whose whole life is the pursuit of religious truth, deceive themselves when they proclaim themselves agnostic. In a remarkable passage this is elo-quently stated. "When men, whose minds are possessed with a thought like this (above stated), and whose lives are devoted to such a contemplation, say: 'As for God, we know nothing of Him; science knows nothing of Him; it is a name belonging to an extinct system of philosophy,' I think they are playing with words. By what name they call the object of their contemplation is in itself a matter of little importance. Whether they say God, or prefer to say Nature, the important thing is that their minds are filled with the sense of a power, to all appearance infinite and eternal; a power with which their own being is inseparably connected, in the knowledge of whose ways alone is safety and well-being, in the contemplation of which they find a beatific vision. Well! this God is also the God of Christians." I confess that this idea of the union of man with Nature and of his safety in so far as he is in harmony with her laws, comes on me with a sense of abiding satisfaction, such as is not derived from anything not inherently true. The man who spends himself in the patient interrogation of Nature, by observation and experiment; who ponders on the mysteries of life and being that surround him; who meditates and communes with Nature in the silence of the Alpine solitude, or is elevated and purified by entering into harmony with her in her softer and more lovely moods, is, in every true sense of the word, a worshipper. So, too, is the artist, be he a Wordsworth, who has learned, as few else have done, to interpret the mind of his God; a painter, who fixes for us some of Nature's subtlest beauties; or a musician, who entralls us with such of her grandest harmonies as he has learned by patient listening to some of her many voices. These all worship, and they do not worship the graven images of man's device.

Such men, too, are fitly described as Theists, who possess a theology: so our author thinks. It matters little by what term they be described. Their attitude is essentially the religious one, and the less theology they burden themselves with, the more free will they be. "I do not say that it is good or satisfactory to worship such a God; but I say that no class of men, since the world began, have ever more truly believed in a God, or more ardently, or with more conviction, worshipped Him. Comparing, then, religion in its fresh youth with the present confused forms of Christianity, I think a bystander would say that, though Christianity had in it something far higher, and deeper, and more ennobling, yet the average scientific man worships just at present a more awful, and, as it were, a greater Deity than the average Christian." What then is the atheist? Is there any one left to bear the name? And what is the criticism that must be passed on this bold utterance? These are questions that must be deferred till next week.

M. A. (Oxon)

The Shields Daily News of August 2nd contained a little poem on "Inspiration" by the well-known Spiritualist Mr. John A. Rowe, of North Shields.

Alexander Pope, said a short time before his death, "I am so certain of the soul's being immortal, that I seem to feel it moving within me."—Spence's Anecdotes.

Last Saturday's issues of the Spectator and the Saturday Review contained notices of the recent experiments of the Psychical Research Society. The former was written in a fair and calmly scientific spirit, very different from the animadversions of the latter.

EARTHQUAKE AT ISCHIA.—One of the incidents narrated by the survivors is that the performance which was going on at the theatre at the moment of the calamity began with a mimic representation of an earthquake. It is also stated that Signor Cappelli, a member of the Italian Government, who was stopping at the Sotiniella, happened a few minutes before the catastrophe occurred to have expressed annoyance because an English gentleman staying in the hotel was playing a funeral march on the piano. Amongst the corpses found at Casamicciola was that of an English gentleman, who at the time of the disaster was playing the piano. He was found seated in a chair.

SOME RECENT EXPERIMENTS IN "THOUGHT-TRANSPERENCE."

Directed by Malcolm Guthrie, J.P., and reported by James Birchall, to the Literary and Philosophical Society of Liverpool, during its seventy-second Session.

Considerable attention has been given to the kind of experiments known as "Willing" and "Finding," in which a person, blindfolded, performs a definite series of actions, or finds some object under the supposed mental direction of another with whom he is placed in personal contact. These operations are apparently affected by the skilful interpretation of the voluntary or involuntary muscular indications given by him who appears to direct the other's movements, and do not require any further explanation.

Suppose, however, that the operator, fixing his eyes intently upon some object, is able by simple contact to transfer the image of that object—its colour and form—to the mind of the other, it is plain that there is room for further inquiry; and still more so if the person who is blindfolded can, without contact, perceive the form and colour of the object as clearly as before—the picture being, to him, "a vision as sensible to feeling as to sight."

The following series of experiments, made in the presence of reliable witnesses, some of whom are members of this Society, point to the conclusion that there is a field open for such further inquiry.

The experiments originated with a party of lady friends trying to think out numbers and words. They were then taken up by Mr. Malcolm Guthrie, who had, before this, found his son possessed, at times, of the faculty of seeing objects, blindfolded "in form as palpable" as if they were before his own vision. Since then they have been conducted by him, with my assistance, and the occasional presence of Professor Rendall, Principal of University College, Dr. Carter, and Messrs. Davies and Steel. Care has been taken that sufficient safeguards should surround each experiment; that the blindfolding of the subject should be secure, and that where contact was permitted it should be confined to the clasping of the hands, or the simple touch of the fingers. In the large majority of the cases, the objects were placed behind the sitter, but in full view of all in the room. They have been kept in Mr. Guthrie's special custody, and he has never shewn them except at the moment when each one was required. On one occasion I produced some objects prepared by myself, which could hardly have been anticipated by any of those present.

I have attended five sittings in town, and two at the residence of Mr. Guthrie, and the ladies before alluded to have been present at all but one. Fifty-two experiments have been made—of which fifteen were failures, and the remainder either wholly or partly successful. One of the subjects displayed the possession of a marvellous power of intuition; as she failed only six times out of thirty-five, while she was correct in all the fifteen experiments made without contact.

The following is an enumeration of the experiments as they were made with each subject:—

I. Miss R—h in contact with Miss J—, or Miss R—

The six failures were:—

1. A number—"17"—was said to be 16.
2. Only the first figure on a bank note was deciphered, and at the second attempt.
- 3 & 4. A horse-shoe shape of blue silk on white satin, and a ring of white silk on black satin, could not be seen.
5. A bright steel door key, while pronounced to be bright, was thought to be a silver brooch, and
6. A red ivory ball was declared to be yellow.

The successful experiments were:—

1. A red circle of silk on black satin, seen as "a round red spot."
2. A triangle of blue silk on black satin described as

"blue—like a diamond—yet not a diamond, but like as if it were cut off, and pointed at one end."

3. A key—correctly named almost on the instant.
4. A watch—said to be "bright and round," but thought to be "a button."
5. A square of pink silk on black satin, said, almost instantly, to be "pink and square."
6. A gilt cross—described as "yellow"—thought to be "a cross," and when asked which way it was held, replied correctly "the right way."
7. A piece of white cardboard, cut out in the shape of a jug, elicited the answer, "I cannot see any colour—looks all light—is it a cup? There is a handle—Oh! it is a jug."
8. A similar cardboard shape of a five-barred gate was declared to be of "the same colour as the last—seems to be all lines—with another line across them—so—(drawing a line diagonally)—do not know what it is—seems to be nothing but lines."
9. An electro-plate egg-cup was described as, "Is it a narrow stem? Goes on till it gets wide. Is it a wine glass? Seems bright—seems to be silver."

10. A toy, in the shape of a white cat, with black stripes radiating from a dark-coloured back. Not seen distinctly, nor the form deciphered, but said to be, "White all round—like with a black centre, and crimped in and out."

11. Six of diamonds. Answer, "It is yellow—square—it is a card. Red—cannot tell how many spots—seem to be two or three, one over the other—diamonds—cannot see the number—card seems to be moving about. It is the seven of diamonds."

II. The experiments with the same Miss R—h, sitting apart from the rest, and without contact, were remarkable.

1. A gold cross was almost instantly said to be "yellow," and pronounced to be "a cross."
2. A red ivory chess knight was thus described. "It is red—broad at the bottom—then very narrow—then broad again at the top. It is a chessman." When asked to name the piece, said she did not know the names of the pieces.
3. A half-crown, shewn by Mr. Birchall, on the spur of the moment, was described as, "round—bright—of no particular colour—silver—a piece of money—larger than a shilling, but not as large as—" Here the subject was unable to say more.
4. A diamond of pink silk, on an oblong of black satin. Only the colour of this was seen, the subject stating that she could not make out the shape, as it seemed to be moving about. The object was held in the hand of Mr. Guthrie somewhat unsteadily.
5. A red cloth-bound book, large quarto. Colour again seen, but not the shape.

N.B.—This was not at the same sitting as the preceding case, nor at the same time.

6. A yellow paper knife. Described as yellow—asked if it was a feather, but presently said, "It looks more like a knife with a thin handle."
7. Mr. Steel's Exchange pass ticket was correctly described as, "Square—longer one way than the other, and of a dark reddish colour."
8. A pair of scissors. Answer: "It is silver—No—it is steel—It is a pair of scissors, standing upright."
9. A diamond of blue silk on black satin. Answer: "Is it blue? Is it a diamond?"
10. A dark green circle of silk, on black satin. The colour seen, but not the shape.
11. A terra-cotta pipe, glazed at the mouth. Answer: "Is it yellow? Does not seem to be all yellow—only one part of it. Can't see the shape well—all confused—do not know what it is. Seems to be a lot of stems. It looks like this (tracing an oblique line in the air) with claws." (The subject here shaped her fingers like claws.)

N.B.—The stem was joined to the bowl of the clay pipe by a carved bird's claw.

12. A small toy dog, coloured light-brown, with tail extended, and in the act of leaping, elicited a more remarkable answer, but not at the same sitting. The subject was: "Is it green?—I can see something like as if it had a lot of branches. Can't count them. Look too many. Like a long stem—so—(tracing a horizontal line in the air)—with things down (tracing lines downward). Looks to be of a lighter colour now—not green, as at first. It looked like a tree at first—now it looks like some kind of an animal. Can't see any more."

13. A dark-crimson apple was described as, "Round—of a dark-red shade—like the knob off a drawer. Is it an apple?"

14. An orange, next shewn, was immediately detected. "It is not another apple. It is an orange."

15. An electro-plate spoon was said to be "very bright. Either steel or silver. Is it a spoon?"

III. Miss E—, in contact with Miss R—h (the previous subject).

1. The word, "Via," letter by letter. V was given at the first answer; i at the second, h being first named; and a at the second, after z was suggested.

2. The word "Res." Each letter was correctly given at the first answer. "Q" and "F" were afterwards shewn, and answered correctly at once.

3. The word, "Pulla," given by Professor Rendall. P answered at the second trial, Q being first named. The remaining letters were each named at the first trial.

4. A yellow silk cross, on black satin. Failed when in contact with Mr. Birchall; but when placed in contact with Miss R—h, answered: "It looks light—yellow like—seems like a lot of rings—Is it round? Cannot see any shape."

5. The word, "Tom," was next attempted by Miss E—, in contact with Miss R—h, on the understanding that she was to read the word at once, without spelling it. Answered: "Are there three letters? One is an 'O'; one is a 'stroky' letter—is it 'T'? Oh! it's 'Tom.'"

IV. Miss J— in contact with Miss R—h.

1. Ten of spades, named correctly almost on the instant.
2. Three of hearts. Failure—eight being named.
3. Five of spades. Failure—six and four named.
4. A bright green silk oblong on black satin. Answer: "Is it square? Is it green?"

5. The same green oblong, with two spots of black silk placed on it. Answer: "There are four corners—It is long—black—I can see a lot of black, but it is rather mixed—Is it a card?" When asked how many spots there were, supposing it were a card, replied "Three."

6. Six of clubs and a square of scarlet silk on black satin. Both failures.

7. Seven of diamonds, and an amber-coloured cross of silk on black satin. Both failures.

V. Master Guthrie, in contact with his father.

1. Six of diamonds. Answered, "Six," and then releasing his hands, traced the shape of a diamond in the air, saying, "Diamonds."
2. A white ivory chess castle. Answer, "Castle in chess."

Both the above objects were held at some distance behind the percipient.

3. The word "tram" was then written in plain print capitals, on a blackboard, in front of Master Guthrie, but none of the letters were deciphered.

4. A red circle of silk was then shewn on black satin. This also was a failure.

5. The queen of diamonds, next shewn, was at first said to be the queen of hearts, but immediately corrected,—"No—not hearts—diamonds."

VI. Another sitting, held at the house of Mr. Guthrie, at which Dr. Carter and Mr. Steel were present, also proved a failure on the whole, the novelty of the surroundings and the presence of strangers apparently unfitting the subjects for the experiments. Miss R—h, however, before mentioned, succeeded, in contact with Mr. Birchall, in localising three pains, two imaginary, and one real. The latter, caused by the grip of a strong wooden letter-clip, fixed upon the little finger of Mr. Birchall's left hand, was distinctly described by Miss R—h, as a pain caused by the "grip of something," but was said to be in the thumb of the left hand.

VII. A sitting, at which I was not present, may here be mentioned, in conclusion. One afternoon (13th April), Mr. Guthrie, without giving previous notice, asked the ladies to allow the Rev. H. H. Higgings to see their experiments. They were all busily engaged at the time, and were therefore somewhat flustered by the suddenness of the call. The venerable and philosopher-like appearance of our friend still further awed them, and the consequence was that all their experiments ended in failure.

Note on Mr. Birchall's Report, by Malcolm Guthrie.

Having read an article by Mr. F. Corder on the subject of "Thought-reading" in the February number of Cassell's Magazine, in which this faculty was spoken of as well recognised and not at all uncommon, I determined to try experiments with my son, a fair and sensitive boy of ten years of age. Much to my surprise I found that when blindfolded he was capable of describing objects upon which my gaze and attention were concentrated. As he seemed to dislike the experiments I discontinued them; but having heard that some young ladies employed in my place of business, while imitating Mr. Bishop's achievements had discovered that they possessed the faculty of declaring numbers thought of by other persons, I asked for the assistance of Mr. Birchall, the hon. sec. of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Liverpool, in order to prosecute an inquiry into the matter in a scientific and careful manner.

At the time we commenced our investigations all that had been done was confined to the finding and willing games under contact, and to the reading of numbers, with one or two attempts at words. We immediately devised a new series of experiments the young ladies had never heard of before, such as colours and shapes, objects, and outlines, the subject being in contact with a companion who seemed to have the power of transmitting impressions. Afterwards contact was abandoned, the patients being blindfolded and isolated, and the object placed behind the back; every care, of course, being taken to prevent communication. The experiments under these circumstances were more uniformly successful than before and the results were such as to satisfy Mr. Birchall and myself of the genuineness of the fact of Thought-transference.

The great value of this series of experiments to ourselves lies not so much in their extraordinary character as in the circumstance that I have been cognisant of them directly and indirectly ab oco. Every stage, both before and after the commencement of our investigation has been reported to me by a third and independent party behind the scenes. Each new kind of experiment has been sprung as a surprise upon the young ladies, and the results have caused them as much genuine astonishment as ourselves. For the bona fides of the experimenters I am able to vouch with the greatest confidence, having known all concerned for periods of from six to ten years.

Since the first report was prepared a number of new experiments have been tried, including the description of objects gazed at and then concealed before the entry of the subject into the room, and then only thought of or imagined by the company; short sentences or quotations, objects such as toys in motion; and what has given the greatest amusement of all, pictures of historical scenes, &c., imagined from memory. An account of these will be given in due course when the experiments have sufficiently accumulated, as for want of time they have been discontinued during the summer months. One of the young ladies possesses in a remarkable degree the power of describing, and indeed of feeling pains experienced or imagined by any one having hold of her hand.

ESSAI SUR L'HUMANITE POSTHUME ET LE SPIRITISME.*

Some account of this book, which has been often referred to lately, may interest the readers of "LIGHT." M. D'Assier is an author, apparently, of some reputation and attainments in the sciences of language and natural philosophy. The title of the present book may seem somewhat misleading, since in M. D'Assier's view there is not, properly speaking, any posthumous humanity at all, or at least he does not discover any evidence of an altogether distinct principle of life in the facts and phenomena which he recognises. We have sufficient warning of this upon the title page, wherein the author's purpose is defined to be "to bring within the compass of the laws of time and space phenomena of the posthumous order, hitherto denied by science because it has been unable to explain them, and to enfranchise people of our epoch from the enervating hallucinations of Spiritism." Putting aside the concluding sentence as containing assumptions perhaps not warranted, M. D'Assier's object is thus that of all who address themselves to these inquiries in a scientific disposition. He refers at the outset to the obstinate denial which facts of a rare or extraordinary character have usually encountered at the hands of men of science. That history is well known, but M. D'Assier shows the necessity of recapitulating it.

"It might be supposed," he says, "that such lessons would not be lost, and that persons calling themselves serious would shew in future more circumspection in their systematic denials. No such thing." In the case of aerolites, for instance, to all the evidence adduced, the celebrated Lavoisier, speaking in the name of the French Academy of Sciences, replied with this curt refutation, "There are no stones in the sky; none, consequently, fall upon the earth." "For thirty years," says M. D'Assier, "I had laughed at this reply of Lavoisier, without perceiving that I invoked just the same argument myself in regard to certain phenomena not less extraordinary than the rain of stones." He cites instances in which his antecedent bias led him to the contemptuous rejection of testimony coming under his own immediate notice; and then describes the later experience which induced a more serious consideration of the subject. Having lost his sight, and otherwise suffered severely in health during the war of 1870, he resorted in the following spring to the waters of Aulus, and finding great benefit from them, he took up his residence at that place. It was then and had been for many years the scene of certain strange disturbances, as to which M. D'Assier was able to make personal inquiry.

"Since the death of the late proprietor of the springs" (in 1855), "the thermal establishment was nearly every night the theatre of scenes of this character. The custodians did not dare to sleep alone. At times the bathing places resounded in the middle of the night as if struck with a hammer. On opening the rooms whence the noise proceeded, it immediately ceased, but recommenced in an adjoining hall. Blows were struck upon the partitions, the steps of some one promenading in the garden room were heard, objects seemed flung against the floor, &c. My first feeling on hearing these accounts was, as usual, incredulity. But finding myself daily in contact with persons who had themselves been witnesses of these nocturnal scenes, and conversation turning often on the subject, certain peculiarities at length arrested my attention. I interrogated the superintendent of the gardens of the establishment, different persons who had passed the night in the hot rooms, all, in short, who could give me any direct information on these mysterious events. Their replies were identical, and the details so circumstantial that I was reduced to the dilemma of either believing the witnesses or of supposing them to be mad."

The result of his interrogations recalled similar circumstances of which M. D'Assier had formerly heard. Knowing the localities and the witnesses, he set himself to institute further inquiries, and at length, he says, he was compelled to surrender to the evidence.

"I then perceived that I had been as absurd as those whom I had so long been ridiculing, in denying facts which I pronounced impossible, because they had not occurred under my own eyes, and because I could not explain them. This posthumous dynamic, which, in certain points, seems the antithesis of ordinary dynamic, caused me to reflect, and I began to conceive that in certain rare cases, the action of the human personality might continue for some time after the cessation of life."

* Par M. Adolphe D'Assier, Paris, 1883.

M. D'Assier's book, numbering 305 pages, is largely filled with accounts, which he considers authentic, from various sources and authors, his object being, as he tells us, to collect a sufficient number, as specimen cases, for comparison and analysis. "In each of them," he says, "there is a mysterious agent revealed by manifestations the most strange and various. Declining to admit any supernatural cause, I inquire if there does not exist in living nature a principle, hitherto little known, which in certain cases and within certain limits can act as an independent force. I find that principle not only in man, but even in the higher species of animals, so that in truth the posthumous humanity is but a particular case of posthumous animality, this latter presenting itself as an immediate consequence of the living world."

"The study of this principle leads me to that of the magnetic fluid, which appears to be its generator. I then analyse the different manifestations of this factor of psychology, especially in mesmerism, and I find the explanation of a crowd of phenomena, which when known only by their marvellous aspects, seem related to theology, or to her younger sister demonology. Disengaged from that supernatural interpretation, the personality from beyond the tomb appears in its proper physiognomy, and one discerns the origin of ghosts (des ombres), their physical and moral condition, and the fate reserved for them."

In this outline, but a brief reference can be made to accounts cited by the author, such particulars only being adduced as will suffice to make the application of his theory intelligible. The first case described is that of the Abbé Poyton, who died forty-five years before M. D'Assier collected the evidence, and who was reputed to have for a long time haunted his parsonage-house at Sentenac, promenading the rooms, taking snuff, repeating his prayers, and behaving in all respects like the living man. The evidence was carefully examined on behalf of M. D'Assier by the schoolmaster at Sentenac, several of the witnesses being still alive. One had sat up in the house with the mayor of the commune to investigate. While discoursing on the superstition of the villagers, they heard a noise in the room above, the sound of chairs being moved about, and of footsteps, which then descended the stairs to the kitchen. Thither, armed, the witnesses followed, posting themselves at the door. They saw nothing, but heard the steps in the room, and the sound of snuff-taking. Without opening the door, the ghost appeared to pass into the parlour, and was heard to promenade it. The investigators followed into that room, but again saw nothing, and their search throughout the house revealed no explanation of the phenomenon. Subsequently the apparition was seen, under circumstances detailed at length, by two other witnesses on different occasions. M. D'Assier finds it to be a very common feature in accounts of resonants that they resume the habits of life.

He next speaks of the case of Mr. X., who for several years haunted the house he had lived in. The apparition was seen at different places, on one and the same evening separately, by three witnesses who had known the deceased, each of whom was interrogated personally by M. D'Assier. Each had come face to face with the ghost, who appeared dressed just as in life, and was recognised distinctly. Such visible apparitions M. D'Assier considers rare. "The manifestations most usual with the posthumous personality," he says, "appear to be divers sorts of noises, sometimes of a very disturbing character, and usually at night. One hears, but sees nothing, not even the projectiles flung against the walls and floors. Sometimes, however, these nocturnal scenes are accompanied by particular circumstances which designate the author." Instances of this are then given in interesting but lengthy accounts, which I necessarily omit. Especially, M. D'Assier describes fully the disturbances at Aulus, already referred to, which lasted seventeen years, from the death of the late proprietor of the baths to their demolition in 1872. It is, however, a significant fact, which naturally confirms M. D'Assier in his belief that the "posthumous personality" is only a temporary phenomenon, that these disturbances became gradually feebler, although there were slight survivals of them even in the new baths, as late as 1877.

One frequent characteristic in the numerous accounts collected by the author is the sound of the smashing of crockery or glasses, which are afterwards found uninjured in their usual places. Another is the attempt of the unseen agent to draw the bedclothes off persons sleeping. These are features occurring also in some cases of which evidence has recently been adduced in this country. Coincident and recurrent peculiarities of this sort, in quite unconnected accounts, are a certain indication of authenticity, and may throw light on the question of significance, should the facts themselves at length compel recognition. The connection of the disturbances with the deceased appears established in a number of cases which M. D'Assier's personal researches have contributed to the literature of the subject, as well as in those he quotes from already published sources. The hauntings begin immediately, or very soon, after a death in the house, or of a person who had long resided in it. They are indicative of the character of the deceased, lasting sometimes for many years, with different degrees of frequency and violence. They become intermittent and gradually cease, but in a few cases recur after an interval even of years. Now and then the resonant is found to have a definite object—as the discovery to a relative of hidden savings—having accomplished which, it does not return. But more usually there seems no other purpose than an automatic impulse, as it were, to resume the habits of the past daily life. This automatism, so little consistent with the intelligent life which it simulates, suggests rather a posthumous somnambulism than any consciousness of existence under new conditions. So of apparitions, at or near the time of death. We are all familiar with alleged cases in which the influence of a strong affection is the apparent motive and may be the effective cause. But in others this feature is less evident. Here is one for which M. D'Assier vouches. His informant, a lady whom he names, says: "I was a young girl, in bed with my sister, who was older than myself. We had put out the candle, but the fire gave a feeble light. Turning my eyes towards the fire-place, I saw, to my great surprise, a priest sitting before it and warming himself. He had the bulk, the features, and the figure of one of my uncles who lived in the neighbourhood, and who was an arch-priest. I at once called my sister's attention to the figure. She looked and also saw it, and recognised our uncle. Terror seized us, and we cried 'Help' with all our might. My father, sleeping in a neighbouring room, was awakened by our cries, jumped up in haste and soon arrived with a candle in his hand. The phantom had disappeared; there was no one but ourselves in the room. Next day, we learned by a letter that our uncle the arch-priest had died that same evening." There is here no suggestion of a special attachment, nor was the attitude of the ghost at all expressive of any solemn purpose. Those who think, by-the-by, that ghost stories are invented, or imagined in accordance with superstitious predisposition, should explain why the accessories are sometimes so little consistent with conventional ideas on the subject.

M. D'Assier cites cases of the instantaneous passage of the "personality posthume" across continents and oceans at the time of death. "They move," he says, "with a marvellous rapidity, comparable to that of electricity and light." The identity is sometimes guaranteed by the clothes in which they appear, as in one case by a waistcoat of very peculiar pattern, afterwards discovered to have been worn by the deceased in America, where he died, his ghost being seen in France. Sometimes, as in this case, and in the following, from the author's own experience, they come to announce their death; and this may be to the seer awake or in dream. On the night of the 12th January, 1868, M. D'Assier, being in Spain, dreamed that a friend, whom he had left ill at Paris, appeared to him with the face of a corpse. Two days later he received a letter from that city announcing the death of his friend on the night of the 12th January. In dream the apparition sometimes speaks, which is otherwise exceedingly rare. Such was the case in a remarkable instance related to the author by his friend Victor Pilhes, one of a few republican patriots who nobly withstood the violation of the constitution in 1849, and suffered many years' imprisonment in consequence. M. Deville, who had been released in 1854, appeared to Victor Pilhes in a dream, on the night of the former's death, and said to him, "You are one of the men whom I have loved best in my life, I come to bid you a last adieu! I am about to die."

M. D'Assier says that he had long regarded such cases as mere coincidences, till the quantity of good similar evidence which his inquiries elicited made that suggestion utterly untenable.

THE REPORT ON MESMERISM BY THE SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

The third part of the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research contains the first report of the Mesmeric Committee, which consisted of the following gentlemen, the asterisks indicating that those so distinguished were specially responsible for the report:—W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E.*; Edmund Gurney, M.A.*; Frederic W. H. Myers, M.A.*; Henry N. Ridley, M.A., F.L.S.*; W. H. Stone, M.A., M.B.; George Wyld, M.D.; and Frank Podmore, B.A.* Hon. Secretary.

The report commences by pointing out that the work of the Mesmeric Committee differs to some extent from that appropriated to other Committees of the Society, inasmuch as in Mesmerism, unlike most of the subjects which have been included under the designation of Psychical Research, investigators have been both numerous and intelligent; the ground has been traversed and retraversed; the literature of the subject already forms a small library, and the evidence, if impartially studied, appears to be harmonious, and on many points complete. Notwithstanding this, scientific writers have united in ridiculing the pretensions of the mesmerists—at first attributing all the phenomena to trickery and delusion, and subsequently admitting many of the facts, but explaining them as within the domain of well-recognised psychological or physiological laws. And if we compare the scientific utterances of to-day with those of half a century back, we shall see that the discredit of mesmerism, as such, has been distinctly on the increase. The reason for this they explain as follows:—

"The main cause of the increasing incredulity and contempt shewn towards mesmerism, as such, has been, not an error, but a truth, or at least a partial truth,—the discovery, namely, of a real means of explaining many of the facts, without resorting to any 'mesmeric' hypothesis. The credit of this discovery is due to a countryman of our own, the late Mr. Braid, whose name deserves a wider reputation than it has received. He shewed, by a long and admirable series of experiments, that mere fixation of the eyes in a strained position was often enough to throw the subject into a condition in which many of the phenomena attributed to mesmeric influence could be easily produced. Similar experiments have been lately conducted by Professor Heidenhain, of Breslau, whose conclusions are decidedly in advance of anything contained in the standard treatises on physiology.* His explanation wholly rejects 'expectant attention,' 'dominant ideas,' and all mental factors whatsoever, and refers the phenomena to what is practically a wide extension of the range of 'reflex action.' He conceives that, in the hypnotic condition, stimulation by word or gesture of the lower sensory centres in the 'subject's' brain, instead of passing on in the usual way to the higher portion of that organ and there giving rise to consciousness and volition, passes by a direct path to the immediate centres of motion, and there gives rise to automatic responses, which may take the form of mimicry or of unconscious carrying out of simple orders. In his view, the opening of this direct path, with its result of a certain and involuntary response, is due to inhibition, brought about by monotonous sensory impressions of the functions of those higher cortical centres which are associated with choice and reasoning, and which normally control the lower motor centres. It will thus be evident that anything of the nature of a specific influence or influence in mesmerism is rejected in our day by Heidenhain, as it was by Braid forty years ago. Hypnotism or induced somnambulism, whether accompanied by consciousness or not, has been regarded as covering the whole ground, and thus, in proportion as it has become more and more orthodox to admit many of the facts commonly known as 'mesmeric,' has it become more and more heretical to attribute them to 'mesmeric agencies.'"

The Committee do not, however, think that the great divergencies arrived at by different observers are necessarily to be attributed either to prejudice or credulity, but rather in a failure to realise the immense variety of the phenomena which these abnormal states present to the student. But this conflict of opinion does, they think, necessitate renewed and careful experiment. In this fact the present Committee finds its raison d'être.

By using the term Mesmerism they do not mean to involve any theory or particular explanation of the facts. They say:—

"While for convenience sake we have adopted the most general name, we must state at once that we anticipate, as we advance, the necessity of limiting and specialising the meaning of the word 'mesmerism.' For since the term 'hypnotism,' as just explained, is confined to phenomena which may be produced without any special influence or effluence passing from the operator to the subject, and has been adopted as a complete designation of these phenomena by those who emphatically deny that any such influence or effluence can exist, it will be natural for us, if we come across further facts to which the 'hypnotic' hypothesis proves inapplicable, to describe these facts as par excellence 'mesmeric.' And, as we have seen, it would be no unfair description of these two classes of alleged phenomena, to say that the line between them is the line which, so far, recognised science has not overstepped: by the science of this country, at any rate, at the present day, 'hypnotism' is pretty widely acknowledged, and 'mesmerism' almost universally rejected."

Some preliminary experiments are thus described:—

"Before recounting our more consecutive experiments, we ought to mention that we have tried on several occasions to influence various persons—boys of from twelve to twenty years old, in the manner described by Braid, but, hitherto, with little success. The method is as follows: The person to be operated on is placed in a comfortable position in a chair. Perfect silence is observed, and every precaution is taken not to distract the attention of the patient. He is then bidden to look at a coin, or other bright object, held about fifteen inches from his forehead, in such a position as to produce in his eyes a slight inward and upward squint. Braid states that he found the great majority of the persons on whom he operated susceptible to this method. We, on the other hand, have only had even partial success in one case, that of Mr. W. North, late Lecturer at Westminster Hospital. As a full account of this experiment will be published elsewhere, it will be sufficient here to state that Mr. North, after gazing intently for upwards of half-an-hour at a bright copper disc, succeeded in bringing himself into a condition in which some of the phenomena observed by Braid and Heidenhain were successfully demonstrated, namely, (partial) insensibility to pain, extreme muscular irritability, and a deadening of the mental faculties. Equally characteristic was Mr. North's very imperfect subsequent recollection of what had taken place."

* A summary of the views advanced by Heidenhain is to be found in Dr. McKendrick's article on Mesmerism in the Encyc. Brit. Ninth Edit. Other important psycho-physiological investigations into this hypnotic state are being carried on in America, France, Italy, and Germany, as well as in our own country. We hope to notice these on a future occasion.

The rest of the phenomena described in the report were preceded by the conditions ordinarily associated with mesmeric influence. We again quote from the report:—

"But the rest of the phenomena here described were preceded by the conditions ordinarily associated with mesmeric influence. They were observed, for the most part, in a willing and intelligent young man of twenty, Fred Wells by name—the son of a baker in Brighton. Other youths have also been tried, and some are now under experiment. The operator in every case has been Mr. G. A. Smith, of Dulwich, S.E., and lately of Brighton. Mr. Smith's method with his 'subjects' is as follows: The subject is placed in the chair, with his hands in his lap, and he is told to direct his attention exclusively to a coin or other bright disc of metal, which is placed in his hands. Mr. Smith, meanwhile, draws his hands, at intervals, slowly downwards across the subject's head and face, always in the same direction. His hands, generally, do not touch the surface of the skin, nor even approach very near to it. After a time varying from two to twenty minutes has been thus occupied, Mr. Smith raises the subject's head, closes the eyes, and presses his thumb on the forehead between the eyes. He then bids him open his eyes. If the boy succeeds in doing so without difficulty, the whole operation is repeated; and if on a second trial no effect is produced, the subject is dismissed. But it not infrequently happens that the boy, when told to open his eyes, finds himself unable to do so, or only succeeds after many efforts. Mr. Smith then strokes the muscles at the corner of the mouth, and, after a short interval, both eyes and mouth being closed, he is told to open them. If the subject is a good one, he fails to do this, and it is very strange to watch the contortion of his features, and his evident vexation, whilst he endeavours to thwart the mysterious influence which has sealed his lips and eyes."

The "influence of suggestion" while the subject was in the abnormal state just described was well marked, and the Committee appear to have pretty well satisfied themselves on this point in various ways.

"To suppose that the multifarious gestures and movements, performed in support of the characters which they are bidden to assume, are parts of a conscious and deliberate scheme of deception, would be to attribute to the half-educated boys who formed the subjects of these experiments, a sustained capacity for acting a part, as well as rare genius for mimicry and power of self-control. Moreover, that the hallucination is, in most cases, complete, is the more readily perceived by its incompleteness on certain occasions. Sometimes the reasoning faculties are but partially subdued, and the boy offers a half incredulous resistance to the suggested impression. A very striking instance of this kind was the following. Mr. Smith dangled a handkerchief before a boy, telling him that it was a baby. The boy listened, but half convinced, and smiled incredulously. But he was gradually overcome by the idea suggested, and taking the handkerchief, laid it carefully across his arms, in orthodox nursery fashion. No sooner, however, did Mr. Smith divert his attention, than reason began to assert itself again. The boy discovered an unusual deficiency in his nursing; he kept furtively looking round, with most genuine anxiety and hopeless bewilderment, to discover the head of his baby. In the midst of his perplexity he was recalled to his proper senses, and joined with us in laughing at his own discomfiture."

"The illusion, however, is generally untroubled by any doubts. On one occasion, for example, Wells was given a candle, which he was assured was a sponge-cake. He broke it in pieces, remarking that it was very stale, and actually ate about an inch and a-half of it. Shortly afterwards, he began to feel the effects of his unusual meal; and, when pressed, flatly declined to have any more of 'Mr. Gurney's sponge-cakes.' On another occasion, he ate salt greedily, when told that it was sugar; and rejected sugar in great haste under the impression that it was cayenne pepper. When white pepper was blown up his nostrils, he being under the impression that it was mignonnette, not only did he not sneeze, but his eyes did not water to any appreciable extent, a fact which was ascertained by opening the lids. Other experiments intervened, and no sneezing occurred until some ten minutes afterwards, when he was given common salt, and told it was snuff. He smelt at it and then sneezed violently, with the characteristic spasm, for some little time. He drank a spoonful of vinegar with much relish, believing it to be cream, and subsequently ate a slice of bread and mustard as plum-cake, eagerly asking for more."

Various other experiments of a similar character were tried, but for these we must refer our readers to the Proceedings.

Equally satisfactory were the results in the more controverted and controvertible thesis of the "Community of Sensation," i.e., a transference of sensation from the operator to the subject. This phenomenon, they point out, is closely allied to those which have occupied the attention of the Committee on Thought-reading, the difference being that in the former the percipient is in the mesmeric sleep whereas in the latter he is in his normal state. The experiments were conducted as follows:—

"Fred Wells was placed in a chair blindfolded, and Mr. Smith stood behind him. Wells was then sent into the mesmeric sleep through passes made by Mr. Smith. Some part of the latter's body would then be pricked or pinched tolerably severely—the operation lasting, generally, one or two minutes. Perfect silence was observed throughout, except for the simple and uniform question: 'Do you feel anything?' This question was asked by Mr. Smith, as the subject appeared not to hear any other speaker. In the first set of experiments Mr. Smith held one of Wells' hands, but this was found subsequently to be unnecessary, and the later experiments were performed without contact of any kind between Mr. Smith and the sensitive."

"First Series, January 4th, 1883.

- "1. The upper part of Mr. Smith's right arm was pinched continuously. Wells, after an interval of about two minutes, began to rub the corresponding part on his own body.
- "2. Back of the neck pinched. Same result.
- "3. Calf of left leg slapped. Same result.
- "4. Lobe of left ear pinched. Same result.
- "5. Outside of left ear pinched. Same result.
- "6. Upper part of back slapped. Same result.
- "7. Hair pulled. Wells localised the pain on his left arm.
- "8. Right shoulder slapped. The corresponding part was correctly indicated.
- "9. Outside of left wrist pricked. Same result.
- "10. Back of neck pricked. Same result.
- "11. Left toe trodden on. No indication given.
- "12. Left ear pricked. The corresponding part was correctly indicated.
- "13. Back of left shoulder slapped. Same result.
- "14. Calf of right leg pinched. Wells touched his arm.
- "15. Inside of left wrist pricked. The corresponding part was correctly indicated.
- "16. Neck below right ear pricked. Same result.

"In the next series of these experiments Wells was blindfolded, as before; but in this case a screen was interposed between Mr. Smith and Wells; and there was no contact whatever between them. During two or three of the trials Mr. Smith was in an adjoining room, separated from Wells by thick curtains.

"Second Series, April 10th, 1883.

- "17. Upper part of Mr. Smith's left ear pinched. After the lapse of about two minutes, Wells cried out: 'Who's pinching me?' and began to rub the corresponding part.
  - "18. Upper part of Mr. Smith's left arm pinched. Wells indicated the corresponding part almost at once.
  - "19. Mr. Smith's right ear pinched. Wells struck his own right ear, after the lapse of about a minute, as if catching a troublesome fly, crying out: 'Settled him that time.'
  - "20. Mr. Smith's chin was pinched. Wells indicated the right part almost immediately.
  - "21. The hair at the back of Mr. Smith's head was pulled. No indication.
  - "22. Back of Mr. Smith's neck pinched. Wells pointed, after a short interval, to the corresponding part.
  - "23. Mr. Smith's left ear pinched. Same result.
- "After this, Mr. Smith being now in an adjoining room, Wells began, as he said, 'to go to sleep'; and said that he 'didn't want to be bothered.' He was partially waked up, and the experiments were resumed.

"24. Salt was put into Mr. Smith's mouth. Wells cried out, 'I don't like candle to eat' (an idea possibly suggested by the word 'candle' having been mentioned in his hearing a few minutes before).

"25. Powdered ginger, of a particularly hot description, put into Mr. Smith's mouth. Wells presently exclaimed, 'I don't like hot things; what do you want to give me cayenne for?'

"26. Salt was then again placed in Mr. Smith's mouth. Wells exclaimed, 'Why do you give me nasty hot sweetmeats?'

"27. Wormwood in Mr. Smith's mouth. Wells cried, 'Makes my eyes smart: don't like mustard.'

"It will be noticed that in these last two experiments, the taste of the ginger apparently persisted, and obscured all later sensations.

"28. Mr. Smith's right calf pinched. Wells was very sulky, and for a long time refused to speak. At last he violently drew up his right leg, and began rubbing the calf.

"After this Wells became still more sulky, and refused in the next experiment to give any indication whatever. With considerable acuteness he explained the reasons for his contumacy. 'I ain't going to tell you, for if I don't tell you, you won't go on pinching me. You only do it to make me tell. Then he added, in reply to a remonstrance from Mr. Smith, 'What do you want me to tell for? they ain't hurting you, and I can stand their pinching.' All this time Mr. Smith's left calf was being very severely pinched."

They sum up results thus:—

"Out of a total of twenty-four experiments in transference of pains, the exact spot was correctly indicated by the subject no less than twenty times. Two out of the four failures had been anticipated, previous experience having shown that the experiment rarely succeeded when the infliction consisted in pulling the hair. There remain, then, but two failures unaccounted for, and in only one of these cases was a wrong indication given, the boy merely remaining silent on the other occasion. It would be hazardous to draw any positive conclusions from the results of the four trials with tastes. But we shall hope to continue our experiments in this direction at no distant date.

"It is obvious that the impressions here recorded as having been transferred by sympathy from operator to subject might conceivably have been conveyed by a code, with less difficulty, at any rate, than in the case of the diagrams given in our report on Thought-transference, where, nevertheless, our precautions may appear to have been more elaborate than here. But the fact is that we never attempted these experiments in 'mesmeric sympathy' until we had satisfied ourselves of the genuineness and completeness of the 'mesmeric sleep.' That state was, as we think, tolerably unmistakable; nor did any one circumstance occur during the whole course of our experiments which threw any doubt on its reality, or on the perfect integrity of the operator."

The third point dealt with by the Committee is that of Rigidity and Anesthesia. They say—

"More distinct and definite testimony to the genuineness of this induced condition is to be found in our experiments on anesthesia. We satisfied ourselves, by a great number of carefully-varied experiments, that it was possible to induce in the subject: (1) either a general insusceptibility to pain inflicted on any part of his person—and this state generally existed even while he was acutely sensitive to pains inflicted on the operator; (2) or an anesthesia of some specified part of the subject's body, chosen by ourselves. Thus, a limb or a portion of a limb, after being stroked two or three times by the operator's hands, would assume a condition of perfect rigidity, in which pinching, pricking, burning, or strong electric shocks might be applied without producing the slightest protest or sign of pain."

The general conclusion is summed up in the following paragraph and with which our notice must end.

"We have dealt thus far with three main phenomena connected with the mesmeric state, viz: (1) The dominance of a suggested idea; (2) transference of sensations, without suggestion, from operator to patient; (3) induction of general or local anesthesia. The first of these three theses is, we believe, on the high road to universal acceptance. The mass of recorded testimony to it is enormous; the experiments are not difficult to repeat; and the discussions of physiologists are beginning to turn on the explanation rather than on the existence of the phenomenon. The second thesis is, of course, much more keenly contested. We think that we have added something to the facts recorded in its favour, and we have every hope of adding more. This mesmeric sympathy is, as we have suggested, entirely consonant with our experiments in Thought-transference in the normal state; and as we learn more of the philosophy of the subject it may be hoped that the two inquiries will throw reciprocal light upon each other. The third point—the production of anesthesia—has been already established by Esdaile and others with what seems to us even overwhelming completeness, and is to a certain extent admitted by many exponents of modern physiology. But here we come face to face with one form of what must now be accounted as the fundamental problem of the whole inquiry. Is this anesthesia produced by mere expectant attention exercised in a particular state of the nervous system? Is it (in somewhat different terms) the culminating example of the dominance of a suggested idea? Or is it, again, the result of the inhibition of certain sensory centres in consequence of prolonged stimulation of the peripheral extremities of the nerves. This is the explanation given by Heidenhain, and, with some modifications, previously by Braid; but it only covers the cases where the passes have been accompanied by actual contact, which in our experiments has by no means always been the case. Or is it, lastly, the result of some specific effluence from the operator which may act without actual contact, independently of the subject's knowledge or expectation? It is on this question that we are now concentrating our attention; and it is only fair to say that our results point strongly in the direction of the third—the least antecedently probable, the least generally accepted explanation. But the question of this specific influence—of mesmerism, as opposed to hypnotism—is too complex and important to be approached in a fragmentary manner. It admits of direct investigation in several ways: and we prefer to defer the publication of results until a more complete reproduction of the experiments of others, with added tests of our own, may have afforded a wider basis for discussion.

A PRIVATE SITTING WITH CECIL HUSK.

On Tuesday, the 31st July, I had at my house a sitting with Mr. Cecil Husk. Some persons of distinction were present. It was exceedingly satisfactory. I saw and heard spirits whose comparatively freed souls had been earth-dwellers in the flesh: felt as well as saw hands, "shook" them; singularly sweet music was played on a sort of stringed harp. My accordion was played; my bell was loudly, repeatedly, and continuously rung; voices were audible, not only close, but in distant parts of the room: they joined in the singing; four small drawers were emptied, and the contents strewn on the table; two glass fern vases, very delicate in construction, were removed from a side board, and placed on a table before us; there were several other manifestations.

But some of your readers will say all these are trivialities; so they are; but none the less, they carry conviction of the presence in close communion with us of spirits, whose abode (from which they are permitted to issue) is in another sphere, and are therefore proofs of the holy truth for which Spiritualists contend, the continuity of life, existing in bodily form, after the "natural" body has been laid in the grave. I see no reason why I should not accept the frequently and solemnly uttered, "God bless you," of these spirits. I should have accepted it while they dwelt among the "living."

There is no doubt that Mr. Husk is a medium of high order. I believe him to be incapable of deceit, but if he were not guided by integrity and right principle, imposition was rendered impossible by the watchfulness of eight persons, far beyond the suspicion of credulity or lack of intelligence, actuated by a spirit of scrupulousness—I will say suspicious—inquiry.

None of the friends I had known in "life" manifested themselves to me; but I believe it will not be so if I sit again with the medium. I am not, however, disposed to wish for their appearance—to my sight. I had conclusive evidence that some of such friends were present—very near to me.

I know few mediums, being well satisfied with the mediumship of Mrs. Fox Jencken (who was present on the occasion I have described). It amply suffices for my needs, for much instructive and pure enjoyment. Yes, it is enough for me, for my comfort and happiness. But I think it my duty to add to the testimony—more effectually given to you by others—that the mediumship of Mr. Husk cannot fail greatly to influence and add power to the cause we advocate, which we believe to be a blessed cause, for the glory of God, and the veritable well-being and well-doing of man.

REVIEW.

SPIRIT TEACHINGS. By "M. A. (Oxon)," Author of "Psychography," "Spirit Identity," "Higher Aspects of Spiritualism," &c., &c. London: The Psychological Press Association, 38, Great Russell-street, W.C., and E. W. Allen, 4, Ave Maria-lane, 1883. 10s. 6d.

THIRD NOTICE.

In accord with the reverential spirit characterising the "Teachings" of "Imperator," our specimens shall commence with passages relating to "The Holy Anointed One."

"M. A. (Oxon)" inquired as to the nature of the Lord's human body, and regarding the spiritual significance of His life. This is what "Imperator" taught in reply:—

"It is sufficient to say that the incarnation of an exalted spirit for the purpose of regenerating mankind is not confined to a single instance. The special salvation which mankind derives from these special saviours, is that which at the time it stands in need. These special incarnations you will know more of hereafter. For the present we say only, that they are in degree different from that of ordinary men, even as among men there is every grade of nationality in the body: some gross and sensual, others refined and ethereal.

"The human body of Jesus was of the most ethereal and perfect nature, and it was trained and prepared during thirty years of seclusion for the three years of active work that the Spirit had to do.

"You err in supposing (the thought had crossed my mind how disproportionate the preparation for the work!) that the work done by an incarnate spirit is to be bounded by the span of its earthly existence. It is very frequently, as in the case of Jesus of Nazareth, the after effect of the life that is the truest part of the work. So, though the work was begun during those three years, it has been carried on ever since. It was the union of the majestic with the humble which was the note of His life. Majesty and meanness* combined. The majesty shone out at seasons—at His birth, at His death, at intervals during His life, as at Jordan, when the attesting voice of spirit sanctified His mission. Men knew of Him all His life through, that He was not as other men; that His life was not to be bound by social ties: though the harmony of the social circle was pleasant to Him. Men knew this, and your Bible gives you, in this respect, a most imperfect idea of the influence He exercised on all who came near Him. . . . In the case of most incarnate spirits, who have descended to minister on earth, the assumption of corporeity dims spiritual vision, and cuts it off from remembrance of its previous existence. Not so with Him. So little did His ethereal body blind the sense of spirit, that He could converse with the angels as one of their own order, who was cognisant of their life, and remembered His own part in it before incarnation. His remembrance of previous life was never blunted, and a great part of His time was spent in disunion from the body and in conscious communion with spirit. . . . His life, but little hampered by the body—which, indeed, was but a temporary envelope to His spirit assumed only when it was necessary for the spirit to come in contact with material things—was different in degree, though not in kind, from the ordinary life of man—purer, simpler, nobler, more loving, and more loved. Such a life could never be understood aright by those who were contemporary with it. It is of necessity that such lives should be misunderstood, misrepresented, maligned, and mistaken. It is to a degree with all that step out from the ranks, but especially with Him. . . . Had the full life of Jesus been completed on earth, what vast, what incalculable blessings would men have reaped! But they were not fitted, and they pushed aside the proffered blessings, having but just tasted them. They were not prepared. So with all great lives. Men take from them only that which they can grasp, and leave the rest for after ages; or they push them impatiently aside, and will have none of them, and after ages worship and revere a spirit incarnated too soon."

"Imperator" shows

How the Festivals of the Church of Christ are celebrated in the Spiritual World.

"They who outside the Church have refused to keep fast and festival are not wise. They cut themselves off from a portion of the truth. But the Christian Church keeps in memory of its Head, Christmas, Epiphany, Lent, Easter, Ascension, Whitsuntide. Those are the landmarks in the Christ-life, and each represents an event in His life, with a hidden spiritual significance.

* Does the word meanness quite convey the idea? Might not "Imperator" have found, perhaps, a more happy word to express humility of estate?

"The Christmas Festival of the Birth of the Spirit on the plane of Incarnation typifies Love and Self-denial. The exalted spirit tabernacles in flesh, abnegates Self, animated by Love. It is to us the Festival of Self-denial.

"The Epiphany, the Festival of the manifestation of this new light to the world, is to us the Festival of Spiritual Enlightenment: the shining of the True Light that lighteth every-one that is born unto the world: not the carrying of it to men, but the uplifting of the Light, so that they who can see may come to it.

"The Fast of Lent typifies to us the struggles of Truth with Darkness. It is the wrestling with the Adversaries. The recurring season shadows forth a constantly recurring struggle. It is the Fast of conflict; of wrestling with evil; of the endeavour to overcome the world.

"Good Friday typifies to us the consummation of the struggle, the end that awaits all such conflicts in your world—Death: but Death in Life. It is the Festival of Triumphant Self-Sacrifice; the realisation and consummation of the Christ-life. It is no Fast, but a Festival of Triumphant Love.

"Easter, the Festival of the Resurrection, typifies to us the perfected life, the risen life, the glorified life. It is the Festival of Spirit, conquering and to conquer; of the risen-life, enfranchised and set free.

"Whitsuntide, which Christendom associates with the Baptism of the Spirit, is to us a Festival of great import. It typifies the outpouring of a large measure of spiritual truth on those who have accepted the Christ-life. It is the Festival which is the complement to Good Friday. As human ignorance slays the truth that it cannot receive: so, as a consequence, from the higher realm of spirit, comes a blessing on those who have embraced what the world has crucified. It is the Festival of the outpoured Spirit, of increased grace, of richer truth.

"As it was necessary to destroy, so is it to conserve. Even as He, the Lamb of God, the Saviour of men, rescued Divine Verities from Jewish ignorance and superstition, so do we rescue Divine Truths from the crushing weight of man's theology. As He, the Great Teacher of the Nation, unloosed the struggling souls, and released them from the dominion of spiritual evil; so do we set free the spirit from the bonds of human dogma, and bid the enfranchised Truth to soar so that men may see it, and know that it is God."

Here is what "Imperator" teaches regarding

The Occult Means employed by Spirit to Influence Men and the Qualities needed for Intellectual Mediumship.

"Others, again, are intellectually trained and prepared to give to man extended knowledge and wider views of truth. Advanced spirits influence the thought, suggest ideas, furnish means of acquiring knowledge, and of communicating it to mankind. The ways by which spirits so influence men are manifold. They have means you know not of by which events are so arranged as to work out the end they have in view. The most difficult task we have is to select a medium through whom the messages of the higher and more advanced spirits can be made known. It is necessary that the mind chosen should be of a receptive character, for we cannot put into a spirit more information than it can receive. Moreover, it must be free from foolish worldly prejudices. It must be a mind that has unlearned its youthful errors and has proved itself receptive of truth even though that truth be unpopular. More still, it must be free from dogmatism. It must not be rooted and grounded in earth notions. It must be free from the dogmatism of theologies and sectarianism and rigid creed. It must not be bound down by the fallacies of half-knowledge which is ignorant of its own ignorance. It must be a free and inquiring soul. It must be a soul that loves progressive knowledge and that has the perception of truth afar off. One that yearns for fuller light, for richer knowledge than it has yet received; one that knows no cessation in drinking in the truth." (p. 35.)

"We select, then, such a soul as we can best find, and prepare by constant training for its appointed work. We inspire into it a spirit of love and tolerance for opinions that do not find favour with its own mental bias. This raises it above dogmatic prejudice, and paves the way for the discovery that truth is manifold, and not the property of any individual. Store of knowledge is given as the soul can receive it; and the foundation of knowledge once laid, the superstructure may be safely raised. The opinions and tone of thought are moulded by slow degrees, so that they harmonise with the end we have in view.

"Moreover, a perfect truthfulness and absence of fearlessness and anxiety, are the steady growth of our teaching. We lead the soul to rest in the calm trust on God and His spirit-teachers. We infuse a spirit of patient waiting for that which we are permitted to do and teach. This spirit is the very reverse of that fretful, restless querulousness which characterises many souls. Given these high endowments, fitting man for the communion with supernal intelligences, there is still even for him and he has to reflect upon the purpose of the struggle which has to be waged with that antagonism.

The Trinity of Antagonism of the New Life.

"The struggle is severe," remarks the pupil, and one hardly knows what to fight against." "Begin within," replies the Spirit Teacher. "The ancients were wise in their description of the enemies. A spirit has three foes—itsself; the external world around it; and the spiritual foes that beset the upward path. These are described as the World, the Flesh, and the Devil. Begin with self—the Flesh. Conquer it, so that you are no longer slave to appetite, to passion, to ambition; so that self can be abnegated, and the spirit can come forth from its hermit cell, and live, and breathe, and act in the free scope of the universal brotherhood. This is the first step. Self must be crucified, and from the grave where it lies buried will rise the enfranchised spirit untrammelled, free from material clogs. This done, the soul will have no difficulties in despising the things which are seen, and in aspiring to the eternal verities. It will have learned that truth is to be found in them alone; and seeing this, it will maintain a deathless struggle with all external and material forms, as being only aluminations of the true, too often deceptive and unsatisfying."

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

Esoteric Buddhism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have this hour arrived home after a most charming visit to Longleat, Warminster, and Edington, in the county of Wilts, where I greatly enjoyed the magnificence of the place and scenery, and felt deeply interested in it as the county where our Great Alfred burnt the cakes in the cottage and afterwards defeated the Danes in a great battle.

This being Monday, and you requiring communications to reach you by Tuesday morning, must be my excuse for replying very briefly to the three letters in the number of "LIGHT" for July 28th, which attack my letter in your previous issue.

In the first place, I must beg of your readers not to regard these opinions as the general reflection of the Theosophic mind; because I have by letters and by words received from leading Theosophists many expressions of approval of my letter.

I am accused of shewing "bad feeling" and "bad breeding" and "vulgarity of tone," and my letter is said to be "offensive and disgraceful," and "superficial and flippant," and worthy of "indignation and contempt."

Now these are very strong expressions, and yet—while regretting that I should have hurt the feelings of those I personally respect—I receive them with the utmost calmness, and would only suggest that their use confirms my view, that materialists cannot possibly be Theosophists.

My good friend, Miss Arundale, seems to have misunderstood me; for when I said that "incorrigible Buddhistic and other lunatics were cast into the dust-bin of the moon," I was merely expressing Mr. Sinnett's view, and I never for one moment meant to imply that either she or Mr. Sinnett would go there.

But while on this point I would beg to be permitted to ask Mr. Sinnett why the moon, which has always been associated with love-making and romance, should be appropriated by "Esoteric Buddhists" as the place of final extinction for the wicked Buddhists? Because, of course, Christians, of whom Mr. Sinnett cannot be expected to know much, assert that their wicked souls do not go to the moon.

Mr. Sinnett says that "only the least respectable" opponents of Christianity ridicule the sacred belief of others.

If this be true, what does he say of Madame Blavatsky, a lady from whom he, second hand, receives most of his Buddhistic teaching, and who for years in the Theosophist cast rough abuse and ridicule on Christianity?

I submit that the three letters which now attack me are no reply to my former letter, and I call on Mr. Sinnett to point out one word in my epitome of his system which I did not receive either from himself or his book.

I will also take this opportunity of asking Mr. Sinnett to explain the process of "the Soul's disintegration in the Moon."

I can understand the disintegration of matter, for matter is molecular, and the chemist can separate the molecules, and present them in, say, four phials, labelled carbon, oxygen, nitrogen and hydrogen, as the exact equivalents of the said matter.

Now, if Koot Hoomi can likewise produce a disintegrated soul in, say, four phials, then I will most humbly apologise for my ridicule of his teaching, and reverently accept him as the prince of philosophers. But it is not fair to accuse me of vulgarity and bad taste because I do not worship a being of whose existence I have no proof, and who, if he exists, seems to me to teach a doctrine which is not only most untheosophical, but most absurd, and most pernicious.

Finally, notwithstanding Mr. Sinnett's objection to my using initials which can be recognised, I beg permission again to subscribe myself

G. W., M.D.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I am directed by the President and Council of the London Lodge of the Theosophical Society to correct Dr. Wyld's allegation respecting the philosophical views entertained by its Fellows.

The publications cited by Dr. Wyld in support of his charges do not constitute a profession of faith by the Society, nor is the Society committed by them to any form of doctrine whatever. The present President of the British Branch would not have accepted office in anybody professing "Atheism."

The conditions of Fellowship in the Theosophical Society do not exclude any form of exoteric belief, nor bind to any special doctrine. We are pledged only to study and investigate, and not necessarily to accept and endorse. Not authority, but reason is our guide.

But we are bound to avoid using unfriendly language towards one another, and especially towards teachers whom some among us regard with peculiar veneration and affection. It is not then on account of Dr. Wyld's religious opinions, but because of the breach of brotherly concordance occasioned by his conduct, that his continued fellowship in the Society is regarded by us as undesirable.—I am, sir, yours faithfully,

W. F. KIRBY,

Sec. London Lodge T.S.

P.S.—So far as the Society is concerned, this letter closes the correspondence on the subject.

"Divining Rods."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I should esteem it a favour if your correspondent "C.S." would communicate with me in regard to his article on the above subject, because I am extremely desirous of obtaining further information on behalf of the Society for Psychical Research, about the Swedish experiments and the publications to which he refers.

The Society of Psychical Research has already collected a considerable mass of documentary evidence bearing on this subject, chiefly through the kind assistance of Mr. E. Vaughan Jenkins, of Cheltenham.

It has also undertaken a number of experiments upon the alleged occult power of "dowsers," as users of divining rods are commonly called.

Some of these experiments are still in progress, and therefore I am unable to state that conclusive results have been obtained from them.

I am anxious also to get information as to the extent to which the various geological formations of the country are productive of water, since on this point depends the value of much of our evidence.

I shall be glad to receive communications from your readers on any of these points.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

EDWARD R. PEASE.

THE PROPOSAL TO CIRCULATE "SPIRIT TEACHINGS."—Mr. Edmonds' suggestion has brought us one or two communications on the subject. The following letter speaks for itself, but before moving in the matter we desire to know more fully the wishes of our readers:—"To the Editor of 'LIGHT.' SIR,—We have been reading 'M.A. (Oxon.)' beautiful work, entitled, 'Spirit Teachings.' It has given us much pleasure, and we think with your correspondent (Mr. T. H. Edmonds), that if circulated freely it could not fail to do good. Should the plan be carried out my daughter and self will subscribe £1 each.—I am, sir, yours truly, AGNES F. MALTBY."

THE GOD-IDEA.

PART III.*

In a chapter on "The Abuse of the Word Atheism," the author of "Natural Religion" defines an atheist as one who "disbelieves in any regularity in the Universe to which a man must conform himself under penalties." This denial of cosmical law and order, this conventional living from hand to mouth without a thought of consequences, he finds in the modern Philistine, who has no higher idea than to shuffle in some slatternly manner through life, "the abject slave of details, who worships a humiliated, dissected, and abject deity, a mere Dagon. . . fallen flat upon the grundsel-edge, and shaming his worshippers." He finds him, in short, in everyone "to whom the Universe has ceased to be a scene of law, and has become an infinite litter of detail, a rubbish-heap of confused particulars, a mere worry and weariness to the imagination." I am heartily in sympathy with this idea. Such a man, be he altogether pious (as we say) and profoundly concerned with the fringes of religion, making broad his phylacteries and parading his super-eminent goodness, has no conception of law and order beyond petty details and gritty fact, crude and undigested, and is in essentials atheistic.

It is good that we inquire now, as the Quarterly Review does, how far this conception may rightly be called a natural religion. I shall find myself separated toto celo from the writer, who says that it is neither natural nor religious. I do not value highly his contention that "it is natural to man to look above Nature to some mysterious Power beyond it," for, though the Power may be behind, it is the presentation of that Power in the phenomena of Nature that will satisfy and content the highest and most developed intellect. The phenomenal manifestation of the Supreme may well engage the attention of man in this state of being without derogating in any way from the spiritual conception, which like all other spiritual things is spiritually discerned. Nor should I, for one, be greatly dismayed if such a study of what can be realised should replace the miserable logomachies, the infinite word-twisting, the fruitless speculations that have made ordinary theology a byword. The laws of our being, since we are here in this world, concern us more, and are of more truly religious import, than the speculations of the schoolmen, even though they concern the abstruse problem, "How many angels can dance on the point of a needle?"

To deny the use of the word religion to this patient study of the works of the Supreme, and to grant it to the average belief of the unthinking religionist, is to the last degree absurd. It is beside the point to inquire to what conception of God—that X symbol that eludes and escapes all inquiry—this training leads. It may even lead to none. It may drive a man reverently to say, "Such knowledge is too wonderful for me: I cannot attain to it." Here at least, in this elementary state, he is humble enough to confess that he "cannot by searching find out God." Is he, therefore, less reverent or more misguided than the orthodox believer in a tinsel heaven and a lurid hell, who is cognisant of the whole mind of the Supreme; and whose beliefs and opinions are a hopeless jumble of blasphemy and folly? Far be it from me to pretend that Christian faith and practice is to be described fitly by any such appellatives. But, as a powerful writer has recently pointed out in these columns, popular Christianity is an unfortunately grotesque exponent of Esoteric Christianity; and an equally unfortunate burlesque of the simple doctrines of Jesus the Christ.

When all has been said, and said so well as our author says it, there must be, to the thoughtful mind, a sense of incompleteness and insufficiency in all human speculations as to these impenetrable mysteries. To the Quarterly Reviewer, the passage which I am about to quote sounds like a dirge over the wreck of the religious system, which has been so carefully elaborated, or as an epitaph written over the grave of some luckless infant that has barely survived its birth. Mr. Myers even complains that it "falls upon the reader with a shock of disenchantment." "Alas he cries, 'this book is no exception to the rule, which bids the writer of every Theodicy break off his demonstration with some abruptness, when he reaches the question whose answer it concerns us most to know.' To me, on the contrary, they breathe a dignified and pathetic beauty, which is all befitting in the man who, with hand however reverent, would venture to raise even a corner of the veil that enshrouds the throne of the Supreme. How can his dazed eye distinguish details? How dare he formulate in terms of an Athanasian creed mysteries that angels desire to look into! Better far, and more befitting, the attitude of mind that feels itself too puny to be sure of anything, and yet that has within its grasp so much of truth as it can now contain. I would rather be the writer of the pathetic, yet sublime words that follow, than the author of a library of dissertations, penned from the platform of omniscience, respecting matters which are not for man to know. 'The more our thoughts harden and deepen, as the universe grows upon us and we become accustomed to boundless space and time, the more petrifying is the contrast of our own insignificance; the more contemptible become the pettiness, shortness, fragility of the individual life. A moral paralysis creeps upon us. For a while we comfort ourselves with the notion of self-sacrifice. We say, what matter if I pass: let me think of others! But the other has become contemptible no less than the self; all human griefs alike seem little worth assuaging, human happiness too paltry at the best to be worth increasing. The whole moral world is reduced to a point: the spiritual city, 'the goal of all the saints,' dwindles to the 'least of little stars,' good and evil, right and wrong become infinitesimal, ephemeral matters, while eternity and infinity remain attributes of that only which is outside the realm of morality. Life becomes more intolerable the more we know and discover, so long as everything widens and deepens except our own duration, and that remains as pitiful as ever. The affections die away in a world where everything great and enduring is cold; they die of their own conscious feebleness and bootlessness. Supernatural religion met this by connecting love and righteousness with eternity. If it is shaken how shall its place be supplied? And what shame, I pray, is there if we bow our heads and say, How indeed?

The passage I have just quoted is an eloquent protest against that irreverent and foolish habit which theology has fostered, and which I illustrated at the commencement of this series of notes by a quotation from the Spectator. I refer to the habit of regarding God as a Being whose mind and will are known to man, who can be said to deport Himself as man would, and who can fitly be spoken of under human limitations, and as animated even by human passions. It is against this anthropomorphism that "Natural Religion" deals a heavy blow: and so far as, in so doing, its author speaks in a strain of pathetic regret at the scantiness of his own knowledge, and the persistence of his own ignorance, his words ring with a truer note than do the arrogant assumptions of a universal knowledge that sit so badly on puny man, and are so ludicrously out of place in the very feeble creatures who alone pretend to possess this omniscience. To demolish such pretensions is in itself a gain, and a necessary step to the erection of a truer conception of a Divine God, such as that which the higher Spiritualism reveals.

And where shall we look for that highest ideal? Surely in no popular and consequently vulgarised system of religion; but rather in the esoteric teaching which is the common property of all forms of faith. For some it is enshrined in the subtle conceptions of Esoteric Buddhism. Other minds not less reverent reach up through Nature to the Supreme Cause of all, to whom they are able to assign neither local habitation nor name, and whom they decline to comprehend within limitations of a human personality. For some again the phenomenal manifestation of Deity in the world of Nature is all-sufficing. But to a large section of Western thinkers who have penetrated beneath the external husk of the Christian system, their highest and noblest ideal will be found in the teachings of the Christ, and their most perfect exemplar in His own stainless and simple life. Their cry of adoring worship, "My Lord and my God" is the expression of the realisation of their highest ideal, of that which contents and satisfies the yearnings of their inmost souls. There are many such among the readers of this journal, and while they hold fast to their high ideal, and rejoice, as they must, that it is purified from the debasing conceptions that have so long degraded it, they will, I trust, not feel themselves out of sympathy with those whose aspirations and conceptions are not indeed incompatible with, but somewhat different from, their own. The central truth is reached by various paths, and the seekers start from various points, but the goal is won, and none can refuse to join in that most touching prayer of Christ to His Father that all His children—all sincere and earnest souls, wherever they now stand, however now conditioned—that all His children may be one in Him.

HABITUAL APPARITION OF A LIVING PERSON.*

There existed in the year 1845, and is still continued, in Livonia, about thirty-six miles from Riga and a mile and a-half from the small town of Wolmar, an institution of high repute for the education of young ladies, entitled the Pensionnat of Neuweleke. It is under the superintendence of Moravian directors; of whom the principal, at the time of the occurrences about to be related, was named Buch.

There were, in that year, forty-two young ladies residing there as boarders, chiefly daughters of noble Livonian families; among them, Mademoiselle Julie, second daughter of the Baron de Guldenstube, then thirteen years of age.

In this institution one of the female teachers at that time was Mademoiselle Emilia Sagée, a French lady, from Dijon. She was of the Northern type—a blonde, with very fair complexion, light-blue eyes, chestnut hair, slightly above the middle size, and of slender figure. In character she was amiable, quiet, and good-tempered; not at all given to anger or impatience; but of an anxious disposition, and as to her physical temperament, somewhat nervously excitable. Her health was usually good; and during the year and a-half that she lived as teacher at Neuweleke, she had but one or two slight indispositions. She was intelligent and accomplished; and the directors, during the entire period of her stay, were perfectly satisfied with her conduct, her industry, and her acquirements. She was at that time thirty-two years of age.

A few weeks after Mademoiselle Sagée first arrived, singular reports began to circulate among the pupils. When some casual inquiry happened to be made as to where she was, one young lady would reply that she had seen her in such or such a room; whereupon another would say, "Oh, no! she can't be there; for I have just met her on the stairway;" or perhaps in some distant corridor. At first they naturally supposed it was mere mistake; but, as the same thing occurred again and again, they began to think it very odd, and finally spoke to the other governesses about it. Whether the teachers, at that time, could have furnished an explanation or not, they gave none; they merely told the young ladies it was all fancy and nonsense, and bade them pay no attention to it.

But, after a time, things much more extraordinary, and which could not be set down to imagination or mistake, began to occur. One day the governess was giving a lesson to a class of thirteen, of whom Mademoiselle de Guldenstube was one, and was demonstrating, with eagerness, some proposition, to illustrate which she had occasion to write with chalk on a blackboard. While she was doing so, and the young ladies were looking at her, to their consternation, they suddenly saw (two Mademoiselle Sagées, the one by the side of the other. They were exactly alike; and they used the same gestures, only that the real person held a bit of chalk in her hand, and did actually write, while the double had no chalk, and only imitated the motion.

This incident naturally caused a great sensation in the establishment. It was ascertained, on inquiry, that every one of the thirteen young ladies in the class had seen the second figure, and that they all agreed in their description of its appearance and of its motions.

Soon after, one of the pupils, a Mademoiselle Antonie de Wrangel, having obtained permission, with some others, to attend a fête champêtre in the neighbourhood, and being engaged in completing her toilet, Mademoiselle Sagée had good-naturedly volunteered her aid, and was looking her dress behind. The young lady, happening to turn round and to look in an adjacent mirror, perceived two Mademoiselle Sagées hooking her dress. The sudden apparition produced so much effect upon her that she fainted.

Months passed by, and similar phenomena were still repeated. Sometimes, at dinner, the double appeared standing behind the teacher's chair and imitating her motions as she ate—only that its hands held no knife and fork, and that there was no appearance of food; the figure alone was repeated. All the pupils and the servants waiting on the table witnessed this.

It was only occasionally, however, that the double appeared to imitate the motions of the real person. Sometimes, when the latter rose from a chair, the figure would appear seated on it. On one occasion, Mademoiselle Sagée being confined to bed with an attack of influenza, the young lady already mentioned, Mademoiselle de Wrangel, was sitting by her bedside, reading to her. Suddenly the governess became stiff and pale; and, seeming as if about to faint, the young lady, alarmed, asked if she was worse. She replied that she was not, but in a very feeble and languid voice. A few seconds afterwards, Mademoiselle de Wrangel, happening to look round, saw, quite distinctly, the figure of the governess walking up and down the apartment. This time the young lady had sufficient self-control to remain quiet, and even to make no remark to the patient. Soon afterward she came downstairs, looking very pale, and related what she had witnessed.

* An abridged version of this narrative was given by the Hon. Robert Dale Owen, in his "Footfalls on the Boundaries of Another World."

But the most remarkable example of this seeming independent action of the two figures happened in this wise:—

One day all the young ladies of the institution, to the number of forty-two, were assembled in the same room, engaged in embroidery. It was a spacious hall on the first floor of the principal building, and had four large windows, or rather glass doors, (for they opened to the floor,) giving entrance to a garden of some extent in front of the house. There was a long table in the centre of the room; and here it was that the various classes were wont to unite for needlework or similar occupation.

On this occasion the young ladies were all seated at the table in question, whence they could readily see what passed in the garden; and, while engaged at their work, they had noticed Mademoiselle Sagée there, not far from the house, gathering flowers, of which she was very fond. At the head of the table, seated in an arm-chair, (of green morocco, my informant says, she still distinctly recollects that it was,) sat another teacher, in charge of the pupils. After a time this lady had occasion to leave the room, and the arm-chair was left vacant. It remained so, however, for a short time only; for of a sudden there appeared seated in it the figure of Mademoiselle Sagée. The young ladies immediately looked into the garden, and there she still was, engaged as before; only they remarked that she moved very slowly and languidly, as a drowsy or exhausted person might. Again they looked at the arm-chair, and there she sat, silent, and without motion, but to the sight so palpably real that, had they not seen her outside in the garden, and had they not known that she appeared in the chair without having walked into the room, they would all have supposed that it was the lady herself. As it was, being quite certain that it was not a real person, and having become, to a certain extent, familiar with this strange phenomenon, two of the boldest approached and tried to touch the figure. They averred that they did feel a slight resistance, which they likened to that which a fabric of fine muslin or crêpe would offer to the touch. One of the two then passed close in front of the arm-chair, and actually through a portion of the figure. The appearance, however, remained, after she had done so, for some time longer, still seated, as before. At last it gradually disappeared; and then it was observed that Mademoiselle Sagée resumed, with all her usual activity, her task of flower-gathering. Every one of the forty-two pupils saw the same figure in the same way.

Some of the young ladies afterward asked Mademoiselle Sagée if there was anything peculiar in her feelings on this occasion. She replied that she recollected this only; that, happening to look up, and perceiving the teacher's arm-chair to be vacant, she had thought to herself, "I wish she had not gone away; these girls will be sure to be idling their time and getting into some mischief."

This phenomenon continued, under various modifications, throughout the whole time that Mademoiselle Sagée retained her situation at Neuweleke; that is throughout a portion of the years 1845 and 1846; and, in all, for about a year and a half; at intervals, however,—sometimes intermitting for a week, sometimes for several weeks at a time. It seemed chiefly to present itself on occasions when the lady was very earnest or eager in what she was about. It was uniformly remarked that the more distinct and material to the sight the double was, the more stiff and languid was the living person; and in proportion as the double faded did the real individual resume her powers.

She herself, however, was totally unconscious of the phenomenon; she had first become aware of it only from the report of others; and she usually detected it by the looks of the persons present. She never, herself, saw the appearance, nor seemed to notice the species of rigid apathy which crept over her at the times it was seen by others.

During the eighteen months throughout which my informant had an opportunity of witnessing this phenomenon and of hearing of it through others, no example came to her knowledge of the appearance of the figure at any considerable distance—as of several miles—from the real person. Sometimes it appeared, but not far off, during their walks in the neighbourhood; more frequently, however, within doors. Every servant in the house had seen it. It was, apparently, perceptible to all persons, without distinction of age or sex.

It will be readily supposed that so extraordinary a phenomenon could not continue to shew itself, for more than a year, in such an institution, without injury to its prosperity. In point of fact, as soon as it was completely proved, by the double appearance of Mademoiselle Sagée before the class, and afterwards before the whole school, that there was no imagination in the case, the matter began to reach the ears of the parents. Some of the more timid among the girls, also, became much excited, and evinced great alarm whenever they happened to witness so strange and inexplicable a thing. The natural result was, that their parents began to scruple about leaving them under such an influence. One after another, as they went home for the holidays, failed to return; and though the true reason was not assigned to the directors, they knew it well. Being strictly upright and conscientious men, however, and very unwilling that a well-conducted, diligent, and competent teacher should lose her position on account of a peculiarity that was entirely beyond her control—a misfortune, not a fault—they persevered in retaining her, until, at the end of eighteen months, the number of pupils had decreased from forty-two to twelve. It then became apparent that either the teacher or the institution must be sacrificed; and, with much reluctance and many expressions of regret on the part of those to whom her amiable qualities had endeared her, Mademoiselle Sagée was dismissed.

The poor girl was in despair. "Ah!" Mademoiselle de Guldenstube heard her exclaim, soon after the decision reached her, "Ah! the nineteenth time! It is very, very hard to bear!" When asked what she meant by such an exclamation, she reluctantly confessed that previous to her engagement at Neuweleke she had been teacher in eighteen different schools, having entered the first when only sixteen years of age, and that, on account of the strange and alarming phenomenon which attached to her, she had lost, after a comparatively brief sojourn, one situation after another. As, however, her employers were in every other respect well satisfied with her, she obtained in each case favourable testimonials as to her conduct and abilities. Dependent entirely on her labour for support, the poor girl had been compelled to avail herself of these in search of a livelihood, in places where the cause of her dismissal was not known; even though she felt assured, from experience, that a few months could not fail again to disclose it.

After she left Neuweleke, she went to live, for a time, in the neighbourhood, with a sister-in-law, who had several quite young children. Thither the peculiarity pursued her. Mademoiselle de Guldenstube, going to see her there, learned that the children of three or four years of age all knew of it; being in the habit of saying that "they saw two Aunt Emilies."

Subsequently she set out for the interior of Russia, and Mademoiselle de Guldenstube lost sight of her entirely.

That lady was not able to inform me whether the phenomenon had shown itself during Mademoiselle Sagée's infancy, or previous to her sixteenth year, nor whether, in the case of any of her family or of her ancestors, a similar peculiarity had appeared.

I had the above particulars from Mademoiselle de Guldenstube herself; and she kindly gave me permission to publish it, with every particular of name, place, and date. She remained as pupil at Neuweleke during the whole time that Mademoiselle Sagée was teacher there. No one, therefore, could have had a better opportunity of observing the case in all its details.

In the course of my reading on this subject—and it has been somewhat extensive—I have not met a single example of the apparition of the living so remarkable and so incontrovertibly authentic as this. The institution of Neuweleke still exists, having gradually recovered its standing after Mademoiselle Sagée left it; and corroborative evidence can readily be obtained by addressing its directors.

This narrative proves, beyond doubt or denial, that under particular circumstances the apparition or counterpart of a living person may appear at a certain distance from that person, and may seem, to ordinary human sight, so material as not to be distinguishable from a real body; also that this appearance may be reflected from a mirror. Unless the young ladies who were courageous enough to try the experiment of touching it were deceived by their imaginations, it proves, further, that such an apparition may have a slight, but positive, consistency.

It seems to prove, also, that care or anxiety on the part of the living person may project (if I may so express it) the apparition to a particular spot. Yet it was sometimes visible when no such cause could be assigned.

It proves, further, that when the apparition separated (if that be the correct expression) from the natural body, it took with it a certain portion of that body's ordinary life and strength. It does not appear that in this case the languor consequent upon such separation ever reached the state of trance or coma, or that the rigidity observed at the same time went as far as catalepsy; yet it is evident that the tendency was toward both of these conditions, and that that tendency was the greater in proportion as the apparition became more distinct.

Two remarkable peculiarities mark this case: one, that the appearance, visible without exception to everyone else, remained invisible to the subject of it; the other, that though the second figure was sometimes seen to imitate, like an image reflected in a mirror, the gestures and actions of the first, yet at other times it seemed to act entirely independent of it; appearing to walk up and down while the actual person lay in bed, and to be seated in the house while its counterpart moved about the garden.

It differs from other cases on record in this: that the apparition does not appear to have shewn itself at any considerable distance from the real person. It is possible (but this is theory only) that, if it had, the result on Mademoiselle Sagie might have been to produce a state of trance during its continuance.

This case may afford us also a useful lesson. It may teach us that it is idle, in each particular instance of apparition or other rare and unexplained phenomenon, to deny its reality until we can discover the purpose of its appearance: to reject, in short, every extraordinary fact until it shall have been clearly explained to us for what great object God ordains or permits it. In this particular case, what special intention can be assigned? A meritorious young woman is, after repeated efforts, deprived by an habitual apparition of the opportunity to earn an honest livelihood. No other effect is apparent, unless we are to suppose that it was intended to warn the young girls who witnessed the appearance against materialism. But it is probable the effect upon them was to produce alarm rather than conviction.

The phenomenon is one of a class. There is good reason, doubtless, for the existence of that class; but we ought not to be called upon to show the particular end to be effected by each example. As a general proposition, we believe in the great utility of thunderstorms, as tending to purify the atmosphere; but who has a right to require that we disclose the design of Providence if, during the elemental war, Amelia be stricken down a corpse from the arms of Celandon?

PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD IN THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

In a letter just received from a Catholic friend she says: "Miss C. told me, last Tuesday, July 31st, she received a letter from Madame Fellippani, one of the ladies of the Sacré Cœur at Rome. She enclosed a little prayer for the dying, with an appeal that as every instant someone is dying, Miss C. should pray much for them. The next day, Wednesday, she prayed much for the dying. At Mass it was her one thought, and even here, where they all came in the afternoon, her mind, she told me, was with the dying. The day before Madame Fellippani wrote, her own brother had been killed in the earthquake at Ischia, and on the Wednesday when Miss C. was with the dying all day, a beloved aunt, whose death bed she would, if possible, have attended, died unexpectedly in America. The telegram of her death arrived here on Saturday. Thus Madame Fellippani and Miss C. had both (in thought) been with their beloved. The news from America was much softened by this occurrence."

A.M.H.W.

The West of England Spiritualists held one of their field days on Sunday last, when orations were delivered in their meeting hall by Mrs. C. Groom, of Birmingham. The services were well attended, large numbers of persons, in fact, being unable to gain admission in the evening. The subjects of the discourses were the "Antiquity of Man," and the "Light-bringer of the Times." At the conclusion of each service Mrs. Groom gave what is known as clairvoyant descriptions, which were satisfactory. It is certainly a sign of the times that this body, which four years ago did not exist as such locally, can now command large and intellectual audiences at the lectures given under its auspices.—Deon County Standard, August 11th.

CHRISTIANA, THE SOMNAMBULE, IN 1820.

From the forthcoming volume of "Pioneers of the Spiritual Reformation" (Lives of Kerner and Howitt by Mrs. Howitt-Watts)* we are enabled to give the following narrative from the earliest work on Psychology which appeared from the pen of Kerner.

"The first of Dr. Kerner's remarkable series of works connected with the inner life of man appeared in the year 1826. It is entitled 'The History of two Somnambules, together with certain, Notable Things from the Realms of Magical Cure and Psychology. It is a book entirely unknown to the English reader, never having been translated, and now scarce in Germany. It is a diary kept by Kerner with reference to two remarkable patients of his; the one the daughter of a vine-grower at Weinsberg, the other a young woman born at Stuttgart and living in service at Weinsberg. Both patients exhibited marvellous phenomena, and, treated magnetically by their physician, both were ultimately restored to perfect health."

The following facts, extracted from "The Two Somnambules" may interest our readers. "They relate," says Kerner, "to a thoroughly respectable girl, a true child of nature, the daughter of an honest citizen and vine-grower at Weinsberg, a girl whose occupations consisted in cultivation of the vineyard and garden during the week, and on Sundays in reading her Bible and hymn book. Her innate talent was, however, such that together with the thorough instruction she had received at school, she could, especially in writing her mother tongue, vie with young ladies educated at celebrated academies. Possibly, her father, who in his youth had been well educated, had cared for the improvement of his daughter."

"The education manifests itself in the following account drawn up by him of the singular origin of the sickness of his children."

"In the year 1816 on the 6th July," he writes, "my son named Frederick was seized with indisposition. It shewed itself in the following manner. On the previous morning he stepped before the looking-glass—a thing quite unusual with him—and contemplated his reflection. Upon this he burst forth into the most immoderate laughter which seemed to convulse his whole body. He was reproved by me severely for this. He replied that he felt himself impelled to this laughter in spite of himself. He went that day to school and also the following morning, but returned in about an hour complaining of a severe pain in his head and eyes. A doctor was summoned who advised baths and various medicines, but the boy declared that it was quite fruitless to administer them, because he must surely die. However, through obedience and love, he submitted to the treatment prescribed, declaring, however, continually that "all was in vain." The schoolmaster came to see the poor fellow as he lay apparently dead, stiff and cold, and took his hand, saying, "Good night Fritz!" Immediately that the hand of his schoolmaster touched him, he recognised him and exclaimed, "I shall have no more good nights. This will not last long." Thus he fell asleep at the age of eleven years, one month, and fourteen days, after twenty-four hours' illness."

"Although we all," continues the father, "felt the death of this good boy with much sorrow, the one most inconsolable was my daughter Christiana, thirteen years of age. From this period she experienced so strong a yearning after her dead brother that she frequently would hide herself in a room beneath the roof of our house, from whence she could gaze into the churchyard where he was interred, and would there spend hours weeping; thus gradually through this excessive yearning after her brother, and through her many tears and lamentation, did this poor girl fall into a serious state of ill-health."

A second brother, aged thirteen, four years later, was seized with a severe cough, and during his illness he burst forth into terrible weeping. Upon repeated inquiry as to the cause of this sudden grief, he cried aloud the name of Fritz, declaring that to him he must go; and then fell into a condition which threatened convulsions, his eyes having become fixed.

Dr. Kerner was sent for to this poor boy. He was placed in bed, and fell into a sort of delirium, being possessed of such strength that it required three persons to keep him in bed. He repeatedly uttered loudly the name of his brother, and said that Fritz was present, and that he must embrace him. He said that his brother wore a long white robe, a yellow sash round his waist; upon his head a crown, and a golden cross upon his breast. He spoke to persons around him as though they were his brother, and said that at three o'clock the next morning Fritz would come to fetch him. After further magnetic treatment being employed by Dr. Kerner, the cough returned for a time, and he gradually became cured entirely.

The condition of Christiana also now grew one of anxiety; the yearning after her dead brother continued ever overwhelmingly. She fell into sudden trances, had clairvoyant, symbolical and prophetic dreams. Certain persons she could not endure in her neighbourhood, anxiety and distress falling upon her in their presence, without any assignable reason. Thus she occupied herself chiefly in the open air, and worked with extraordinary industry in the vineyard and garden. But even there, she would frequently be overcome by the trance-condition, and be found asleep beneath a tree. At such times her countenance would be filled with an inexpressible gentleness and sweetness; she would speak of being taken by a guide into an indescribably lovely region, which she said was Paradise, and even yet higher into a region which appeared to her still more beautiful and glorious. Nevertheless, all that spring she complained of great weakness, and as summer wore on serious symptoms of ill-health supervened. Dr. Kerner was in October called in, and then commenced his systematic magnetic treatment of Christiana, the history of which forms the first portion of his "History of Two Somnambules." Its contents are only second in interest to those in his later and more celebrated work, "The Seeress of Prevorst." Christiana in her state of trance prescribed her own treatment, foretold her approaching crises, became a highly-developed clairvoyante and a sensitive to whom the secrets of nature were revealed—as for instance the curative properties of herbs and trees, the properties of metals and minerals, &c. To her also were presented beautiful visions of the world of spirits. Through the judicious treatment of Dr. Kerner, who availed himself wisely of the clear-seeing of his patient, this interesting girl was restored within the space of three years to entire health. The history is one well worth the labour of translation, since it is a store-house of facts relative to the employment of mesmerism as a curative agent.

The following passage is given as a specimen of the spiritual visions of Christiana:—

"October 26th, 1820. She complained of headache. Later on violent cramp in the stomach came on. After ten o'clock she was magnetised for a considerable time. She said, after a shiver had gone through her, 'There is something supernatural in the room.' I assured her that nothing was present except her father and myself. She said: 'But what is that beautiful music which I hear out of the distance? It is of a peculiar kind. Such tones I cannot bear.' Later she said: 'I look into an indescribably lovely valley. There upon the grass, beneath a green tree, are seated two rows of happy spirits. They are clothed in white, and one plays upon a harp. These are the sounds which I heard; they come from the right hand. Oh! what happiness! Thither leads a dark and narrow path, but when once this is passed one comes into a lovely open region. Oh! that I could only find amongst them my brother Frederick! Certainly he is there.' She wept bitterly. Soon she cheered up, and said: 'Now is my brother near me to my right hand. I see the most beautiful trees and a mountain, more beautiful by far than our Weibertou. Oh! that I were only there! I see houses and huts beneath trees as if they belonged to hermits.' Again she said, and a shudder ran through her as before, 'There is something supernatural in the room! Something smiles upon me from above! What a smile! That must be an angel, or the Eye of God! Also I behold very far off the fully glorified; their splendour it would be impossible for me to endure except at a distance. Now all is closed again. Wake me up!' When she awoke she was very cheerful, and much strengthened."

"October 28th. After I had magnetised her about half-an-hour she had cramp in her mouth. She seized my hand and laid it upon her lips. By this means the cramp was lessened, but not entirely gone. She asked for magnetised water, and having drunk it, the cramp had departed. Then came on sudden starting and shuddering. She said: 'I hear music, as the tone of an organ.' Then Frederick appeared, and she, in a low voice, said bit by bit as follows: 'My Frederick is close to my bed, and tells me that through these magnetic passes I shall recover."

I am difficult to bring into the sleep. I was once nearly but too quickly brought almost to the condition of trance. But my Frederick says it was dangerous.* It was as though my soul had been divided from my body. I see such clearness and so many objects around me that it is impossible to describe. It is as if Heaven were opened. There smiles an angel down upon me. He wears two crowns of flowers. And there above, far within, I dare not gaze, but I see a form whose countenance is surrounded by rays as of sunlight. Oh! that I could ascend thither. My Frederick says that when I sleep I may do so. Now I understand why I had that cramp. It was to prepare me to ascend on high!' I asked how she knew this. 'My Frederick tells me so,' she replied.

"November 2nd. She had cramps in the head and eyes, and her voice failed. I breathed into her mouth, and the cramp departed. She said immediately, 'There stands Frederick again. He carries in his hand a spray of apple-blossom. That causes me awe, for I know that now it is not the spring. I behold a number of beautiful trees, and a pear-tree of unusual size in blossom. Why am I so full of awe! I know that it really is the autumn—this is all to me so preternatural. I hover between waking and sleeping! My body is not here—my soul wishes to go forth. It is as though I had no home.' She added, 'Alone through magnetic treatment shall I regain my health.' Then she beheld a valley of exquisite beauty where was a clear, bright fountain from which she drank. Then a cornfield where three angels were reaping corn, &c."

A WARNING VOICE.—A correspondent writes: An officer of the late Bengal army, retired after long service, for a year before his death was confined to bed, and during the day was attended by his sister, a very intelligent person, not at all of a nervous temperament. On one occasion she left his bedroom for a change to the dining-room. Both were very commodious apartments and on the same floor, but had no direct communication with each other; in a short time, after she had left the bedroom, she heard very distinctly and in a clear voice, "You are wanted in the next room," upon entering it she found her brother prostrate upon the floor quite exhausted and unable to get into bed; he died in a few days. There was no one upon that floor but themselves. The lady affirmed that she heard the voice as distinctly as she heard mine, and was annoyed when I asked if she had not been mistaken. I was very intimate with both, and more truthful and excellent people it would be difficult to find; she often referred to the voice when speaking of her brother's illness. I understand Spiritualists believe that every one has a guardian spirit; this case and "the warning voice," published in a recent number of "LIGHT," may be examples, but comparatively few cases of the kind so far as I know are recorded. If guardian spirits do not warn us of danger or evil, or influence us to perform good actions I am at a loss to know what their duty is, or for what purpose they attend us. Would some of your readers kindly enlighten me?—W.M.B.

* Calmaguet relates that one of his somnambules was so far gone that he was in great terror, lest he should be unable to recall her back to life again. It was only with great difficulty that he brought her back.

REVIEW.

But he soon encountered another class of facts, which he had no difficulty in relating to the former. From the posthumous phantom he came to the discovery of the "living phantom," or what is known to students of this literature as the doppelgänger or "double." M. D'Assier seems seldom to have drawn from books for information in the first instance, but only to have consulted them when he had laid a basis for his inductions in living testimony. A similar method is being followed by the Psychical Research Society here, though he occasionally shows a facility of belief as regards some ill-verified statements in books which would not be accepted by our English investigators. After citing a few more of his cases, he proceeds to note the usual characteristics and conditions of the phenomenon. A sort of syncope or trance marks the expeditions of the "double," but often a deep sleep suffices. On return to normal consciousness, there will sometimes be a distinct recollection of the journey, at others it will seem a dream, or the waker will retain only fragmentary impressions of his distant proceedings, perhaps will bring back no consciousness of them whatever.

Supposing the human phantom to remain in what is described as a fluidic connection with the physical organism, drawing therefrom all its force, it follows that this force will be at its maximum at the point of departure, and will be feeble and less effective as it recedes from its centre of action. That is exemplified in the power of speech, as in the extraordinary case related to Jung Stilling by the Baron de Salza, Chamberlain to the King of Sweden. The Baron, returning home one day, was met in the park near the house by his father, dressed as usual, with whom he had a long conversation on their way back. They entered the house, and proceeded together to the father's room. On going in, the Baron saw his father in bed undressed, and in a profound sleep. At the same moment the apparition with which he had been discoursing vanished. On awaking, the father described a dream in which he had seen his son in danger of drowning (as the fact had been that day), thus proving that his double had been really abroad, and that the subsequent meeting and conversation (though apparently not recollected by the dreamer) were no hallucination of the Baron's. In this case, according to M. D'Assier, the faculty of speech was due to propinquity with the sleeping organism; whereas in other cases which he cites, where the apparitions had travelled great distances, though distinct, they were mute. He is, however, prepared with an enlargement of his theory, as well to cover some alleged exceptions in this respect, as to account for the extraordinary vitality of the posthumous phantom long after its complete disengagement from the lifeless corpse. "The phantom can draw its force, not only from the body whence it proceeds, but also from persons with a physical or moral constitution in peculiar relation to its own, or who have a marked aptitude for what are commonly called the phenomena of Spiritism ('mediums')." The Seeress of Prevorst possessed this faculty in the highest degree. She felt herself nourished by the emanations of those who came to see her. Those of her own family, owing to the conformity of their constitutions, were most subject to this sort of vampirism, and they soon felt themselves enfeebled in her presence."

The progress of his inquiry next led M. D'Assier to seek further generalisations in the records of a literature long despised. For an educated, and even scientific writer in the nineteenth century to speak seriously of witchcraft, at first seems an unaccountable eccentricity. But it must be remembered that the credibility of facts coming under that denomination does not imply the connotations of mediæval conventional belief on the subject arising from theological preconceptions. Yet it is undoubtedly in the rejection of these by modern intelligence that the original cause of incredulity in the facts referred to is to be found. The assumption that the facts are themselves objectionable to science was a mere after-thought, when they had already ceased to be matters of belief, and when the evidence for them had been forgotten. That the phenomenon has died out with the popular belief in it is a common assertion alone sufficient to dispose of the question of its truth in most minds; but it is an assertion which is open to some question. If the essential fact of witchcraft be, as M. D'Assier thinks, the extrusion and physical agency of an interior and fluidic semblance, a body of subtle and evanescent materiality, this agency might avail to explain many of the alleged physical phenomena of so-called Spiritualism, or Spiritism, should these ever come to be admitted. That the manifestations no longer take on the forms dictated by mediæval beliefs is only what might be expected by anyone who recognises the power of the human imagination (whether consciously or unconsciously exercised) to modify whatever belongs to the organism. It is thus also a matter of course that we should hear little now of witchcraft as a malevolent influence, since the modern "medium" has not what may be called the Satanic faith which was an essential factor in such operations. And the old "imps" are quite naturally succeeded, in accordance with altered ideas, by the supposed departed spirits, or the "John Kings" and "Peters" of the séance-room.

On this subject, generally considered, I know nothing more instructive than the opening chapter, "On the Declining Sense of the Miraculous," in Mr. Lecky's "Rise and Influence of Rationalism in Europe." We there see the utter powerlessness of evidence, even when examined and approved by the most educated intellects of the age, to contend against the indirect, negative influence of antagonistic conceptions. That credulity was favoured by intellectual predisposition in the Middle Ages, is a common-place, and, doubtless, true remark. But it is also pre-eminently true that the incredulity which succeeded it was not only favoured, but actually and solely caused by a contrary predisposition. It signified nothing that men wholly exempt from the credulous bias stood forward, on grounds of evidence alone, in defence of the dying belief. Of Glanvil, the author of Sadducismus Triumphans, Mr. Lecky says: "To those who only know him as the defender of witchcraft, it may appear a somewhat startling paradox to say that the predominating characteristic of the mind of Glanvil was an intense scepticism. He has even been termed by a modern critic 'the first English writer who had thrown scepticism into a definite form.'" He was an ardent advocate of the new inductive philosophy, with its tendency to discard all beliefs resting merely on authority or tradition. Yet on this subject he was one of the earliest to protect against what has since been called the credulity of unbelief, or in Goethe's phrase, the "inverted superstition" of incredulity. Nor was he alone. And "no writer," says Mr. Lecky, "comparable in ability or influence to Glanvil,

More, Cudworth, or even Casaubon, appeared to challenge the belief." Yet "the scepticism that was already pervading all classes was steadily and silently increasing, under the influence of an intellectual movement that was too general and too powerful for any individual genius to arrest."

The space at my disposal will not allow me to transcribe the evidence adduced by M. D'Assier from the trials for witchcraft. I can only refer those who would appreciate its weight to his book, or, still better, to the original records. M. D'Assier takes them chiefly from the works of Des Monceaux, a contemporary Catholic writer of great research in these matters.

Putting aside all that pertains to demonology, M. D'Assier concerns himself solely with these phenomena as illustrating organic duplication and projection. He finds it impossible to deny to the phantom an actual organism, with a potentiality, in proportion to the energy it derives from its physical centre, of performing all the functions of physical life. Connected with the body, at however great a distance, by invisible capillary bonds, it can be retracted or re-absorbed with instantaneous rapidity. That is proved by a phenomenon which is a familiar feature in accounts of this description. It is called Repercussion. The fluidic phantom is sufficiently material to receive an injury or impression, and an immediate examination of the person of the medium or "witch" will discover a wound or mark on a corresponding part of the body. The lien or rapport is so intimate that the physical organism receives the shock at almost the same moment as its counterpart.

Some of us have heard of ingenious contrivances for exposing "mediums" by staining the "spirit hands," or the implements moved about at sances, with colouring matter, afterwards found upon the person of the medium. Upon the hypothesis that it is the medium's "double" which is concerned in the manifestations, M. D'Assier would say that it is exactly what we should expect, and that it proves nothing whatever for the intended purpose.

Further to exhibit the characteristics of these phenomena, M. D'Assier cites, at length, one of the best attested cases on record—that of Mary Gough, the evidence for which is to be found in Baxter's "Reality of the World of Spirits." A later case* recorded by Dale Owen, American Ambassador at the Court of Naples, is still more extraordinary and instructive in regard to the possibilities of the human "double." It is that of Emilie Sagée, governess in a ladies' school, at Riga, in Livonia. Here the body and its double were observed simultaneously, in broad day, and by many persons. "One day all the school, forty-two in number, were in a room on the ground-floor, glass doors leading into the garden. They saw Emilie gathering flowers in the garden, when suddenly her figure appeared on a vacant sofa. Looking instantly into the garden they still saw Emilie there; but they observed that she moved languidly and as if exhausted or drowsy. Two of the bolder approached the double, and offered to touch it; they felt a slight resistance, which they compared to that of muslin or crape. One of them passed through part of the figure; the apparition remained some moments longer, then disappeared, but gradually. This phenomenon occurred, in different ways, as long as Emilie remained at the school, for about a year and a-half in 1845 and 1846, with intermittent periods from one to several weeks. It was remarked that the more distinct and material the double appeared, the more uneasy, languid, and suffering was the real person; when, on the contrary, the double became feeble, the patient recovered strength. Emilie had no consciousness of her double, nor did she ever see it."

M. D'Assier comments at length upon this story, which sufficiently illustrates his view of the connection between the physical organism and its distant representative. "The phantom," he says, "was formed at the expense of the body, drawing to it, by a sort of aspiration, the constitutive elements. . . . Linked by an invisible net-work of vessels to the body, the phantom can draw to itself the vital forces of the latter. One then sees the life by a singular inversion deserting the body, which becomes proportionately corpse-like; and transferring itself to the phantom, which thus obtains an extraordinary consistence. With the living, it is an exceptional phenomenon. But when death has burst the bonds attaching it to our organism, it is separated, as it were definitively, from the body, and constitutes the posthumous phantom."

TEACHING IN "PHILOCHRISTUS," REGARDING THE HOLY SPIRIT.*

Then he said to me, "Not many days gone by I heard Jesus speak concerning the Holy Spirit; and His words were on this wise: As in each man, the man's breath or spirit is the life of the body, so in each man there is a certain holy breath or spirit, which is the life of the soul; whence also cometh every good thought and deed unto the man. Moreover thou seest the air which we breathe, and which is the breath of our bodies, is but a part of that great sea of air which embraceth the whole earth, so that there is nothing hidden from the touch thereof, in so much that the same air or breath which is coming towards us from yonder mountain top, making the terebinth trees to bow, and which even now rustleth in the olive-trees above us, even this is our breath and our life. Now I have heard Jesus say that there is a likeness between this breath of our bodies and the breath or spirit of our souls. For as the wind bloweth where it listeth, and we hear the sound thereof, but know not whence it cometh or whither it goeth, even so it is with the spirit of our souls, the spirit of goodness, which is the Holy Spirit of God."

Then I said, "But how shall we obtain this Holy Spirit? Or is it indeed needful that we should obtain it, seeing that we have it already? Or do some have it, but others have it not?" Nathaniel answered and said, "All have it. But some have little; and none much; and Jesus has come that we may have it abundantly. But how we shall obtain it, this I know not now. But this I know, that Jesus hath the Holy Spirit in Himself, and that He will impart it to us. For I heard Him say that no man can enter into the Kingdom of God unless he is born again of the Holy Spirit."

Nathaniel smiled and said, "Our Master also teacheth that the presence of the Holy Spirit is with two or three, whensoever they are gathered together in His name. But this doctrine He foundeth not on words of Scripture; but methinks He seeth that there is a certain spirit of goodness, or kindness, which passeth from one man to his neighbour, and gathereth strength as it passeth. For it is the Spirit of Love. Wherefore, as it seemeth to me, our Master teacheth that the Holy Spirit is present in some sort in the intercourse between man and man, whensoever men do aught together as the children of God."

"But yet," said I, "I would fain know why the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, is not forgiven." Thus said Nathaniel, "All men have within themselves some portion of the Spirit of God; even as we now have some portion of that great wind and breath of Heaven, which here in Jotapata is rustling in the olive branches, and yonder at Capernaum is driving the fishing-boats; and out in the Great Sea is speeding the ships of Tarshish on their path. Now if thou closest thy mouth and thy nostrils against the winds of heaven and sayest, 'The air is poison to me, I will not breathe it,'—behold thou perishest. Even so it is with the Holy Spirit. Every man that cometh into the world, hath in him some portion of the Holy Spirit, and dependeth and liveth thereon. But if he shall say knowingly in his heart, 'I will not breathe thereof; I will call good evil, and the Holy Spirit I will call it unholy;' then lo, his spirit dieth within him, and he can no more enter into the life of God."

"THE SCIENTIFIC BASIS OF SPIRITUALISM," by Epes Sargent—his last great work previous to his decease—is a book replete with facts, showing that the spiritual philosophy is a natural science, and consequently, not outside of nature. It should be in the hands of every investigator in the world.

MR. GERALD MASSEY, writing to the Banner of Light, says:—"At this auspicious moment I send to press the last section of the literary work on which I have spent twelve years of life and labour, and shall soon be free to take the platform once more. I have now kept silence for ten years on purpose to have something new to say. It is possible that I may open fire in London; but I am also looking forward, as indeed I have been doing for years, to making my second lecturing tour through the States. I have never forgotten my audiences there, in which 1,000 listeners could at times be seen craning forward as with one face that hungered to catch an utterance of the most advanced thought."

* PP. 177-89.—"Philochristus, Memoirs of a Disciple of the Lord." Second edition, London, 1878. To this beautiful book, which should be welcome to all readers of "LIGHT," we hope to return on some future occasion.

A Seance with Mr. D. D. Home.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In November, 1862, I was present at one of Mr. D. D. Home's seances in the house of Mr. S. C. Hall, "The Boltons," to which Mr. John Bright had been invited, he having expressed a strong wish to see something of Spiritualism. On the day of the seance, Mr. Hall received a note from Mr. Bright asking to be allowed to bring a friend, Mr. Lucas, editor of the Star Newspaper. Fortunately Mr. Home was in the house at the time and at once consented—though the full number had been invited, but he never refused if he could help it. Not many minutes after we were seated at the large heavy round table, knocks were given for the alphabet, and the words given were "You are trying to prevent our raising the table." Mr. Hall asked, "Who is trying?" and pointed to each in succession when three knocks for "Yes," were given in front of Mr. Lucas, who at once said, "Yes, I was putting my whole weight upon it." I, sitting next but one to him, then asked, "Do you think that right?" "Oh! yes," he answered, "I came here to investigate." "Certainly," I said, "but neither to assist nor retard the movements." A message then came, desiring Mr. — to sit upon the table; this was a stout gentleman, who was present. The desire was at once complied with, and instantly the table was not only raised but tossed up as you would toss a baby in your arms—saying as plainly as words could have done, "You tried to prevent our raising the table with nothing upon it, and we will prove to you that we can do it with this additional weight." We had a great deal more during the evening which was satisfactory and convincing, but I do not like to take up too much of your space, and one such fact as the above is enough. No one who was present at the seance can forget it.

The God-Idea.

DEAR SIR,—I have read "M.A. (Oxon's)" notes in your last with some surprise, and regret that the Spectator's remarks should have met with so much sympathy from him. The distressing event which called them forth is, after all, but one of a series which are happening every day all over the world. Why should this case be singled out, and commented on as if it stood alone? If the subject is to be discussed at all, let it be treated in its completeness. Let instances be collected and examined, so that there may be a chance of correct generalisation: and it will soon be found that the question amounts to this: Why does God not interfere to prevent all the calamities which desolate nations and families in every part of the world? And this will be much the same as asking, Why does He not so neutralise the effects of broken laws as to make this world a far safer and happier dwelling-place for His creatures than it is? Perhaps, put in this form, it sounds too much like a child's question, but I cannot help this. What would be the use of laws if God were always stepping in to prevent the consequences of their violation? What would become of human freedom? And how would such a state of things contribute towards man's discipline, towards his victories over himself, and over the difficulties, natural and spiritual, which encompass him? Is it not by conflicts such as these that true and noble characters are formed? We are told that natural laws are "cruel, pitiless, and tyrannical." But they are so to those only who fail to place themselves in harmony with them. The exceptions are more apparent than real. The cruelty, then, cannot be charged upon the law, but upon its violator. A man commits a crime, and brings himself and his family into disgrace and poverty, perhaps transmits disease to his posterity. This proves, not cruelty in the law, but wickedness in the breaker of it. Another places himself in a dangerous position, and in a moment of inattention or carelessness his foot slips, and he is mangled to death, or disabled for life. A tire comes off the wheel of a railway carriage, or a signal man is asleep at his post, and the result is maiming or death to the passengers. The question is just as reasonable in these cases as in the Sunderland disaster. Why did not God interpose to prevent so much misery? It is one of cause and effect. The cause is in man. Were God habitually to prevent the effect, would not this be to stultify Himself?

But apart from these considerations, does it not seem rather presumptuous for men, from their very circumscribed point of view, to pretend to judge of the working of so vast a machine, and to found on their narrow deductions a case against the Divine character?

The writer is severe against "the anthropomorphic conceptions of vulgarised theology." But it is likely even these would be preferable to the vague conception of "an impersonal Over-soul," which "in no wise interferes with the affairs of this world." For myself, I trust to have escaped both conceptions. And yet I believe, with thousands of far greater intelligence than myself, that God is an infinite Humanity. "M.A." seems to think that personality and humanity, as applied to God, suppose limitation—perhaps because he has not yet shaken off the last vestiges of materialism, which are apt to cling to the most spiritual of us. However this may be, he will find that by abstracting his mind from material ideas, especially of time and space, it will not be so difficult to perceive that God must possess all the essentials of humanity in an infinite degree—that therefore He is human in first principles, and that, for this very reason, we are men, made "in His image and likeness." It is very well to ridicule the crude conceptions of the ignorant and undeveloped, but anthropomorphism is necessary to human conceptions of Deity. Rightly understood, it is rational and philosophical. In proportion as it is discarded, the idea of God becomes confused and impractical. We cannot love an impersonal essence, or an Over-soul. To call such a thing "our Father" is too ludicrous. So little hold can it have on our reverence or our love, that we may say hard things against it without a pang of conscience.

Mankind, with few exceptions, always has believed, and always will believe (whatever "philosophers" may tell them) in a Supreme Intelligence, whose children they intuitively feel they are, and whom they worship as Father. And if a father, then, of necessity, a person, who cares for his children, and rules them with a view to their eternal good.

I cannot but feel that the writer, whom I greatly esteem, will acknowledge on reflection, that these views are more rational and harmonious than the cold and repulsive ideas of God which "science," stepping out of her proper sphere, has thought fit to present us with.

W. D. AVENING.

Atherley-road, Shanklin.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have been so greatly benefited by the weekly contributions to "LIGHT" of "M.A. (Oxon.)," that I wish to make some little acknowledgment in kind, by stating so much of "the true faith of a Christian" as bears on his "Notes" in your last number.

It is true, as he remarks, "that for those who accept as final the revelation made to man by Christ the question is already closed"; but closed only in the same way as any question regarding the validity of Euclid's Elements is closed to a mathematician. It is always open to, and incumbent on, every truth seeker to regard as an open question for him whatever, whether in moral or scientific doctrine, is not clear to his understanding or does not seem satisfactory to his sense of justice. The object of revelation is to make clear what would otherwise remain dark—to solve, not increase mysteries. I accept the Christian religion as the best, because it alone of all that I know, when rightly apprehended, fully justifies the ways of God to man.

Your correspondent says:—"On the Spectator's assumption of a personal God, who is omnipotent, and omniscient, and who possesses free-will, I can see no answer whatever that is even moderately satisfactory." Here I make a preliminary objection to the conventional use of the term "free-will," a term which I have never been able to understand. I have a notion of freedom, and of will, but of "free-will" I can form no idea. It seems to me that every one is at all times free to will, wish, desire, or purpose whatever he can; ability of accomplishment is another thing. "Freedom," says Locke, in his "Conduct of the Understanding," "belongs as little to the will as swiftness to sleep, or squareness to virtue. Freedom to do one power, will to do another. To ask, therefore, whether the will has freedom is to ask whether one power has another power, one ability another ability." If by free-will is meant liberty or power of choice, then, certainly, no such power can be attributed to the Divine will regarded as Supreme, for in absolute freedom, as in absolute necessity, there can be no choice, since choice implies defective knowledge. One who purposing to go to a certain place, comes to three roads, ignorant of which is right, has a liberty of choice which he would rather be without. If he knew which of the ways would lead to his destination he would be free in having no choice. The attribute of omniscience is incompatible with freedom of choice, because, in every case, the subject being fully conscious of the only best, no room is left for alternative action. Your correspondent says he is "not prepared to discuss the question on metaphysical grounds;" but I do not see how a moral or religious question can fairly be discussed on any other grounds.

On the assumption of a personal God, &c., the writer says: "I can see no answer to the Spectator's difficulty that is even moderately satisfactory. I can find none that does not do dishonour to my idea of God," &c. Why not? Is the physical body and this temporary stage of existence so much the supreme concern of Spiritualists, that they regard preservation from its dangers, and exemption from physical suffering and death to be the first and chief concern of Providence? Let any of your readers try to imagine a world such as they believe this to be, designed as a training school for higher states of life, without the experience of trial and sorrow, and without the consequent sympathy, patience, forbearance and forgiveness of love, and he will find a life not worth living, not even worth thinking about. Let him try to write a novel or drama with such imaginary characters (!) and the folly of mere benevolence will become evident to him.

As regards the Sunderland catastrophe, surely Spiritualists are not so selfish as to grudge the blessing which little children bring with them to the inhabitants of Heaven or of the spirit-world, or so unwise as to wish themselves deprived of the continuous renewal of such blessedness when they join the majority. Truly, death, which is conscious defect or privation of life, was not to the children but to their parents; a death which growing faith in immortality, and increase of open vision and communion will destroy. As a friend suggests, the catastrophe may serve as a Divine protest against selfishness even in little children. This world may not be, as Leibnitz contended, the best of all possible worlds, but it may be, and I believe is, the best for its special purpose in reference to an absolutely perfect end. Who remembers last year's headache or heartache in the health and happiness of to-day, or last week's had dream in the enjoyment of waking life? But this life of seventy or eighty years is less than those compared to eternity.

To come now to the Christian faith regarding the God-Idea. I am glad that, as the writer says, "we are hampered in our most elementary attempts to grasp the idea of God by the difficulty of conceiving intelligence without the limitations of personality;" and that "the God of most people is associated with their highest idea of human perfection." Certainly, the Christian idea of God is that of "a glorified man with all human faculties and qualities developed to perfection: a Being of perfect power, wisdom, and beauty, but a Being in the form of man," whatever that form in its glorified aspect may be. I do not see how the higher, or even the highest Spiritualism can give us any better conception, or how a being "without body, parts, or passions," can ever be an object of thought, still less of reverence and of love.

Freely conceding to every Jew, Brahmin, or Buddhist all that his religion is to him individually, apart from any seemingly opposing statements in his sacred writings, I claim no individuality or esoteric character for any doctrine I hold as Christian, but am prepared to show that every such doctrine is as clearly deducible from the New Testament as are gold and silver from their respective ores.

The Christian revelation of the Divine nature is, that in true being God and Humanity are eternally one and inseparable. In phenomenal or conditioned states of consciousness they are from the human side, which states are at-oned or reconciled in attained perfection of eternal life in which every man without exception will find himself in all degrees of being, where he has always been in inmost consciousness—at home with the Father and absolutely one with Universal Humanity in all worlds. Of the many necessary stages of such progress homewards, and of the many mansions (morai), literally stages or resting places, in the upward journey, I can affirm nothing save that in each and all of them I shall be I and no other, with a growing realisation of inherent unity with and in universal existence. From individual I shall become personal, without any loss of individuality. By personality, in the strict sense of the word, I mean that which best manifests the sum of existence. Where any man has attained conscious perfection of being in all degrees of life, such man is the persona or manifestation of God. Increase of numbers of such personae manifests increasingly the essential unity of the one universal life. In every such attainment the subject has transcended all limits of mere individuality, and has all power in heaven and on earth. Yet, in the transcending and fulfilling of limitations, he includes all limitations, as the universal includes the partial, the unconditioned and absolute all conditions and relations, for nothing can exist apart from relation—every person or thing is the sum of its relations. If Supreme Being does not include personality, and even individual and phenomenal states as such, He is limited or excluded from existing states of human consciousness. "In all afflictions He is afflicted."

A university professor knows, and can teach, the alphabet and can condescend to sympathise with children, because he has transcended and included their state and knowledge.

Christianity is so far in agreement with Pantheism that it acknowledges God as the All of Universal Being; but differs, at least from the lower Pantheism, in affirming fullness of Divine manifestation only in spiritually-perfected manhood. Although I acknowledge no creed as authoritative, I can accept the "Nicene" Creed as expressive of the relation of humanity as a whole, and of every individual member to the in-dwelling Divine nature.

While I certainly should make no inquiry of any spirit or angel concerning God, because the question, Have you seen or heard anything of God? is wrongly put, I do think the "higher Spiritualism," as expressed in the best inspirational poetry, is in accordance with the doctrine have stated. Thus Miss Doten declares the "Inner Mystery" to be that the spirit of man "is older than the truth,"—

"One with God Himself.

Only when the soul asserted

What the flesh and sense concealed,—

God within, one with the Human,

Did the Inner Mystery stand revealed."

Another writer (T. L. Harris) says of a new-born babe—

"Thy beatific essence

Is thought from God's own brow:

Thou in thine inmost hast not left His presence,

Though we behold thee now."

And a Christian poet (Faber), not a Spiritualist, says that—

"God is never so far off

As even to be near:

He is within, our spirit is

That which He holds most dear."

I am glad to find myself in substantial agreement with the thoughts and arguments contained in the able letter of Mr. Humphreys, on "Speculative Philosophy."

Esoteric Buddhism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Having been in India; having seen some of the wonderful feats performed by the so-called jugglers of the Orient; believing in the "Brothers" and their exceptional qualifications (in one or two phases, perhaps, of spirit power—will power, if you please); having been in Madame Blavatsky's presence when very extraordinary phenomena took place, and having perfect confidence in this lady's honour, great moral worth and exalted qualities of mind and heart, and further having read both of Mr. Sinnett's books ("Occult World," and "Esoteric Buddhism") I feel called upon to make some remarks concerning said works.

Mr. Sinnett says: "Occultism . . . is an illumination cast over all previous spiritual speculations worth anything;" and on the next page, "The startling importance of occult knowledge turns on the manner in which it affords exact and experimental knowledge concerning spiritual things which under all other systems must remain the subject of speculation or blind religious faith."

As above stated, having read Mr. Sinnett's books, I must say that if Occultism has any illumination in it (and I doubt it not), he (Mr. Sinnett) has failed to throw it upon or into his writings, so that the wonderful things to which he refers can any better be seen or understood by a perusal of his productions; and if the "importance of occult knowledge turns on the manner in which it affords exact and experimental knowledge," Mr. Sinnett has not demonstrated this: he merely asserts that such is the fact. What exact experimental knowledge does he impart that makes this appear as a verity?

Again, Mr. Sinnett says: "Secrecy after all is not complete if external. Students are enabled to learn as much about the mysteries as I shall have to tell." And what, pray, are the mysteries he unveils to us? He says that Madame Blavatsky put her hand on a table, on a door, on a glass clock cover and raps came; that writing came on paper in a sealed up envelope, &c. Quite as remarkable things I have witnessed with our spirit-mediums—and more, I have had again and again statements made to me concerning what was to happen in the future, and which positively came to pass as the medium had stated it would; and this is a feature in our Spiritualism, the like of which Mr. Sinnett has failed to shew has happened through any occult power of which he claims to be the exponent; and I further solemnly asseverate that the declaration so often made by Eastern Theosophists that we never receive any communication from the (so-called) spirits which convey information not in possession of the medium or some other person present, is absolutely untrue.

Again, Mr. Sinnett says, "Occult phenomena must not be confused with the phenomena of Spiritualism. The latter, whatever that may be, are manifestations which mediums can neither control nor understand. The former are achievements of a conscious-living operator comprehending the laws with which he works." Yet, in another place he states, after describing phenomena in Madame Blavatsky's presence, "It was out of her power to give an exact explanation as to how these raps were produced." Which of these assertions shall we accept?

Further, Mr. Sinnett says: "One of the most embarrassing difficulties that beset the present attempt to translate the esoteric doctrine into plain language, is due really to the fact that spiritual perceptiveness, apart from all ordinary processes by which knowledge is acquired, is a great and grand possibility of human nature.

Though this is badly worded, we may perceive by the first part of the sentence what Mr. Sinnett wishes to impart. He really says that the embarrassing difficulties are, that spiritual perceptiveness is a possibility of our nature. If this be a fact, (and it doubtless is a most important one), that spiritual perceptiveness is a possibility with us, it is an agreeable truth and no more "embarrassing" than any other accepted verity.

Mr. Sinnett accuses an English speaking Vakeel of telling a deliberate falsehood (p. 10 "Occult World"). If so wonderful a person as this one he refers to can tell a lie, how can he believe anything that he has heard from others?

"An adept can project his soul out of his body to any place he pleases." One who was not an adept had his soul or double so projected into the presence of Judge Edmonds, of N.Y.

The majority of people, Mr. Sinnett thinks, have a soul, but do not know much about it; whereas "occult philosophy knows the state of facts." If the soul is to hover around, perhaps unconscious in Devachan, or some Karma, for a few millions of years, more or less, it might be agreeable not to know so much about it.

On page 18 Mr. Sinnett says: "St. Paul was an Occultist." Very likely; but how does our author know? Did the English-speaking Vakeel tell him so?

Page 21. "Akas" . . . is as much more subtle an agent than electricity. . . . It is through his acquaintance with the properties of this force that the adept can accomplish the physical phenomena which I shall be able to shew are within his reach, besides others of far greater magnificence." I have failed to discover where Mr. Sinnett has been able to shew anything of the kind, or in any degree make manifest the subtlety of the akasa.

A "Brother," though in Tibet, was "just as able to make the roses fall (from the ceiling) as if he had been in the room with us." (p. 52.) A lady of distinction here saw a large quantity of roses picked, by some invisible agency, in an adjoining conservatory, and presently all thrown upon the table where she was sitting, though the glass doors between her and the conservatory, were closed.

In a scientific and logical point of view Mr. Sinnett's works are very defective,—producing life out of what is non-existing, &c. Of the future, Swedenborg's views are much more rational than those set forth in "Esoteric Buddhism."

With your permission, Mr. Editor, I may refer to this again.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Certain minds like "G.W. M. D." and others seem to be unable to understand the esoteric doctrines of Jeshua, and therefore place them in opposition to the esoteric doctrines of Buddha and of other great teachers. I wish, in very short words, to make this clear, and that it is a traditional misinterpretation only that stands in the way of complete harmony. Now, as to the doctrine of Re-incarnation, what find we? When Nicodemus comes to the Master by night seeking instruction, the words of Jeshua were, "Except a man be born again of water and fire (flesh and spirit) he cannot enter the Kingdom of Heaven." To this Nicodemus (whose mind was familiar with the doctrine of metempsychosis then received and prevalent among his brethren) replied: "Shall a man enter again into his mother's womb and be born?" The Master never says: "Thou errest, not knowing the Scriptures, &c.," but simply reiterates His assertion: "Verily I say unto you except a man be born of the flesh and the Spirit (water and fire) he cannot enter the Kingdom of Heaven. That which is of the flesh is flesh; that which is of the Spirit is spirit." Nicodemus again replies: "How can these things be?" And Jeshua answers: "Why, is it possible you are a teacher in Israel and don't know that? We speak that we know and testify that we have seen" (unlike the orthodox of the present day). Then, as if to remove all doubt to future readers, He adds: "If I have been telling you of physical facts and you do not understand Me, how will you comprehend Me if I go on to tell you of spiritual things?" Can anything be plainer than that the Master here meant to inculcate the grand doctrine of re-births?

Again, when the disciples asked Him, "Master, why say the Scribes that Elias must first come?" Jeshua replies, "Verily Elias is come already, and they have done to him what they listed, for they knew him not. Likewise shall they do unto the Son of Man." To get the force of this "likewise" we have only to refer to His constant teaching "that coming to His own, His own knew Him not, and therefore did not receive Him, and again, had they known Him, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory." Again, it is written that it becometh the Captain of our salvation to be made perfect through suffering many experiences and so we also must be like Him, made perfect through suffering many experiences, and having overcome we "shall not die any more," (what mean these repeated deaths but repeated births?) but "Be made pillars (fixed) in the Temple of God and shall go out and in no more." What can be clearer than this? Again, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord (i.e. perfect) for they shall rest from their labours, and their works shall follow them," (their Karmas), by the entire series of which they are judged, not by the deeds of one life only. Again, it is written, "Thou turnest man to destruction and again thou sayest return, ye children of men."

Now as to successive cycles Jeshua teaches that the wicked shall go away into after corrective chastisement, and the righteous into ages of life. Can any words be plainer, the English translation of which the great revisers have left uncorrected? Why? Again and again we read of the "thousand years" of happiness and of periods of Seven without number, as any reader of the Apocalypse will see.

Once more. In entire ignorance of the teaching of the Catholic Church, which is ever the true, as it is the historical exponent of Christianity, it is asserted by a Spiritualist writer that the Christian Church teaches that there are three Gods—one is God the Father, another God the Son, another God the Spirit! This is monstrous injustice. The Protestant Church may teach such doctrine, but the Catholic Christian Church does not. She distinctly says there are not three Gods, but one God. Now, I will ask the utterer of this slander on Esoteric Christianity, is not he the father as regards his son? is not he the son as regards his father? and is he not the spouse as regards his bride? Are not then these three personalities inherent in him, the one individual?

In the same sense, and in no other, Esoteric Catholic Christianity asserts that God is the Father of Mary, God is the Son of Mary, God is the Spouse of Mary, and yet they are not three, but one God, and Mary, in regenerate humanity, the true Bride of God, the true Maria. That this is so may be clearly seen from the words of the Church in the Sacrifice of the Mass, when the priest blesses the water and wine in the chalice, saying, "Grant that by the mystery of this water and this wine we may be made partakers of His Divine nature who vouchsafed to become partaker of our human nature," &c. Here, clearly, the water is a symbol of flesh as it ever was in the Egyptian mysteries, and the wine is symbolic of spirit even as FIRE and AIR, and the mingling of the two in the chalice symbolises the at-one-ment of the human with the Divine. It were well that those who would speak of Esoteric Christianity would first enter into Catholic Christianity, which is the true representative of it, and study her missal and her rites and ceremonies, which veil and enshrine most sacred truths, dear alike to Christian, Buddhist, Vedantist, Jew, and Ancient Pagan; for the basis of all these theologies is one and the same, the lifting up of Humanity to Deity, of the lower nature to the higher, the transformation and transubstantiation of the material into the spiritual.—Yours, A CATHOLIC PRIEST.

"GENESIS."—By Allan Kardec. A translation of this work, issued by Messrs. Colby and Rich, has reached us just as we go to press. We hope to notice it in an early issue.

QUEBEC HALL.—Mr. J. M. Dale, secretary to the Marylebone Association of Spiritualists, wishes us to state that owing to a dispute between landlord and tenant of the premises at the rear of which Quebec Hall stands, the Marylebone Association is compelled to seek another place of meeting, which will be announced next week. The friends, therefore, will hold their last meetings in this Hall on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday. Communications for information may be addressed, J. M. Dale, 50, Crawford-street, Bryanston-square, W.

ROCHDALE.—A correspondent says:—We have had a brisk time of it here lately. The last three Sundays we have had open-air meetings in the Town Hall square, and have had numerous, patient, and intelligent audiences, and I have no doubt we have done practical good. There has been opposition, but by only two men, and the audiences have been with us. I have opened the meetings with a few words and afterwards been followed by Mr. Robt. Harper, of Birmingham, or Mr. Wm. Johnson, of Hyde. Mr. Harper fortunately has been two or three weeks in the neighbourhood. Next Sunday Mr. Harper will lecture and also Mr. Johnson. I believe it is only a matter of time and perseverance, and we shall merge into an intelligent and influential society. Private circles are gradually being formed by investigators, and as intelligence comes to them from the unseen, the members seem to find their way to our meetings to obtain information on doubtful matters. If we can double our members, I think we can almost do anything afterwards, as we should then have an income out of which to bring the most efficient teachers in the movement. Of late, in preference to supplying the platform at any cost, we have had social circles to which the public have been admitted, i.e., when speakers could not be judiciously obtained, and I think we have done good. Mr. W. D. Colville will be here on August 22nd, and I would be obliged by your announcement of him in "LIGHT."

One sound book read for the purpose of instruction will afford more nourishment to the mind than a whole library skimmed over for amusement. A cottage flower gives honey to the working bee, but a king's garden affords none to the fluttering butterfly.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

The authorities of the University of Pennsylvania have appointed a commission to investigate modern Spiritualism, in accordance with the terms of a bequest by the late Henry Seybert. Mr. Seybert was an earnest Spiritualist, and apparently desired to secure an impartial examination for the phenomena in which he believed. It is greatly to be regretted that he did not take steps in that direction during his life, for the commission now appointed would content him little. It includes the Provost of the University, the Assistant Professor of Chemistry, the Professor of Social Science, the Professor of Anatomy, and the Professor of Moral and Intellectual Philosophy. Of these, two at least are known, from their own statements, as avowed antagonists, one having declared that the consideration and discussion of the subject was "tampering with notions and condescending to discussions with which no Christian believer has any business." The Professor of Chemistry "frankly admits" that, "I am prepared to deny the truth of Spiritualism as it is now popularly understood. It is my belief that all of the so-called mediums are humbugs without exception. I have never seen Slade perform any of his tricks, but, from the published descriptions, I have set him down as an impostor, the cleverest one of the lot." Against these two model investigators there is no set-off. Not a single expert sits on the commission, and pains are taken to state publicly that "no member thereof is openly committed to a belief in the so-called modern Spiritualism." A body so constituted cannot be regarded as fairly formed for the purposes intended by Mr. Seybert, and Spiritualists will not regard it as invested with any authority that they will recognise. So much may be said at once. If prejudice is conquered by an acquaintance with facts of which the members of the commission are now ignorant, so much the better; if not, we shall not wonder.

I receive so many inquiries as to psychopathic cures from correspondents who are desirous of finding some one who can thus treat their various maladies that I am glad to mention the name of Mr. Omerin, 3, Bulstrode-street, Welbeck-street, Cavendish-square, W. I gather from a number of testimonials that he has been successful in treating a variety of ailments, such as neuralgia, nervous headaches, and affections of that nature which most readily yield to magnetic treatment; as well as cases of gout, rheumatism, and slight paralytic and epileptic seizures. Miss Hall testifies to the success attending his efforts at her Children's Home, 48, Gloucester-square, W. Miss F. J. Theobald writes in high terms of his "great healing power and other professional qualities, which are quite beyond praise." I have no acquaintance whatever with Mr. Omerin, nor have I among my own friends any who have personal experience of his treatment. I gather from one of the printed letters, dated from the British Museum, and signed "H. Counter," that Mr. Omerin does not use his gift professionally, or for purposes of gain.

Many of the cases of cure printed by Mr. Omerin are not sufficiently precise to be of much scientific value. It is fair, however, to remember that they were not written for scientific purposes. They record the grateful sense of relief experienced by sufferers who have been healed of their several ailments, and, as such, have a value of their own. Though I am personally interested chiefly in establishing by scientific evidence the reality of Psychopathy, I am by no means indifferent to the beneficent work done by the cure of even the slightest nervous ailment. From the testimonials of success which Mr. Omerin has printed I select one:—

"DEAR MR. OMERIN,—You ask me to describe the accident I met with about two months ago, and the result of your treatment.

"In getting into a train hurriedly, I struck my right knee violently against the brass stanchion outside the carriage door; the knee-cap was, I think, displaced momentarily, and for some minutes I suffered extreme pain, followed by a swelling of the knee generally, a lump on the spot struck about the size of half an egg, and a dull, steady, deep-seated pain, with great stiffness of the joint.

"I had several years ago met with a very similar accident to the same knee, with the result that I was confined to bed (with leeches, blisters, &c., &c.) for two or three weeks, and to the house for some weeks more.

"Fortunately, I was on my way to see you at the time, and you operated on me at once. By that time (about half-an-hour after the occurrence) I was quite unable to walk, and could only limp with great pain and difficulty, the joint being then greatly swollen and inflamed, and so painful that I could not even bear a touch.

"The result of about half-an-hour's treatment by you (merely holding your fingers pointed close to the knee, WITHOUT RUBBING OR EVEN TOUCHING ME) was that the pain had greatly abated; the stiffness had quite gone so that I could walk and use the joint without the least trouble; and the swelling had slightly gone down. Nothing more was done whatever, and by next morning ALL pain and swelling had disappeared, the lump gradually abating during the next day till it quite disappeared, and I have not felt the slightest after-effects of any kind since.

"I am very glad to be able to testify to your undoubted power, the more gratefully because when this accident occurred I was really very uneasy about it, remembering what I had gone through before. I did expect, knowing you as I do, some good effect from your treatment, but I did not expect it would be anything like so speedy or so thorough after only one operation.—Believe me, your very sincere friend,

The Society for Psychical Research has issued Part III. of its Proceedings.* This new part contains a third report of the Committee on Thought-transference; the first report of the Committee on Mesmerism; and the first report of the Reichenbach Committee. The Thought-transference experiments are similar to those already described. With very few specified exceptions, on which no stress is laid, the reproductions of drawings were made without contact and under conditions that preclude any fraud or collusion, and that narrow down the issues involved to those exhaustively discussed in the Committee's report. No summary that space would permit would give any idea of the scrupulous care exercised in obtaining these results. It would be difficult to exaggerate their value as affording indications of the method of action of mind on mind. The whole report should be carefully studied in connection with the two previous reports of the same Committee.

The Spectator, commenting especially on the curious inversion of images that is shown in some of these experiments, finds in them an analogy to the phenomena observed in the Mirage of the Desert. Objects reflected in some conditions of the atmosphere appear topsy-turvy, camels solemnly walking on their heads, ships sailing upside down, and elaborate landscapes inverted in the stagnant atmosphere. The Spectator thinks that the experiments of the Society for Psychical Research shew that in a fair number of cases the image (e.g., of an arrow held perpendicularly or horizontally) was so inverted as to point to some law, the discovery of which would reveal "some key to the connection between the physical and mental laws so closely associated in our lives." The arrow experiments gave these results:—Out of forty-two trials the arrow was held perpendicularly twenty-three times: of these, twenty positions were guessed rightly, and three wrongly. It was held horizontally nineteen times; and here seven guesses were right, and twelve wrong. Of these twelve wrong guesses, eight were lateral incursions of the position of the arrow as if it were seen in a mirror. Eighty-seven per cent. of answers were correct for the perpendicular position, and only thirty-seven per cent. for the horizontal. It was about an even chance, when the arrow was horizontal, whether the image was described laterally inverted or not.

The mesmeric experiments have been devoted chiefly to three main phenomena: (1) The dominance of a suggested idea. (2) Transference of sensations, without suggestion, from operator to patient. (3) Induction of general or local anesthesia. Of these three methods of explaining the phenomena observed, the Committee lean to the last. The first, they think, is on the high-road to universal acceptance. Physiologists are discussing the explanation rather than debating the fact. The second thesis is still keenly contested: but the Committee have already added something to the facts recorded in its favour, by shewing how mesmeric sympathy fits in with the observed facts of Thought-transference. The third point—the production of anesthesia—is abundantly proven by the experiments of Esdaile, and is very familiar to my readers from cases that I have recorded from time to time, especially from the Zoist. The voice of the Committee, so far as its experiments have gone, is in favour of mesmerism as opposed to hypnotism, and I have little doubt that the conclusion is correct. But we must wait for more complete results before any hard and fast conclusion is drawn.

In no case have the experiments of a committee been more strikingly successful than in the reproduction of Reichenbach's experiments on the luminosity of the magnetic field. The exhaustive report of the Reichenbach Committee should be read in connection with a paper contributed by Professor Barrett to the Philosophical Magazine for April last. The results obtained are in the highest degree interesting and valuable.

ESOTERIC BUDDHISM; THE LOST ATLANTIS AND THE SYMBOLIC "SEVEN."

By GERALD MASSEY.

In the kindly review of my "Book of the Beginnings" which appeared in the Theosophist, the writer, speaking of my theory and generalisation concerning the African Origins, observed: "Mr. Gerald Massey will be most unlikely to deny our statement that the last word has not yet been said about the origin and distribution of the races of mankind. Possibly he may even concede to us the reasonableness of our belief that the mist will never be cleared away, until the treasures of certain libraries in the possession of a group of Asiatic recluses shall be given out to the world." In spirit, the writer judged me rightly; all I care for is the truth. Next to being absolutely right myself, I should prefer to be so utterly in the wrong that the next worker on the same track must, in consequence, be entirely right. All I want is to have done with the mist and mask of mystery, and all the devious devilries of their double-facedness, from which the human mind has suffered so sorely for so long.

I am not going to speak disrespectfully, or grin at the East through the horse-collar of the West; nor am I at enmity with Esoteric Buddhism, being a worker for the common brotherhood of humanity—especially not on behalf of our current theology, which I consider and proclaim to be the Fetishism of primitive man in the last stage of perversion. But I must say that the "open your mouth and shut your eyes" method of teaching the Esoteric will fail to influence the intellect of the West. We must have the particulars and the primary data for every generalisation, and if there be any secrets to communicate concerning the pre-historic past (I am not asking for the mysteries relating to the abnormal condition of Adepts, though personally prepared by long experience to appreciate these) let us have them. If there are sources of information overlooked by, or concealed from, the European student, for the truth's sake let us know them. I have spoken out plainly enough on my part. I have just completed my case for the African Origins in the "Natural Genesis" now forthcoming, which constitutes the second part of a "Book of the Beginnings." In this I have collected the evidence for unity of origin in mythology, typology, and language, and the Kamite origin of that unity; whether that origin be African or Asiatic can now be determined by the recluses who possess the hidden treasures, if they can successfully overthrow the theory founded on such a collection of facts as was not hitherto accessible to the Oriental student. My method is that of comparative science, without which process, applied to the whole matter, nothing definite can be permanently established. Personally, I shall be content to have uttered the "last word" but one, if that should succeed in eliciting the last word itself. But it must be said, or the power to say it will be denied. No "panning out" upon secrecy, or esoteric interpretation, will now suffice. Either such knowledge is extant, on record, or it is not. Possibly none of us know what we think we know until our knowledge has been tested. It is solely by the comparative process that we can ascertain the true value of this Wisdom or Gnosis of the past called "Esoteric in the present."

I am somewhat startled, however, by the revelations of Esoteric Buddhism made through and by Mr. Sinnett, whose mediumship for the purpose of communication is one of perfect clarity. Nor is there any obscurity or uncertain sound when the oracle is uttered by the "direct voice." For example,—We are told that the sinking and submergence of the lost "Atlantis" was a geological disaster, a geographical reality; an event that can be dated. The direct voice affirms that it disappeared 11,446 years ago. This date is also Bunsen's. He was a believer in the deluges of Yu (China) and of Noah being geological; and he gives the date of 9252 B.C., as that of some great cataclysm belonging to the Deluge legend; that is 9252 + 1883 = 11,135 years ago. Do the Esoteric Buddhists then not know that the legend of the lost Atlantis, like those of Eden, Airyana-Vaejo, Jambu-Dvipa, and various others, belongs to the astronomical mythology? or that the great legendary catastrophes occurred in heaven and not on earth? Those sunken worlds were submerged in celestial waters, as one system of time-keeping was superseded by another; and the end of each was described as a deluge, a conflagration, or the end of a world. Although I can but hint very briefly here at what is fully expounded elsewhere, I claim to have indisputably demonstrated the mythological origin of the Deluge legend (that of Atlantis included)

no matter in what form or land it may be found. During the course of Precession the primary Mount of the Seven Steps, or the Country of the Seven Islands, is submerged. The Tower, said to have been erected at the autumn equinox, trembles, topples, and overturns. The Argo that stands on the horizon at its southern culmination, is caught and crushed in the coils of the Dragon Hydra, and goes to wreck. It was in this way that Airyana-Vaejo, Jambu-Dvipa, Eden, Avaiki, and Atlantis were lost, as the Southern Cross is lost and found again during the course of Precession. And because they were so lost—and only so—can they ever be regained. This was the common subject of ancient prophecies concerning the resurrection, restoration, and renewal of the world, found in all the legends of the Kronian Mythology, and expounded orally by those who taught the genuine Gnosis. All such legends as this of lost Atlantis belong to the Divine Origins, which are mythical and Kronian; they relate to the deluges of Time, not of geology, and were only known as such to the Egyptians. Al-Biruni tells us that the Persian Magi denied the Deluge altogether. Ibn Chaldun says the Persians and Indians know nothing of the Deluge (Tufan). It was known well enough, however, in the ancient Scriptures as the Deluge of Time. It was Time (Kronos) who warned Xisuthrus of the coming flood and gave him the date for it. The Deluge, or Pluvial Catastrophe, is an accepted epoch used in the reckoning of the Babylonian chronology, one date of which is given by M. Oppert as the deluge of the year 41,697 B.C. Both Chaldeans and Persians knew of the various deluges of time and their figurative cataclysms which took place at "certain intervals." A deluge, for instance, that occurs every 25,868 years with the colour of the vernal equinox in the sign of Capricorn, or a vast conflagration that takes place when the colour is half way round the circle and in the sign of Cancer, (vide Berossus) has no relation to geological catastrophes! The seven-headed Sesa-Naga was the teacher of science to Garga; but what he taught was astronomy, not geology. Now Sesa, who bore the seven submerged Patalas on his head, represented that fore-world of the seven divisions sunken beneath the waters, which was identical with Atlantis, and with the seven provinces drowned in Dyfed (or Wales); the seven Caves of the Quichés; the seven sunken islands of Avaiki, and other forms of the superseded celestial Heptanomis.

The genuine Kronian doctrine of the Deluge is expressed in the Sûrya Siddhanta, where it is applied to the Manvantara as a period of seventy-one years "with a surplus" (the Vishnu Purana explains); and this constitutes one day in the Great Year,  $72 \times 360 = 25,920$  years. It states that "One-and-seventy ages are here styled a Patriarchate (Manvantara); at its end is said to be a Twilight, which is a Deluge." In the Book of Esdras this typical ending is a silence of seven days.

It is geologically possible that land may have sunk in the Atlantic Ocean. Indeed the Challenger expedition seems to have come across a ridge of it. But that is not in dispute. The question is whether the Deluge legend is geological. And geology knows nothing of an Atlantis that could have sunk in the ocean during the memory of man. The Egyptians, who are the chronologers of mankind, know nothing of such a cataclysm. When they told Herodotus that they had reckoned time through two periods of Precession, during which time the sun set twice where it now rises (for so I interpret the passage, obscured simply by the non-comprehension of the faithful old historian), they especially remarked, that during such a long period there had been no great change in the things of the earth, &c. And two periods during which the sun rose and set twice at opposite sides of the circle include 51,734 years.

On the other hand, the Astronomical Mythos claims and accounts for the whole of the Deluge legends from beginning to end. The lost Atlantis supposed to lie at the bottom of the Atlantic was composed of seven islands, according to one form of the reckoning. But the same seven islands are fabled to lie at the bottom of the Pacific, of the Indian Ocean, the Irish Sea, and other waters innumerable. They do so because the waters below reflect the Heptanomis above, the Heaven first formed in seven divisions, Dvipas, Keshvars, Islands, Patalas or Provinces; and when this has been traced to many seas, we shall find it also as the land of ten divisions instead of seven, because the Heaven of ten divisions followed that of the seven, just as the ten patriarchs follow the seven in the book of Genesis. Creations superseded by cataclysms and deluges, then, are celestial and Kronian, not geological.

logical; and the Mythos is their memorial preserved in many languages. They belonged entirely to the different systems of dividing space, and reckoning the cycles of time, which succeeded each other, from those of the primordial seven, called the "Inferior Hebdomad" by the Gnostics, to those of the later planetary seven, in which the solar god as the seventh became at last supreme.

Any system of thought that may have been fabricated as a superstructure, based and reared on such a foundation as that offered by the great Kronian Cataclysms and Catastrophes having been assumed to be geological, is assuredly doomed to a speedy fall. The only chance for such a theory is in its being kept secret and esoteric; it cannot survive after the comparative test is applied.

From the glimpses now vouchsafed by the recluses, and from other sources, I am compelled to conclude that Esoteric Buddhism has continued the celestial allegory with the astronomy left out. Much of the ancient science, which, in its way, was as real as the modern, lives on in legend alone, and it seems that we have the science omitted here, with the legend re-applied. I have spent much time in recovering that system of science from the legends of mythology, and have re-stated the doctrines of the seven Rishis, or Manus, which lie at the root of all that is Hebdomadal in Esoteric Buddhism. I find that the seven Rishis make the circle of Precession in 25,000 years (round numbers). They pass through twenty-eight lunar mansions, and thus spend some 923 years in each. They are, therefore, renewed every 923 years. They are the seven patriarchs, and their age is about that of the seven patriarchs in the Book of Genesis. According to this reckoning they were re-incarnated twenty-eight times. But they were also re-incarnated every Phoenix Cycle of 500 years. Here the incarnations would be fifty-two in the great year, the number of incarnations (if I mistake not) assigned to Buddha under the Tree-Type—the symbolical Phoenix being a tree as well as a bird. Also the Buddha who is called "All the Buddhas," he being the last and the sum of the whole, like the Gnostic Christ, termed "Totum," or "All," is described as coming round again by making seven steps towards each of the four quarters. That is, he made the circle of the great year, like the seven Rishis whom I have traced on their journey through the twenty-eight lunar mansions. This serves to shew the astronomical nature of the subject matter.

At the end of each cycle of the seven the transformation was represented by a re-birth of the Adi-Buddha, Horus, Pan, Christ, or other form of the Tathagata or "Coming One," who was the recognised manifestor for the seven, the Perfect Star of the Pleroma of Powers; he whose symbols are the eight-rayed star in India, Babylon, and the Catacombs of Rome; the seven arms of Agni; the seven souls of Ra; the seven stars of the  $\Lambda \Omega$  in Revelation, or other figures of the Hebdomad. If we take the number of Buddha's incarnations under the tree-type as fifty-two, the meaning may be interpreted as follows:—In the Kabbalist and other legends, we find the tree of 500 years as a type of time. In the Egyptian and Babylonian monuments this tree is figured with seven branches, that is a symbol equivalent to the seven Rishis or Manus of 71.2 years:  $7 \times 71.2 = 500$  years and  $52 \times 500 = 26,000$  years. Thus the tree of seven is one with the group of seven as a measure of time, and fifty-two incarnations by sevens, whether represented by Buddhas or Branches, fulfil the circuit of the great year. Such was the real Buddha-tree that I have traced root and branch, by which the Buddha is fabled to have reached Nirvana at last, where there is no more variableness nor "shadow of turning," and no more returning for the spirit that has passed on through the open gates of Nom (Cf. Egyptian Num) or no return. Although certain teachers were looked upon as his human representatives, the true Buddha was neither incarnated nor re-incarnated in person, but in time. Nor were the seven Rishis, Manus, men or races, beings of earth; and so the earth—the most important sphere of all for us—is not included in the series of seven planets through which the tides of life are said to succeed each other, wave after wave, in a Hebdomadal manner. Seven races of men that are at the same time successive and yet contemporary, cannot be of human origin.

A system of evolution for man that is dependent upon his making the circuit of seven planetary worlds by paths which always return into themselves, with a spiral ascent by means of an "unkenned corkerewit," is evidently derived from the doctrine of the seven Rishis revolving on the planetary scale in ever-recurring sevens, instead of following the course of * Book I, 18 sec.; see also Manu I, 72-79; and Vishnu Purana, p. 24.—Wilson.

Precession through the signs of the Zodiac. The evolution of the human race by sevens is not a subject of that verifiable knowledge which alone constitutes science. Races that rotate thus upon the treadmill of eternity; or races that were created in the image of the elementaries or Zootypes, such as the bear, dog, ape, lion: beast, bird, fish and reptile, who appear as the seven races in the Buddhish, need to be referred back (for an explanation) to their natural genesis in primary phenomena.

The "seven races" of men, in Esoteric Buddhism, are clearly traceable to the seven men or Manus who always made their progressions, completed their cycles, and were re-incarnated in sevens. The seven Manus or Rishis are continually described in astronomical and other works, such as the Sūrya Siddhānta, Tatwārīkṣā, and Vishnu Purāṇa, as being created and passing away seven by seven, with each Phoenix Cycle of 500 years, at the end of which they are re-incarnated and renewed, because  $7 \times 71.2 = 500$  years.

In all the Manvantara classes beginning with the Patriarchate of 71.2 years, the natural life-time of a man or Manu (a Manvantara simply meaning another man, or Manu, and so language tells its own tale) up to the longest Manvantara derived from the series of noughts added to the initial figures, the Rishis appear seven by seven, and are for ever renewed according to that number. But as the Rishis were not of earth, so they had no relation to the races of earth. They were not realities in any other than a Kronian sense. Their nature was not of a kind either to cast a shadow of spirituality into another sphere of existence. They were but types of time; and we can no more derive from them than from Seb-Kronus. But the doctrine of the seven Rishis or Manus (i.e., men in English) has obviously been extended to the races of human beings, supposed to travel the planetary round in series of sevens, just as the animals entered the Ark of Noah seven by seven; the planetary Hebdomad being the latest form of the kronotypes. If the origin is not astronomical, why are the planets limited to seven? Why is our earth, to us the most important of all, omitted? Mr. Sinnett says: "In periods of sevens the evolution of the races of men may be traced, and the actual number of the objective worlds which constitute our system, and of which the earth is one, is seven also."

But when our earth is included there must be eight. Such, however, is the Procrustean tyranny of the Hebdomad, we are cut off and cannot get into the Ark amongst the seven. Why is this but that when the mould of thought was formed, the earth was not known as a planet, but was considered to be a fixture and a flat surface in the geocentric system, with the seven planets revolving round. This may partly explain the dilidence of Esoteric Buddhism on the subject of Earth, and the number eight.

It may be, for ought I know to the contrary, that there is only a certain quantity of soul-stuff in the solar system—our world being included; although that, as eighth, upsets the septenary reckoning. It may be that this source of soul only supplies a certain number of souls in the whole course of its progression through matter. But what I do know is that the doctrine was a product of primitive man. It may be found in the Jewish Kabbalah, where the total number of souls emanated from Guph, or the abyss, is given as 600,000—the number of those who came out of Egypt in the historic Exodus. Its roots belong to the remotest past of human thought. For example, the Khonds of India entertain the belief that a certain limited supply of soul belongs to each tribe and totem. This soul was of male origin, the soul of Pubescence, the ruch of a masculine nature alone, which could not be possessed by the female (this doctrine was quite common), who had no soul but what she derived from the ancestral source, or general soul of the tribe. Thus, the female was looked upon by them as a consumer or slaver in—but not a producer of—the reserved stock of soul. Hence the prevalence of female infanticide! They killed off the feminine sex because, as they urged, that left more of the ancestral soul for the men. They could capture women from other tribes without growing them at a useless expense of their own ancestral or tribal soul. Such ideas had a natural genesis. They date from the time when individual fatherhood was unknown, but a general ancestral source was acknowledged to be male. The men knew they shared in this soul as procreators simply, and that the women did not; but no man knew his own father, or his own child. Such doctrines continued, re-applied, and, as I consider, misapplied, look like a survival of savage animism in exclusis. It is the same with the doctrines of "Shells," short-lived elementaries, or obsessing "Bhuts." These, too, were the product of primitive thought, working on very natural grounds, which the present writer has had to explore and map out afresh. The "Bhuts" have their bad character as a gross, material kind of spirit because they were "projected" at a time when only the grosser elements were recognised; four in the Buddhist system, five in the Hindu. The Kaffirs do not believe in a ghost that survives beyond the third generation. Their spirits die out with the grandfather. These elementaries are shadows of the past, and no subtilisation by metaphysic can transform them into spiritual substance in the present, or prove them to be the Eidolons of the races of men who live and die to-day. They have to be studied as rudimentaries, according to their natural genesis in this world. By means of Egyptian mythology and symbolism, compared with most other surviving systems of mythology, I have traced the origin of the seven elementaries in external phenomena, and thus am enabled to gauge, if not to bridge, the great gulf which divides modern Spiritualism from Esoteric Theosophy in India. These have no relationship at root. From first to last the seven elementaries never were, and never could be, spirits in our modern sense. They did not begin as, nor were they derived from, the spirits of the dead.

Some time since I happened to state in "LIGHT" that the earliest "gods" of Egypt were eight elementaries, that is, a progeny of seven produced by the great mother. A comment on this appeared in the Theosophist to the effect that there was a new proof of the correctness of cyclic necessity; gods worshipped ninety centuries B.C., becoming candidates for the same in the nineteenth A.D. But this was to confuse and confound the character of "spirits" entirely different in kind and origin; and I was surprised at the time by its revealing flash. However, it added zest to my further researches. The elementaries of Egypt were not even creatures of the elements supposed to survive as spirits in the alchemistic and magical sense. They were seven powers or forces apprehended in external nature; seven lawless forces that ruled in chaos. In Akkad they are the seven evil spirits born of Tiamat, especially meteorological. In India the seven were born as the Embryo of Aditi, and divided into seven parts that were personified as the seven Asuras, Maruts, &c. In each country the primary seven are traceable to one origin. At first these powers were neither expressed in words nor personified under the human likeness; they were super-human. They were neither conceived nor personified, but had to be represented by kindred types of power. They were elemental, and these elements were equated by the fish = water, the reptile = earth; air (i.e., typhoon) = great ape, the jackal = darkness, and so on, the power of the elements being typically rendered by the animals, &c., that were so infinitely superior to men in relation to the particular elements. Thunder was probably the first elementary power. With the ancient Chinese it was the primal element. The oldest of the seven in a Chaldean legend is Mamangeb, the thunderbolt; and one type of the whole Pleroma is the seven-headed thunderbolt. In Egypt, the opener, Sut-Anup, whose Zootype was the jackal, and whose element is the celt-stone, or fire-stone, represented the first of the seven. This will serve to show the elemental nature of the seven elementaries. They were elementaries that could not become the rudest of human rudimentaries, as they had no relation whatever to natural evolution, although as Zootypes of seven degrees, they could be continued as representative types to express seven degrees of development, as they were employed in Egypt, where the Crocodile Sevekh bears the name of the seventh, and is the highest of the seven, on account of its intelligence, and because, as Plutarch says, it could see when the lids of the eyes were let down; and so this type of intelligence became the representative of a seer unseen, or a god. This was the origin of Zootypes. Seven elements (all necessary details are given elsewhere) were then represented by seven Zootypes, and these Zootypes, including the crocodile, lion, serpent, Kaf-ape, jackal, and bird, were the elementary spirits, gods, or nature-powers. This was in space and chaos, where they thundered and flashed, howled and roared, blasted and blustered, and were feared like other later gods, until found out. It was at length discovered that they were but the giants of the human childhood, as blind as they were big, and in one phase they were superseded; in another they became kronotypes. Seven constellations were assigned to them, and they told time by the turn round of the starry sphere, once in the year. Here they became the seven Kabiri, Hohgates, celestial giants; Keatim, Rishis, &c., the earliest seven Revolvers, the "inferior Hebdomad" of the Gnostics. But they also failed in that character, and fell. The Rishis went to sleep and forgot! The seven giants proved to be abortions. The Keselims were fools. The watchers were unfaithful, and let in the deluge of time. They were discovered to be fixtures in heaven, like the bound and blind Orion, whereas the seven planets were seen to be the movers. Then the seven Rishis passed into the planetary phase. And here, it appears, Esoteric Buddhism takes up and continues the legend. I find the doctrine of re-incarnation was Kronian. The origin is to be found in the repetition of the cycles of time. Repetition is renewal; renewal is re-birth, and when the particular cycle was represented by a mythical personage, whether as Seb, whose name is synonymous with No. 5, and whose cycle is 500 years; or Sevekh = seven, whose cycle (that of Agathodaimon) is 700 years; or Putah (Put being No. 9) whose cycle is 9,000 years. When these cycles were repeated, Seb, Sevekh, Putah were re-incarnated, according to the metaphorical mode of expression, but this was in time, not in person; Seb (time) was no more manifested in person than he could come out of the clock-case when the hour struck. Continuity could only be described by repetitions in time. Thus, "millions of times" is the Egyptian formula for eternity, which was born of time by constant repetition of the cycle. In Egyptian, too, Seb, for time, is also the name of the soul, which was a birth of time. "My soul," says the Osirified, "is from the beginning of years." Thus the repetitions of Seb-Kronus may be those of Time=Soul, and we can recover the passage from the re-incarnation in time to that of re-incarnation of the soul. The original typology did not imply the idea of the soul's re-incarnation in the modern sense, the nearest approach to which was the doctrine of the ancestral soul (in general) being re-produced and individualised in the general offspring of the tribe. The Rishis were re-incarnated at the end of each cycle, as a mode of measuring. They were re-incarnated in sevens every Phoenix cycle of 500 years, because seven life-times of seventy-one or seventy-two years make up that period. The seven passed on into the planetary round with their seven-fold character, which began in the elementary phase, and this seven-fold character has been continued and conferred on seven sorts of spirits and seven races of men. This will show why races as well as spirits travel together and inhabit worlds, or obsess women, like Mary Magdalene, in groups of sevens. Such spirits were expressed by Theosophic distillation. Such races are the result of mythology being made mundane. In this way things that are almost unthinkable when divorced from their natural origin have become unfathomable mysteries in theology and Theosophy. But the myths do not disclose any deeper meaning by our infusing into them the interpretation of later times; we may be only imposing upon them a sense quite foreign, in consequence of which they will impose on others in return. The esoteric interpretation of ancient writers by the later teachers may be, and is, very different from that of the primitive Gnosis. When the matter enters the doctrinal phase in theology and Theosophy, Esoteric interpretation is too apt to become the secret mode of disguising the original meaning, and the latest signification read into the symbolic types overshadows and obscures their primary import with a factitious importance. The matter has undergone its modernisation, and can no longer be rightly understood except by reverting to first principles. It is fatally misleading for us when the ancient mode of expression has become a modern mould of thought! This is of constant occurrence in western theology and Theosophy, and to me it appears to be the same in Esoteric Buddhism.

The septenary constitution of man is another result of this reckoning. It was once known to all Kabbalists, Gnostics, Druids, or Illuminati. It was taught in Britain that man was composed of seven elements—earth, water, air, fire, vapour, blossom (seminal), and the wind of purposes, or intelligent ghost. Hence our seven senses of the vulgar phrase. These are also associated by Taliesin with the seven planets. The seven as ingredients, principles, rudimentaries, or what not, may be found in many forms and in a variety of stages.

I will conclude with a comparison between the Egyptian and Buddhist sevens. In one list given by Mr. Sinnett the fifth is the animal soul named Kama Rupa, the sixth is the spiritual soul known as Buddhi, or ascertainment, and the seventh is pure spirit, or Atma. Now, in the Egyptian system of the divine dynasties and series of creations, Seb is fifth (his name signifies No. 5), and he impersonates the animal soul in an ithyphallic form. Putah (or Ptah), whose name denotes "the opener" and whom I have undertaken (in the "Natural Genesis") to identify by name and nature with Buddha the opener—later Enlightener—is No. 6, or lord of a sixth creation. Atum is the seventh, and he represents what is termed the "reserved soul," the soul of souls, the soul that was no mere creation of time.

Atum or Atmu is also equivalent to Atma by name as in nature. But where the Egyptians said Seb the Fifth was the father of Ptah the Sixth, and Ptah the Sixth was the father of Atum, the seventh in the series, the Esoterist says the fifth principal or fundamental is the vehicle of the sixth, and the sixth is the vehicle of the seventh, shewing the same order of relationship as that of the gods in Egypt.

The Elementary principles may vary somewhat at different stages of development. The first four, however, can be paralleled thus:—

BUDDHIST.	EGYPTIAN.
1 Rupa or Body; the element of Form.	1 Kia , Body.
2 Prana or Jiva; Breath of Life.	2 Ia , the Soul of Breath.
3 Astral Body.	3 Khaba , the Astral-shade.
4 Manes; Mind or Intelligence.	4 Akhu , Intelligence.

If the system now expounded be Esoteric Buddhism, then I think Buddhism has become Esoteric by a subjective interpretation of the ancient symbolism; by taking or mistaking the identifiably celestial fables for pre-historic mundane facts; by converting Kronian evolution into Cosmical, and by extending the drama and doctrine of cycles founded in time to a scale of immensity on the planetary stage. I find the identical matter in Egypt in an indefinitely earlier form or phase, where it is followable, verifiable, and recoverable by means of external phenomena; and for me the natural genesis of these things was physical, and the metaphysical phase is its shadow, the returning manes of a once living meaning.

TRANSCORPOREAL VISIT OF A DYING BROTHER.

The following was told me by a lady known to me for half her lifetime, in whose accuracy and clearness of recollection I have entire confidence.

H. WEDGWOOD.

"I was sitting next my dear old friend, Dr. (since Sir Thomas) Watson, at a large London dinner-party. I think someone on the opposite side of the table said to him: 'A physician with your extensive practice must hear and see strange things sometimes.' He said: 'Indeed we do.' He then turned to me, and said: 'You know that I am a matter-of-fact person; and I will now tell you the strangest of all the strange things that ever happened to me. I was called in, some years ago, to see a gentleman, a stranger to me, who had been taken dangerously ill at his chambers in the Temple. Directly I saw him I knew that he had not more than twenty-four hours to live; and I told him that he must lose no time in settling any worldly affairs and in sending for any of his relations whom he might wish to see. He told me he had only one near relation, a brother, living in one of the Midland counties. By my patient's desire I sat down and wrote to the brother, telling him that if he would find the sick man still alive he must come off at once on receipt of my letter. The next morning, while I was visiting my patient, who was then sinking fast, the brother arrived. As he came in at the door the dying man fixed his eyes on his face, and said: 'Ah! brother; how d'ye do? I saw you last night, you know.' To my infinite surprise, the brother, instead of taking these words, as I did, for the dreamy wanderings of extreme weakness, replied quietly, 'Ah, yes—so you did—so you did.' All was over in a very short time, and when we left the bedroom together, I could not help asking the brother what those strange words meant. He said, 'You may well ask, but as sure as I see you now I saw my brother in the middle of last night. He came out of a cupboard at the foot of my bed, and after gazing at me for a minute or two without speaking, he disappeared.'" which they happen. It is because they are intended to effect a reconstruction of the spirit population, which is the regular and active population of the world." . . . "There are then collective emigrations and immigrations from one world to another; and from hence results the introduction of entirely new elements in the population of a globe: new races of spirits coming to mix with existing races, produce new races of men."—"La Genèse," chap. 11, p. 239.

* Students of Plato may remember a passage in the Timæus where, after a description of antecedent chaos, it is said that God introduced order for the first time by means of Ideas and number. What are those numbers? Surely the infinite "divisibilities" which Eddius speaks of as separated into ever-multiplying centres of own will, from the Divine Unity, and in its extension. "This Efflux floweth out of God, and the overflow is the Wisdom, the beginning and cause of all powers, colours, virtues and properties." ("Divine Vision," Chap. 8, par. 6.) The all pervaling derivative of that Efflux, all numbers; it is the which Eddius says: "In Ether resides all principles of life, all numbers; it is the substratum, the essence of life." (Elements of Physiophilosophy, p. 40, par. 173.) The substratum, the re-actiōnary cause of life, not its primal source. "Numbers are acts of the primary Intel, or properly speaking, stationary points of its function."—1844, p. 11.

Taken in connection with other sayings in "Esoteric Buddhism" which I subjoin, I think the Western medium not only confirms the evidence of the Eastern, but throws some further light on the use of these wholesale deportations of spirits from one world to another.

"Seven great Continental cataclysms occur during the occupation of the earth by the human life wave for one round period. Each race is cut off in this way at its appointed time." (P. 54.) "The progress towards absolute evil arrested by the cataclysms of each race in turn, sets in with the acquisition by means of ordinary intellectual research and scientific advancement of those powers over Nature, which accrue even now in adeptship from the premature development of higher faculties than those we ordinarily employ." (P. 62.) "Thus it is when physical intellect, unguarded by elevated morality, runs over into the proper region of spiritual advancement, that the natural law provides for its violent repression." (P. 63.)

There are three verses in the sixth chapter of Genesis which describe such a crisis with greater sublimity, to say the least of it, and much greater clearness; the sinfulness of human nature being there so simply spoken of, that anyone acquainted with his or her own heart will understand it; and it is notorious that the cataclysm which followed, whatever its extent may have been, finds obscure traditional record on all sides of the globe.

Mr. T. Lake Harris has, for some years past, been warning our world that another cataclysm is at hand. He mistook the exact year in which it would happen, like many another prophet; for "the spirit seeth all things nigh at hand, and then the siderial man supposeth that it will be instantly."*

As long ago as 1857 Mr. Harris declared as a medium "The invisible Hades has broken loose, and like a subterranean torrent men hear the hollow voices of the under world. Men stand upon an earth that is crumbling, amidst institutions that are perishing, and beneath a firmament that is being cleft asunder by the swift down-rushing of the final breath of fire."—"Arcana of Apocalypse," p. 397.) And reading it in 1883, we are apt to smile and think "All things continue as they were." But do they? In the face of all that has been happening since 1881 of sudden destructive calamity, the thought will obtrude,—Are one of Mr. Sinnett's rushes—Allan Kardec's emigrations—close at hand?

Speaking of the next general "emigration" from this planet, Jesus Christ used strong language. Having previously affirmed that it would be as wholly unlooked for as that which happened in the time of Noah, his last reference to it is even more impressive: "Except those days should be shortened then should no flesh be saved; but for the elects' sake those days shall be shortened." (Matthew xxiv. 22.) Intimating very clearly that the destruction of life foretold should be, in a certain sense, gradual. Who are the elect but those who will rejoice in the consequent immigration of a purer, happier class of spirits—who have already separated their affections from all that any external shock can take away.

Cullompton.

It is with great pleasure we draw the attention of our readers to the following syllabus:—"Lectures—Archaic, Evolutionary, and Theosophic, addressed to thinking men and women. Previous to his departure for America, Gerald Massey will deliver a course of four lectures in St. George's Hall, Langham-place, Regent-street, on Sunday afternoons in September. Subjects—September 9th, at 3 o'clock—"Man in Search of His Soul During 50,000 Years." (As revealed by the Bone Caves.) This lecture will include an explanation of the fundamental difference between modern "Spiritism" and that of "Esoteric Buddhism." September 16th, at 3 o'clock—"The Non-Historic Nature of the Fall of Man, and What it Meant as Fable." September 23rd, at 3 o'clock—"The Non-Historic Nature of the Canonical Gospels indubitably Demonstrated by Means of the Mythos, now for the First Time Recovered from the Sacred Books of Egypt." September 30th, at 3 o'clock—"Why does not God Kill the Devil?" (Man Friday's crucial question.) Doors open at half-past two o'clock. Admission—Hall, one shilling; gallery, sixpence. Course-tickets, for reserved seats, 5s. each, may be obtained of Messrs. Williams and Northgate, publishers, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden; and at the office of "LIGHT." Verbatim reports will be given in "LIGHT."

WONDERS.

From the Records of the "Wizard of the North."

All poets are seers though they may not know it, and all that belongs to seership has for them an intense interest, although they may know not whence or wherefore.

Sir Walter Scott, especially, is never weary of gathering together whosoever he may lay his hand upon them, records of the occult, in which he believed more than he cared to admit, or possibly, even more than he knew.

The notes to his novels and poems teem with illustrations of the supernatural, which out of the seer-nature within him, he was led to place upon record. These narratives are of great interest and value. They fall for the most part under distinct categories of recognised spiritual experience, and are highly valuable for illustrative purposes. Scott's own comments upon them have a certain interest, but are otherwise of little value in view of our more advanced psychological knowledge and experience.

Excessive Lamentation for the Dead painful to the Departed.

Notes to "Red Gauntlet."

Note D, p. 139.

" . . . The belief was general throughout Scotland that the excessive lamentation over the loss of friends disturbed the repose of the dead, and broke even the rest of the grave. There are several instances of this in tradition, but one struck me particularly, as I heard it from the lips of one who professed receiving it from those of a ghost-seer. This was a Highland lady, named Mrs. C—, of D—, who probably believed firmly in the truth of an apparition which seems to have originated in the weakness of her nerves and the strength of her imagination. She had been lately left a widow by her husband, with the office of guardian to their only child. The young man added to the difficulties of his charge by an extreme propensity for a military life, which his mother was unwilling to give way to while she found it impossible to repress it. About this time the Independent Companies, formed for the preservation of the peace of the Highlands, were in the course of being levied; and a gentleman named Cameron, nearly connected with Mrs. C—, commanded one of these companies. She was at length persuaded to compromise the matter with her son, by permitting him to enter this company in the capacity of a cadet, thus gratifying his love of a military life without the danger of foreign service, to which no one then thought those troops were at all liable to be exposed, while even their active service at home was not likely to be attended with much danger. She readily obtained a promise from her relative that he would be particular in his attention to her son, and, therefore, concluded she had accommodated matters between her son's wishes and his safety in a way sufficiently attentive to both. She set off to Edinburgh to get what was awaiting for his outfit; and shortly afterwards received melancholy news from the Highlands. The Independent Company into which her son was to enter had a skirmish with a party of Cateuchans engaged in some act of spoil, and her friend, the captain, being wounded, and out of reach of medical assistance, died in consequence. This news was a thunderbolt to the poor mother, who was at once deprived of her kinsman's advice and assistance, and instructed by his fate of the unexpected danger to which her son's new calling exposed him. She remained also in great sorrow for her relative, whom she loved with sisterly affection. These conflicting causes of anxiety, together with her uncertainty whether to continue or change her son's destination, were terminated in the following manner:

"The house in which Mrs. C— resided in the old town of Edinburgh, was a flat or story of a land, accessible, as was then universal, by a common stair. The family who occupied the story beneath were her acquaintances and she was in the habit of drinking tea with them every evening. It was, accordingly, about six o'clock, when, recovering herself from a deep fit of anxious reflection, she was about to leave the parlour in which she sat in order to attend this engagement. The door through which she was to pass opened, as was common in Edinburgh, into a dark passage. In this dark passage, and within a yard of her, when she opened the door, stood the apparition of her kinsman, the deceased officer, in his full tartans, and wearing his bonnet.

* Vide "LIGHT," February 5th, 1881. "Consolatory Thoughts for the Bereaved," in which appears some interesting illustration of the pain caused to the spirit by the grief of mourners on earth, who appear "to drag, through sympathy, their arison spirits back into the gloom and sorrow of earth."

CORRESPONDENCE.

The British Theosophical Society.

SIR,—It is with much regret that I trouble you, but I think the letter in your last impression, signed by the secretary of the above society, requires a brief reply.

In the first place, it seems quite irregular in a secret society to publish reflections on one of its fellows in reply to a private letter written to that society.

This remark is necessary, for otherwise your readers might suppose that the society, through its secretary, is now replying to my letter of the 21st July, in which I criticise in your pages the teachings of "Esoteric Buddhism," and your readers might further suppose that I had retired from the society in consequence of this letter from the society, whereas, the fact is, that the society's letter is meant as a reply to my private letter of resignation read to the society on the 29th July.

The history of my connection with the society is as follows:—

For some three years I was its president in Great Britain, but when the editor of the Theosophist and secretary of the Indian Society published in the Theosophist, May, 1882, these words, "There is no God personal or impersonal," I brought the matter before the British Society, and urged that no one using such language could logically be a Theosophist, and that we implicated ourselves if we continued to pay, as a branch, a money tribute to the Indian Society, and that we should therefore cease to be a branch and constitute ourselves an independent society.

Not being able to carry this arrangement I resigned my presidency, and being then elected a vice-president I resigned that also, and remained a fellow only, but on the best terms with all my fellow members until my criticisms on "Esoteric Buddhism" appeared in your pages on the 21st July.

In that criticism I did not utter one word in disparagement of Mr. Sinnett, my satire referring to the teachings of an invisible, and to all of us, including Mr. Sinnett, unknowable Asiatic.

Had Mr. Sinnett's rehearsal of these teachings been confined to the society I could not honourably have publicly criticised them, but when these teachings were published, it is surely absurd to say that because Mr. Sinnett and I are fellows of the same society it is a breach of brotherly obligation to criticise his book severely and satirically.

How could I act otherwise?

The fundamental printed rule of the British Theosophical Society is, "We believe in a great first intelligent cause, and in the Divine sonship of the spirit of man," but, in defiance of that sublime and fundamental axiom, "Esoteric Buddhism" tacitly accepts the assertion that "there is no God, personal or impersonal," and teaches "there is no Creator, for all things, including spirit, are evolved out of matter."

How could any Theosophist regard such teaching as otherwise than illogical, debasing, and absurd, and if he so regarded it, I maintain that private friendship, in so momentous a question, should not restrain the expression of one's strongest disapproval.

Personally, I regard Atheism and Materialism as the most stupid forms of ignorance and superstition known to man, and as subversive of all religion and morality; and if, in so regarding them, I have hurt the feelings of some old friends, I deeply regret it; but these friends must reflect on how deeply I feel hurt when I see certain fellows of a society—out of which I had for years hoped to see evolved, on the lines of our fundamental rule, the belief in God, and in the capabilities of man as the Son of God, a realisation of this Divine conception—forsaking this grand belief, and, with a credulity which I cannot understand, worshipping a series of complex subtleties and unsubstantial pageantries—a production of the small Oriental brain.

Cetewayo's Psychology.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—On August 21st of last year, in company with three ladies, I went to pay a visit to Cetewayo, and through Mr. Finney, his intelligent and gentlemanly interpreter, I had half-an-hour's conversation with the luckless sable king. My chief object being to ascertain his views of another life, I introduced the subject by saying to him that Major Poole (an Englishman who much befriended him, and whose death Cetewayo greatly lamented) was not dead, but lived in the spirit spheres, and was praying to God for his happiness. His reply astonished me:—"I know," said he, "that friend Poole lives, but as to God," and he shrugged his athletic shoulders. Mr. Finney, in interpreting Cetewayo's reply, explained to me that the Zulus only believe what falls under their senses: they acknowledge the existence of spirits, because they see them; but cannot understand a Supreme Being, whom they cannot perceive. Here is an abstruse problem for phrenology to solve: How men endowed with a large cerebral development, as the Zulus certainly possess, cannot arrive at the conclusion of the existence of a greater spirit than all of them, but inhabiting a region too high in space for them to perceive him. Maybe that unthinking prejudice is as strong with the Zulus as with many of the races considered most cultivated.—Very truly yours, G. DAMIANI.

London, August 3rd, 1883.

Terrified at what she saw, or thought she saw, she closed the door hastily, and sinking upon her knees by a chair, prayed to be delivered from the horrors of the vision. She remained in that posture till her friends below tapped on the floor to intimate that tea was ready. Recalled to herself by the signal, she arose, and on opening the apartment door was again confronted by the visionary Highlander, whose bloody brow bore token, on this second appearance, to the death he had died. Unable to endure the repetition of her terrors, Mrs. C— sank on the floor in a swoon. Her friends below, startled by the noise, came upstairs, and alarmed at the situation in which they found her, insisted upon her going to bed, and taking some medicine, in order to compose what they took for a nervous attack. They had no sooner left her in quiet, than the apparition of the soldier was once more visible in her apartment. This time she took courage and said, "In the name of God, Donald, why do you haunt one who respected and loved you when living?" To which he answered readily, in Gaelic, "Cousin, why did you not speak sooner? My rest is disturbed by your unnecessary lamentation—your tears scald me in my shroud." I come to tell you that my untimely death ought to make no difference in your views for your son; God will raise patrons to supply my place, and he will live to the fullness of years, and die honoured and at peace." The lady of course followed her kinsman's advice; and as she was accounted a person of strict veracity we may conclude the first apparition an illusion of the fancy; the final one a lively dream suggested by the other two." The Psychologist of 1883 will conclude somewhat differently to Sir Walter in 1824.

Faithful until Death.

Note L, p. 372, "The Antiquarian."

"All who were acquainted with that accomplished nobleman, John, Duke of Roxburghe, must remember that he was not more remarkable for creating and possessing a most curious and splendid library than for his acquaintance with the literary treasures which it contained. In arranging his books, fetching and replacing volumes which he wanted, and carrying on all the necessary intercourse which a man of letters holds with his library, it was the Duke's custom to employ not a secretary or librarian, but a livery servant, called Archie, whom habit had made so perfectly acquainted with the library that he knew every book as a shepherd does the individuals of his flock, by what is called 'head-mark,' and could bring his master whatever volume he wanted, and afford all the mechanical aid the Duke required in his literary researches. To secure the attendance of Archie, there was a bell hung in his room, which was used on no occasion except to call him individually to the Duke's study.

"His Grace died in St. James's-square, London, in the year 1804; the body was conveyed to Scotland to lie in state at the mansion of Fleurs, and to be removed from thence to the family burial-place at Bowden."

Death of a Good and Faithful Servant.

"At this time, Archie, who had been long attacked by a liver-complaint, was in the very last stage of that disease. Yet he prepared himself to accompany the body of the master whom he had so long and so faithfully waited upon. The medical persons assured him he could not survive the journey. It signified nothing, he said, whether he died in England or Scotland; he was resolved to assist in rendering the last honours to the kind master from whom he had been inseparable for so many years, even if he should expire in the attempt. The poor invalid was permitted to attend the Duke's body to Scotland, but when he reached Fleurs he was totally exhausted and obliged to keep his bed, in a sort of stupor, which announced his dissolution.

"On the morning of the day fixed for removing the dead body of the Duke to the place of burial, the private bell rang. This might easily happen in the confusion of such a scene, although the people of the neighbourhood prefer believing that the bell sounded of its own accord. Ring, however, it did; and Archie, roused by the well-known summons, rose up in his bed, and faltered, in broken accents, 'Yes, my Lord Duke; I will wait on your Grace instantly;' and with these words on his lips he is said to have fallen back and expired."

MARYLEBONE ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.—Mr. Dale, secretary to the above society, requests us to state for the guidance of those who wish to attend the public meetings of this association, that they have hired temporary premises, at the Temperance Hall, 52, Bell-street, Edgware-road, two minutes' walk from Edgware-road station; and that Mr. Towns' séance will be held next Friday evening, at 50, Crawford-street, Bryanston-square, and the Saturday séance at the same place.

Notes from an English Medium's Diary in America.

Sir,—It is a magnificent morning, such a one as I never saw in the leaden climate of the old country. I am sitting upon the stump of a broken tree on the margin of the lake. The waters are as still as the sweet lips of a sleeping baby. The soft breeze hardly makes the rustle of the leaves audible. The band is playing sweet music, and the notes echo and re-echo in the woods and hills. The sun is hot. The sky has a few fleecy, white clouds set in the deepest blue. The ground about me is alive with the tiniest insects, all as busy as a miller, attending to their own business. There are thousands of them. Butterflies of almost every colour abound, as also do ants and ant-hills too numerous to count. This is the camping ground of the New England Spiritualists. A perfect Eden. I think man is as much in eternity and heaven as he ever will be. When the soul feels right the world is beautiful. I like the romantic, and here it is to my heart's best wish. Away from the grotesque fussiness of the camp, alone with nature, I propose to give you a brief sketch of the manner of things at this place, and this camp meeting. This morning I rose at 6 o'clock, and with Mr. Pease, proprietor of the Saratoga Sun, rowed around the lake, with a graceful stroke that might not please the aquatic critics of the Tyne, which with the talk I much enjoyed. The Hon. A. H. Dailey went out into the woods to see if he could find any inspiration. Colonel Bundy was as busy as he could be in his tent. Dr. Beals, the president of the camp, was attending to everything, and Mrs. Dailey took a stroll upon the bluff, looking as sweet as a daisy.

But I had better begin with the beginning. It was arranged that I should accompany Mr. and Mrs. Dailey from Brooklyn. Accordingly on Saturday morning, July 28th, we met promptly at a quarter to nine o'clock at the Grand Central Depot, New York. Our journey was along the glorious bank of the Hudson. I don't know how the old Dutchman, Hendrie Hudson felt when he first sailed up this fine river, but John Morley in his life of Richard Cobden gives an extract from the latter's note-book in which the great free trader speaks of the Hudson, as the finest river he had ever seen. I can endorse every word he wrote: "the scenery along the river is something grand, cliffs, dark wooded hills, and bold mountain ranges charm with their grotesque outlines the eye of the beholder."

Albany is a large and growing city. At Troy we had to wait for a train an hour, which enabled us to see something of the city. Troy is a fine place. The houses are good and have a very clean appearance. The Spiritualists hold regular meetings here, and the society is in a fair condition. Dr. Ross comes from here. Our passes were from Troy to Lake Pleasant. On renewing our journey we plunged again into a fine country. Hill and dale diversified the scene. I never saw anything so like this part of the country as that part of Derbyshire between Chapel-en-le-Frith and Derby. Almost a perfect repetition of it. If anything, it is finer than the Derbyshire wonder. We got to the camping ground about seven o'clock. A large company met us at the station and gave us quite an ovation. I was sent off to the head-quarters, and the others went camp-like under canvas. I must say that Lake Pleasant is a delightful spot. I have seen some of the most charming spots in England, but I remember no place where so much choice and beautiful scenery can be found to rival this. The hills stand out with bold outlines to the sky, wooded to their summits. The tents are fixed up among the trees. The lake is a fine sheet of unbroken stillness. There are a few fish found in it. Mr. Pease, of Saratoga, proprietor of the Saratoga Sun, and I have had some fine boating. There is a large and convenient hotel, having an immense dining hall; terms for board five dollars per week. Nearly all the people dine at the hotel. The meetings are held in the grove, a lovely spot. From the rostrum an orator could speak to 20,000 people easy. A whisper can be heard a long way. The seats are arranged in a circle and the rostrum occupies the low ground in front. The seats ascend like a gallery, and when full of people have a grand and inspiring effect upon the speaker. There are a great number of mediums here with their notices exposed catering for support.

The camp opened its sessions on Sunday morning, July 29th. Dr. Beals, of Greenfield, the president of the camp, made a short introductory speech. He is tall, of fine presence, a good voice, an intelligent Spiritualist. He has a large intellect, grey hair, and reminds me, more than any man I have met, of John Lamont, of Liverpool. Dr. Geer, of Minnesota, did not come, but Cephas Lynn was selected to speak in his place. Mr. Lynn is a young man, and a fine speaker. His lecture was much appreciated. In the afternoon a large meeting came together to hear the medium from England. I am glad to say that the controls of J. C. Wright appear to have done themselves justice. I am satisfied, however, that a trance-speaker should not be too confident in the open air. I was terribly exhausted. On Monday, nothing particular happened, except that Judge Dailey and I went round the lake hunting up some fishing, but there is little chance of sport here. The Judge talks of being off soon into the State of Maine, where fish are plentiful. Monday in the camp is a dull day—the ladies call it washing day. There are a great many notable people here who stand out prominently in the cause. There are men and women from all parts of the great country. The weather is delightful. My stay here will probably be about twelve days. I have several times to speak yet, and I must say that I have found a great many dear friends. From what looks like my future at present, my destiny will be cast out West into that great country between Chicago and the Rocky Mountains. I shall stay through September in Brooklyn at the church of the New Spiritual Dispensation. In October I commence a campaign in Chicago, where I may stay through the winter. The exact term will depend upon circumstances. I feel deeply the importance of this great work.

I wish that I could speak with all my friends in England, whose love I prize, and to whom I would say au revoir, but not yet, farewell.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

METROPOLITAN SPIRITUAL LYCEUM,
CAVENDISH ROOMS, 51 AND 53, MORTIMER STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

We recently inaugurated a series of monthly relief nights at these rooms. Sunday, August 19th, was one of these, when our permanent lecturer, Mr. Morse, was indulging his view of relief by a journey to Yorkshire, and double duty when there, and we at home had again the pleasure of receiving Mr. Wallis, of Nottingham.

The subject selected by the Controls of this popular Midland apostle, was "The Dead Alive," involving, necessarily, questions which lend themselves so readily to the Spiritualist's philosophy, that it really needed a new and special source of inspiration to associate any degree of freshness with their treatment. The task was effectively accomplished, however, to the evident satisfaction of an excellent vacation audience, and it was agreeable to notice that whenever feeling got the better of a lingering sense of propriety, and vigorous applause indicated particular appreciation of points of the discourse, it was always where some practical suggestion of the need of personal well-doing was introduced.

The whole tone, in fact, of the address worthily sustained the wholesome tendency of the teaching to which we are accustomed, for whatever else "relief" may mean, as applied to the work of this Society, it does not imply relaxation of sincerity of endeavour after the better life here, as a preparation for the brighter hereafter, when the dead are most truly alive. — S. ## NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

Spiritualism is struggling on most energetically among the friends in the north. During the last two months several large camp mass meetings have been held at Hetton, Sunderland, Pelton, and Shields, under the management of Mr. H. Burton, who has laboured with untiring zeal through the district during the summer months. Large gatherings of eager inquirers gave token of the deep interest that is felt regarding the subject and the several able speeches of Messrs. Stevenson, Grey, Robinson, Edmunds Walker Pigford, Patterson, Dodds and others, impressed all who heard them, with the importance of a movement claiming such a position regarding the facts of spirit existence.

The presence of Mrs. Britten and Mr. Morse in the district, some short time ago, has done much towards directing the attention of many thoughtful persons to the movement in the several places visited by them.

On Sunday, the 12th, we had the pleasure of seeing Mr. H. Burton on the platform of the N.E.S., at Weirs Court, and we are glad to say, he met with a warm reception. And on the evening of the same day met with a commendation for his lecture on the "Powers of the Imagination," such, as we believe, few, if any, have had accorded from its platform. We may state that Mr. Skipsay, the miner poet, took the chair for him.

The quarter and adjourned quarter meetings of the N.E.S. have been closed during the past week. The late expulsion of several members led to an amount of controversy from the persons expelled and so protracted business for some weeks, and now, after the members have so thoroughly confirmed the action of the committee, we hope for better times, and we do not fear the results. We observe that the half-yearly balance-sheet shews that the new committee has during their short term of office cleared off a debt of about £30, and now possess a balance in hand of about £9. The roll shews 106 paying members and one honorary member. The library contains 313 volumes of valuable works on Spiritualism.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon)."

The Spiritual Record for the current month contains, among other interesting matter, some account of direct spirit drawings and writings obtained through the mediumship of Mr. W. Eglinton. One of these, consisting of a central circle with seven others surrounding it, is very curious, and complete in its details. The inner circle is filled with an extremely minute writing of the Lord's Prayer. This recalls to my memory a case occurring in our private circle many years since. We had put down a marked sheet of paper together with a very blunt lead pencil under the table at one of our séances. When the paper was taken up it was found to bear on its under surface a prayer written in the minute and beautifully formed writing of a spirit whom we knew as "Doctor." It was quite inconceivable to us that writing so beautifully clear and small could have been executed with the blunt pencil that alone was available. Yet we believe that in some inexplicable way this must have been accomplished; for on a subsequent occasion when a green pencil was put down the writing was found to be green. On the contrary, I have some experience of the production of writing in various colours without the normal use of a coloured pencil, e.g., between the leaves of a closed book.

Mrs. A. A. Watts's narrative of her drawings of the three cherub heads, particulars of which have not before been printed in detail, is very complete; and shews with striking conclusiveness how various are the methods used by spirits to convince minds of various types. I had received literal details of the death of three children in India, whose names and ages and other minute facts were given with perfect accuracy and precision of detail. Mrs. Watts received symbolic intimation of the same events, and the extract from her diary in which she records her own experience in connection with these three little ones, who were so suddenly removed from earth, and who yet were able to give intimation of their continued existence, is full of deep interest. Her plane of thought was very different from my own. Yet we were both reached by the means best adapted to impress us.

The Theosophist (July) reproduces my paper from "LIGHT" on "Spirit Identity and Recent Speculations," with a portentous editorial comment of greater length than the article on which it is founded. The writer thinks that I treat Theosophy unfairly. I can honestly say that I have taken all the pains in my power to give a candid and impartial consideration to the theories propounded. I am not conscious of having arrived at an attitude which the writer considers, I regret to see, both unfriendly and unfair by any means other than those of careful analysis and prolonged investigation of the claims put forth. I, at least, have not been in a hurry, and if now I find myself unable to square what I know with what I am told; if I find a fundamental antagonism between what, to me, is experimentally proven fact, and what (to me again) is something very different, I cannot help it, though it undoubtedly adds one more to the various perplexities that beset this subject. It would be tiresome and merely useless to travel over the whole area of discussion occupied by the Theosophist. No new feature comes out in the midst of this arid waste of words, and I see nothing for it but to go on my own way until I am convinced by some more cogent arguments that I am misinterpreting the facts which are presented to me, and which are, in my opinion, incompatible with the explanation of the occultists. I have no sort of desire to pose as one who has any special knowledge inaccessible to others. But what I do know is not shaken as yet by anything that I am told. If it be shaken at any time I hope I shall have the moral honesty to say so. Meantime, let us all go on with our investigations, reasonings, and speculations.

"Spiritualism according to the Theosophist, "is but thirty-five years old." I am happy to place that remarkable statement on record. "Occult philosophy rests upon the accumulated psychic facts of thousands of years." Yet it does not explain satisfactorily the accumulated psychic facts of my own little life, or even of such little portion of it as is enwrapped in the last decade. There is something wrong somewhere—possibly with my apprehension of facts and theories:—possibly with the theories:—possibly with the expositors of them. Who knows?

The strife that has surged around Washington Irving Bishop has passed into a phase into which it is no longer necessary for me to follow it. Mr. Labouchere has fairly stuck to him, until he has shewn the real truth. I am not about to follow the details of a controversy that has been made far too much of. I should not have touched the matter at all, but for the fear that Bishop's loudly vaunted pretensions to having exposed Spiritualism would be too rashly accepted. Whatever powers he may or may not possess, I suppose that his latest publication has been to most persons a revelation of "the truth." He may be left to resume his researches in the East, while a confiding public studies the history of the immediate past, and prepares for the reception of him on his return. Will the British public ever learn wisdom?—is a more interesting question than any that Mr. Bishop propounds.

I am indebted to Mr. Hazard for a copy of a little book which he has caused to be published, entitled "The Economy of Human Life," translated from an Indian manuscript written by an ancient Brahmin. In the year 1749 the Emperor of China seems to have sent a special minister to Thibet in order to translate some of the sacred books in the custody of the Grand Lama. A certain earl, not specified by name, received in England a translation of one of these, which is now printed. It consists of a series of aphorisms, many of which are beautiful, and breathe a spirit of pious wisdom that has a savour of the books in our Bible, such as Job, the Psalms, and the Proverbs which have furnished models to the translator. The subjects dealt with are those which concern man as an individual, his social duties, and his general obligations. It is instructive to note how similar are some of the utterances to those of the Wise King. Writing of anger, the ancient Brahmin says:—

"Consider how few things are worthy of anger; and thou wilt wonder that any but fools should be wrath."

"In folly or weakness it always beginneth: but remember, and be well assured, it seldom concludeth without repentance."

"On the heels of folly treadeth shame; at the back of anger standeth remorse."

Causeless wars are thus rebuked:—

"Be wise, O Ruler! and learn, O thou that art to command the nations! One crime authorised by thee is worse than the escape of ten from punishment."

"When thy people are numerous, when thy sons increase about thy table, sendest thou them not out to slay the innocent, and to fall before the sword of him whom they have not offended?"

"If the object of thy desires demand the lives of a thousand, sayest thou not, I will have it? Surely thou forgettest that he who created thee created also these, and that their blood is as rich as thine."

And of revenge:—

"The greatest victory man can obtain is over himself. He that disdaineth to feel an injury retorteth it upon him who offered it."

"The greater the wrong, the more glory in pardoning it. . . . Before thou condemnest let another say it is just."

Lastly, for much is worthy of quotation, and space is small, the writer says of Death:—

"He hath not spent his life ill who knoweth how to die well: neither can he have lost all his time who employeth the last portion of it to his honour."

"He that considereth he is to die is content while he liveth."

"Wouldst thou learn to die nobly? Let thy vices die before thee. Happy is he who endeth the business of his life before his death: who, when the hour of it cometh, hath nothing to do but to die."

"Avoid not death, for it is a weakness: fear it not, for thou understandest not what it is. All that thou certainly knowest is, that it putteth an end to thy sorrows."

"Think not the longest life the happiest. That which is best employed doeth man most honour: himself shall rejoice after death in the advantages of it. This is the complete economy of human life."

It is no small thing to say that through the whole of this little book there is no single sentiment that is coarse or mean, sensual or depraved in tendency. If there be commonplaces, they are the commonplaces of all systems of morality: and many aphorisms breathe a spirit of pure and simple wisdom and piety. M.A. (OXON.)

INSPIRATION OF POETS ACCORDING TO SOCRATES KINDERED TO THE INSPIRATION OF PROPHECY.—Indeed, to the student of poetry and the student of prophecy, these two things in the highest development of the gifts become merged into one. "I soon discovered this therefore, with regard to the poets, that they do not effect their object by wisdom, but by a certain natural inspiration, and under the influence of enthusiasm, like prophets and seers, for these also say many fine things, but they understand nothing that they say."—The Apology of Socrates.

NOTE ON MUSCLE-READING.

By REV. E. H. SUGDEN, B.Sc.

About six months ago I was led to try a few experiments in so-called Thought-reading, as exhibited by Stuart Cumberland, and I was very soon convinced that all that he had done, and much more, could be effected by careful interpretation of muscular indications. A number of public lectures afforded me opportunity for confirming my opinion by numerous experiments performed upon a great number of subjects, usually strangers to myself, but selected by the audience or chairman of the meeting. A few general results may be worth putting upon record.

(1.) Character of the Experiments.—They included the discovery of persons thought of in the audience, and articles worn by them; the finding of pins and other hidden articles; reading the numbers of bank notes, both by means of tickets with the ten digits printed on them and placed on a table, and by writing the numbers on a blackboard; the localisation of pains; following a track chalked out on the floor; and other similar tests. It will be observed that in all these cases the thought discovered is a thought involving either motion in a definite direction, or a definite point in space, the position of which been indicated by movements.

(2.) Modus operandi.—The subject was directed to concentrate his whole attention on the person, number, &c., thought of. I, of course blindfolded, took his left hand, as being more automatic than the right; then if the object was to find some person or thing in the room, I walked somewhat rapidly in front of my patient, following the indications he gave, until the person or thing was reached; if the number of a bank note was to be discovered, I moved the patient's hand rapidly to and fro over the figured cards on the table until I found where it most contentedly rested, so obtaining the five figures in succession; or else laid his right hand upon the back of my own, and following his indications wrote the figures successively on a blackboard. In localising a pain the patient's hand was rapidly passed over his body until some preferential point was discovered. I found further that for the large scale experiments it was quite enough to have a walking stick between myself and the patient, he holding one end and myself the other; indeed, I have succeeded occasionally with only a piece of thin wire as the connective.

In all cases muscular indication was all that I used; I never had any thought borne in upon my mind, or any image produced there; there was no genuine Thought-reading. I simply followed muscular signs. These varied very much in clearness and force. Sometimes the subject positively did all the work, leading me to the place, writing the figures, and so on while I was passive as possible; in such cases I have often gone on to write words or sentences upon the board under their guidance. But such instances were rare; as a rule, I had to make a careful estimate of the muscular resistance in each direction and follow the line of least resistance until the place was reached or the figure so far shaped as to be recognisable; then the indications usually became very much more positive.

(3.) Failures and their Causes.—I more or less completely failed in about one case in four on an average; probably the failures would have been fewer if I had had ladies as my patients; as I have always in private experiments, found them very good subjects. In every case of failure, where inquiry could be made, sufficient reason was discovered. The most usual cause was determination not to allow the thing to be done; the patient having an idea that it was a question of his will being conquered by mine, and so bracing himself up to resist. Occasionally persons came forward, determined to thwart me, either because they thought it was "all humbug," or because they considered the phenomena to be due to spiritualistic agencies. When the subject had a financial interest in the experiment I found success to be very difficult to obtain. Boys, as a rule, I found to be impracticable subjects; possibly because they found it impossible to concentrate their thoughts intensely, whilst facing a large audience. I soon found out, too, that persons with cold, dry hands were never so easy to deal with as those with warm, moist hands.

(4) The Experience of the Patients.—It is most important to note, that in almost all cases, the question was asked, "Did you give me any indication of what you were thinking about?" and the answer was invariably "No, not the least." The whole was done without any consciousness, and often in spite of a resolution to be quite passive. This should be remembered whenever contact has been allowed in supposed genuine experiments in Thought-reading. The assurance of the person who is in contact with the Thought-reader, that he gave him no indication, is absolutely worthless. The most respectable and trustworthy persons have, over and over again, assured me that they have never moved their hand, when I have known that they have simply used my hand as a pen and have written with it, and the chalk it held, using far more effort than they would, if the chalk had been in their own fingers. It should further be noted that contact with the hand is not necessary. I have succeeded in finding a person thought of in a room, when the patient's hand was simply laid upon my forehead; or upon my shoulders. The result of my experience would lead me to doubt any case of alleged Thought-reading where contact of any kind had been allowed.

(5) One or two observations, bearing on the unconscious action of the mind, may be recorded. I noticed very often that when an article had been hidden in one place, and then transferred to another, my patient almost invariably took me first to the first place, and then after a short search there, suddenly went off to the right place. The same sort of thing has happened in the case of figures. If the figure has been charged, the one first thought of came out first, only to be declared wrong. Once in writing a bank note number, I could get nothing but twos; they were declared to be wrong; "but," said the patient, "there were two twos on another part of the note, which I particularly noticed." This is of interest as bearing on the well-known fact that in so-called spiritualistic revelations the things told are things which the questioner has possibly even forgotten, but which have once been in his mind.

I also found that it is difficult for the mind to avoid transferring itself from one thing to another like it. In finding pins, &c., I have often been led, not to the right place, but to a place similar to it; as e.g., the pin has been in one corner of the room, and I have gone to the other; or it has been in some one's pocket, and almost every pocket that I came near has had to be searched. One case was very singular. The pin had been hidden in the heel of a man's boot, under the instep. I was at once taken to a man near the platform, and got down to his boot heel and to the very spot where the pin really was, but in another man's boot, I could get no farther with that subject; but on taking another, I at once found the right man, and the pin in his boot-heel.

I may finally add that I have no special power in this direction; I have rarely found any one who could not pretty readily succeed in performing any of these experiments after a very little practice; and even on the first attempt, if they had confidence.

"It is as dangerous to pitch your standard of morality too high as to low. He who practised the highest morality the world ever had presented to it was crucified between two men who practised the lowest." "Nearly all the best Christians I know do not call themselves by that name." "Why those who attribute our existing faculties to a process of evolution, should be the first to limit that process to the past, and deny that we are capable of morally and materially continuing to evolve, has always been a mystery to me."—From Laurence Oliphant's Attiora Eto.

Religious Conversion through a Vision.

Notes to "Waverley."

Note C. p. 57. Colonel Gardiner.

"I have given in the text," writes Sir Walter, "the full name of this gallant and excellent man, and proceed to copy the account of his remarkable conversion, as related by Dr. Doddridge."

"This memorable event," says the pious writer, "happened towards the middle of July, 1719. The major had spent the evening (and, if I mistake not, it was the Sabbath) in some gay company, and had an unhappy assignation with a married woman, whom he was to attend exactly at twelve. The company broke up about eleven, and, not judging it convenient to anticipate the time appointed, he went into his chamber to kill the tedious hour, perhaps in some amusing way. But it very accidentally happened that he took up a religious book, which his good mother or aunt had, without his knowledge, slipped into his portmanteau. It was called, if I remember the title exactly, 'The Christian Soldier, or, Heaven Taken by Storm,' and it was written by a Mr. Thomas Watson. Guessing by the title of it that he would find some phrases of his own profession, spiritualised in a manner that he thought might afford him some diversion, he resolved to dip into it; but he took no serious notice of anything it had in it; and yet while this book was in his hand an impression was made upon his mind (perhaps God only knows how) which drew after it a train of the most important and happy consequences.* He thought he saw an unusual blaze of light fall upon the book while he was reading, which he first imagined might happen by some accident in the candle; but, lifting up his eyes, he apprehended, to his extreme amazement, that there was before him, as it were, suspended in the air, a visible representation of the Lord Jesus Christ upon the cross, surrounded on all sides with a glory; and was impressed, as if a voice, or something equivalent to a voice, had come to him to this effect (for he was not confident as to the words), 'Oh, sinner! did I suffer this for thee, and are these thy returns!' Struck with so amazing a phenomenon as this, there remained hardly any life in him, so that he sunk down into the arm-chair in which he sat, and continued, he knew not how long, insensible."

"With regard to this vision," says the ingenious Dr. Hibbert, "the appearance of our Saviour on the cross, and the awful words repeated, can be considered in no other light than as so many recollected images of the mind, which probably had their origin in the language of some urgent appeal to repentance, that the colonel might have casually read or heard delivered. From what cause, however, such ideas were rendered as vivid as actual impressions, we have no information to be depended upon. This vision was certainly attended with one of the most important of consequences connected with the Christian dispensation—the conversion of a sinner. And hence no single narrative has, perhaps, done more to confirm the superstitious opinion that apparitions of this awful kind cannot arise without a Divine fiat." Dr. Hibbert adds in a note, "A short time before the vision, Colonel Gardiner had received a severe fall from his horse. Did the brain receive some slight degree of injury from the accident, so as to predispose him to this spiritual illusion?"—"Hibbert's Philosophy of Apparitions," Edinburgh, 1824, p. 190. "Hibbert on Apparitions" is a scarce book, and should be sought after by Psychologists, not for its philosophy, but for the extraordinary amount of facts it contains.

The Bahr Geist.

Notes to "The Betrothed."
Note D., p. 116.

Lady Fanshaw, shifting among her friends in Ireland, like the other sound loyalists of the period, tells her story thus:—

"From thence we went to the Lady Honor O'Brien's, a lady that went for a maid, but few believed it. She was the youngest daughter of the Earl of Thomond. There we stayed three nights, the first of which I was surprised at being laid in a chamber where, when about one o'clock, I heard a noise that awakened me. I drew the curtain, and in the casement of the window I saw by the light of the moon, a woman leaning through the casement into the room, in white, with red hair, * Clairvoyants assert that each book has around it a "sphere" for good or evil. The same has been asserted by spirits.

† From "Memoirs of Lady Fanshaw," published by Sir Harris Nicolas.

and pale and ghastly complexion. She spoke loud, and in a tone I had never heard, thrice 'A horse'; and then with a sigh more like wind than breath, she vanished.* I was so much frightened that my hair stood on end, and my night clothes fell off. I pulled and pinched your father, who never awoke during the disorder I was in, but at last was much surprised to see me in this fright, and more so when I related the story and showed him the window opened. Neither of us slept any more that night; but he entertained me by telling me how much more these apparitions were common in this country than in England; and we concluded the cause to be the great superstition of the Irish, and the want of that knowing faith which should defend them from the power of the devil, which he exercises among them very much. About five o'clock the lady of the house came to us, saying she had not been in bed all night, because a cousin, O'Brien, of hers, whose ancestors had owned that house, had desired her to stay with him in his chamber, and that he died about two o'clock; and she said, "I wish you to have had no disturbance, for 'tis the custom of the place, that when any of the family are dying, the shape of a woman appears every night in the window until they be dead. This woman was many ages ago got with child by the owner of this place, who murdered her in his garden, and flung her into the river under the window; but truly, I thought not of it when I lodged you here, it being the best room in the house. We made little reply to her speech, but disposed ourselves to be gone suddenly."

An Apparition.

Note K., p. 121, Manx Superstition—"Feveril of the Peak."

"A mighty bustle they also make of an apparition, which, they say, haunts Castle Rushin in the form of a woman who was some years since executed for the murder of her child. I have heard not only persons who have been confined there for debt, but also the soldiers of the garrison, affirm they have seen it several times. But what I took most note of was the report of a gentleman of whose good understanding, as well as veracity, I have a very great opinion. He told me that happening to be abroad late one night, and caught in an excessive storm of wind and rain, he saw a woman stand before the castle gate, where being not the least shelter, it something surprised him that anybody, much less one of that sex, should not run to some little porch or shed, of which there are several in Castle Town, than choose to stand still, exposed and alone, to such a dreadful tempest. His curiosity exciting him to draw nearer, that he might discover who it was that seemed so little to regard the fury of the elements, he perceived she retreated on his approach, and at last, he thought, went into the Castle, though the gates were shut. This obliging him to think that he had seen a spirit, sent him home very much terrified; but the next day, relating his adventure to some people who lived in the Castle, and describing, as near as he could, the gait and stature of the apparition, they told him it was that of the woman above mentioned, who had been frequently seen by the soldiers on guard, to pass in and out of the gates, as well as to walk through the rooms though there was no visible means to enter. Though so familiar to the eye, no person has yet, however, had the courage to speak to it, and as they say a spirit has no power to reveal its mind, without being conjured to do so in a proper manner, the reason of its being permitted to wander is unknown."

"For my part," continues Waldron, "I shall not pretend to determine if such appearances have any reality, or are only the efforts of the imagination; but I shall leave the point to be discussed by those who have made it more their study, and only say, that whatever belief we ought to give to some accounts of this kind, there are others, and much more numerous, which merit only to be laughed at—it not being at all consonant with reason, or the idea religion gives us of the fallen angels, to suppose spirits so eminent in wisdom and knowledge as to be exceeded by nothing but their Creator, should visit the earth for such trifling purposes as to throw bottles and glasses about a room and a thousand other as ridiculous gambols mentioned in those voluminous treatises of apparitions."

At the end of the nineteenth century there are persons who no longer are inclined to regard the accounts of spirits who "throw bottles and glasses about a room and a thousand other as ridiculous gambols," as stories "which merit only to be laughed at," although they may not either exactly incline to believe that such "gambols" are the product of "spirits so eminent in wisdom and knowledge as to be exceeded by nothing but their Creator." Some little light regarding law spiritual manifestation has happily begun to dawn for us, since 1731.

REVIEW.

SPIRIT TEACHINGS. By "M.A. (Oxon)," Author of "Psychography," "Spirit Identity," "Higher Aspects of Spiritualism," &c., &c. London: The Psychological Press Association, 38, Great Russell-street, W.C., and E. W. Allen, 4, Ave Maria-lane. 1883. 10s. 6d.

FOURTH NOTICE.

Imperator Instructs His Pupil Regarding Symbolism.

"Matter will be regarded as husk to be stripped off before the kernel of truth can be got at. Matter will be the deceptive, fleeting phantasm behind which is veiled the truth on which none but the purged eye may gaze. Such a soul, so taught, will not need to be told to avoid the external in all things, and to penetrate through the husk to the truth that lies below. It will have learned that the surface-meanings of things are for the babes in spiritual knowledge, and that beneath an obvious fact lurks a spiritual symbolic truth. Such a soul will see the correspondence of matter and spirit, and will recognise in the external only rude signs by which is conveyed to the child so much of spiritual truth as its finite mind can grasp." But antagonists are ever near.

The Combat Re-commences.

To it in veriest truth, to die has been gain. The life that it leads is a life of the spirit; for flesh has been conquered, and the world has ceased to charm. But in proportion as the spiritual perceptions are quickened, so do the spiritual foes come into more prominent view. The Adversaries, who are the sworn enemies of spiritual progress and enlightenment, will beset the aspirant's path, and remain for him a ceaseless cause of conflict throughout his career of probation. By degrees they will be vanquished by the faithful soul who presses on, but conflict with them will never wholly cease during the probation-life, for it is the means whereby the higher faculties are developed, and the steps by which entrance is won to the higher spheres of bliss.

This, briefly, is the life of the progressive spirit—self-sacrifice, whereby self is crucified; self-denial, whereby the world is vanquished; and spiritual conflict, whereby the Adversaries are beaten back. It is no stagnation; even no rest; no finality. It is a daily death, out of which springs the risen life. It is a constant fight out of which is won perpetual progress. It is the quenchless struggle of the light that is within to shine out more and more into the radiance of the perfect day. And thus only that which you call Heaven is won."

What is effected in the soul itself, and in its God-appointed work in the world, is thus beautifully described by "Imperator":—

"Those dry and sapless forms of devotion that seemed so cold and dead, that the soul has often cried in despair, 'O, Lord! can these dry bones live?' are found to be touched with life, and warmth, and reality, as the Resurrection-spirit touches them. The old forms that have served their purpose are re-generated into a life more suited to the new conditions. They live again with more than the old vitality—with a loveliness more spiritual than that of the past. They have renewed their youth, and it is seen by the spiritually-enlightened that no atom of truth can perish, but is renewed and re-combined as there is need of it in the laboratory of the Master."

"After the conflict comes the peace, after the death the uprising."

"The spirit shares in the general resurrection that surrounds it. It renews its life, soars to higher planes of knowledge, learns deeper truths, and goes forth, in the might of that knowledge, to teach to others the Divine methods of enlightenment, development, and growth. Not as man sees does it see; not as man acts does it act. Beneath the most unpromising exterior it sees Divine possibilities. The veriest cucumber it would not cut down, save in so far as pruning may facilitate growth, and the lopping off of dead wood may allow the young and living branches to find place. Side by side with this public work is the unceasing esoteric life of growth in spirit, a life of aspiration and development, of communing with the Spirit of Truth, of rising more and more above the material and the earthly, to the measure of the stature of the fulness of the Anointed One."

And again, in a later portion of the "Teachings," "Imperator" exclaims:—

"Be of good hope! You are too apt to fancy that Truth is dead. When the cold dark days of winter are with you, you are chilled. You forget that spring has dawned on many a winter past. You forget that death leads to resurrection, and on to regenerated life—life in a wider sphere, with extended usefulness, with nobler aims, with a truer purpose. You forget that death must precede such life, that what you call death, so far as it can affect Divine truth, is but the dying of the grain of seed which is the condition of abundant increase. . . . The spiritual motto—Death culminating in a higher life: Victory in the grave and through death. In dealing with spiritual truth, do not forget this. In times of brightness and calm you may fear. When the air is stagnant, and the heat scorching; when the moisture is dried up, and the fierce sun beats down with untempered splendour, the tender plant may wither and fade. And so in days of care and smoothness, when all goes swimmingly, when all men seem to speak well of the Word of Truth, you may with good reason fear lest it fade, and its outlines be blurred, and its tone assimilated to the conventional fashion of the world. You may settle with yourselves that if all accept unquestioned the truth presented to them, then that phase of truth needs changing, and some stronger form is requisite. But when it is born in conflict, be of good cheer, for by such birth-pangs man-children are brought forth, whose vigour and energy shall suffice to resist attack, and to carry on the Divine standard to further vantage ground."

The Law of Love as it Operates upon the Arisen-Spirits is thus beautifully illustrated:—

"The life of the Christ during such time as He remained on earth after His resurrection, was symbolic of the change that passes on the risen-life of the spirit. In the world, but not of it; moving in it as a visitor who conforms to, but does not belong to it. He was animated by that most potent law of spirit which you may trace in all the ways of spirit-influence—the law of love. Whenever He appeared, whatever He did, this was the motive. . . . He fulfilled the law of love, and then ascended to His own proper sphere—no longer seen, but felt; no longer a personal presence, but an effluence and influence of grace."

"So the souls who voluntarily linger around your earth are those whose motive-spring is love, or they whose mission is animated by the same master-principle. Personal affection, or universal love are the motives that draw the higher spirits down to you. And when the duty is discharged, they too will ascend to the common Father and the Universal God."

Scattered throughout the volume are passages of vital import to the spiritual man, to the sensitive "Psychic" with regard to the everyday matters of life and his intercourse with his fellow men. To such will the knowledge already have been attained, by no little suffering, that the spheres of evil of the spirit-world permeate and overlap the earth, and earth-life, in intricate embrace. To escape from this net-work of magnetic evil-assault which he encounters in his every-day life is the ardent cry of his soul. Upon him will not be lost the experience and wisdom to be gathered from the following "communication" regarding

The Derby Day.

"Any such occasions disturb the moral conditions and render it hard for us to reach you. The spirits who are antagonistic to us are massed together in great force whenever any occasion is offered for them to operate successfully on men who are gathered together for the purpose of gratifying their bodily passions. Yesterday there were vast masses whose passion of cupidity was excited to an enormous degree. They were the point of attack from similar spirits. Others there were whose bodies were wildly excited by intoxicating drinks; others who were feverish with expectation of coming gains; others were again plunged into depths of despair by loss of all—the ready prey; these last by the suggestions of tempting spirits; and even when these baser passions were not actively excited, the moral balance was upset, that calmness and equability which should regulate the temper, and which were a shield against the foe, were absent, and so a chance of favourable assault was given. For short of absolute evil, much ground for assault is given by an ill-regulated, disordered mind, by minds unhinged and ill-balanced. Beware of immoderate, unreasoning, excited frames of mind."—(p. 40.)

"Imperator" clearly and boldly announces

How Man attracts Evil to Himself.

"It is only they who by a fondness for evil, by a lack of spiritual and excess of corporeal development, attract to themselves the congenial spirits of the undeveloped, who have left the body, but have not forgotten its desires. These alone risk incursion of evil. These by proclivity attract evil, and it dwells with them at their invitation. They attract the lower spirits who hover nearest earth, and who are too ready to rush in and mar our plans and ruin our work for souls. These are they of whom you speak when you say, in haste, that the result of Spiritualism is not for good. You err, friend. Blame not us that the lower spirits manifest for those who bid them welcome. Blame man's insensate folly, which will choose the low and grovelling rather than the pure and elevated. . . . Blame the ginshops, and the madhouses, and the prisons, and the encouraged lusts, and fiendish selfishness of man."

We will conclude our notice of this valuable contribution to both Theology and Psychology with a passage meet for reflection by the thoughtful Sociologist, regarding

Capital Punishment.

"Nothing is more dangerous than for souls to be rudely severed from their bodily habitation, and to be launched into spirit-life, with angry passions stirred, and revengeful feelings dominant. It is bad that any should be dismissed from earthly life suddenly, and before the bond is naturally severed. It is for this reason that all destruction of bodily life is foolish and rude: as betokening a barbarous ignorance of the condition of life and progress in the hereafter, foolish as releasing an undeveloped, angry spirit from its trammels, and enduing it with extended capacity for mischief. You are blind and ignorant in your dealings with those who have offended against your laws and regulations, moral and restrictive, by which you govern intercourse among yourselves. You find a low and debased intelligence offending against morality or against constituted law. Straightway you take the readiest means of aggravating the capacity for mischief. Instead of separating such an one from evil influence, removing him from association with sin, and isolating him under the educating influence of true purity and spirituality, where the more refined intelligences may gradually operate and counteract the evil ministrations, you place him in company with offenders like himself, where the very atmosphere is heavy with evil, where the hordes of the undeveloped and unprogressed spirits most do congregate, and where, both from human association and spirit influence, the whole tendency is evil. . . . How many an erring soul—erring through ignorance, as frequently as through choice—has come forth from your jails hardened and attended by evil guides, you know not and can never know. But were you to pursue an enlightened plan with your offenders, you would find a perceptible gain, and confer blessing incalculable on the misguided and vicious. You should teach your criminals; you should punish them as they will be punished here, by shewing them how they hurt themselves by their sin, and how they retard their future progress. You should place them where advanced and earnest spirits among you may lead them to unlearn their sins and to drink in wisdom; where the bands of the blessed may aid their efforts, and the spirits of the higher spheres may shed on them their higher influence. But you horde together your dangerous spirits. You punish them vindictively, cruelly, foolishly: and the man who has been the victim of your ignorant treatment, pursues his course of suicidal sin until, in the end, you cut him off debased, sensual, ignorant, mad with rage and hate, thirsting for vengeance on his fellow; you remove from him the great bar on his passions, and send him into spirit-life to work out, without hindrance, the devilish suggestions of his inflamed passions."

The notices of "Spirit-Teaching" cannot be more aptly terminated than by the concluding paragraph of the book itself.

"The opinions expressed may be dismissed or accepted" says M. A. (Oxon), "by each reader, according as they commend themselves to him. But he will miss the true significance of this volume, if he does not recognise a sustained and successful effort of intelligence, apart from a human brain, to influence one who claims for himself no other merit than that of having honestly and very laboriously endeavoured to arrive at truth."

It appears from a paragraph in the Medium and Daybreak that one of the "Fox girls," now Mrs. Kate Fox-Jenken, is related to George Fox, the founder of the Quakers, a bold reformer and remarkable medium, whose family has given rise to a line of occultists and mediums extending to the present day. Mr. Jenken, who had a favourite theme in the hereditary transmission of mediumship, does not seem to have been aware of the remarkable example furnished by the family of his own wife.

A PRINCELY PSYCHIC. 1707.

At p. 325 in Jung-Stillings "Theory of Pneumatology," translated by Samuel Jackson:—(London, Longman's, 1834), will be found the following impressive narrative relative to Duke Christian of Eisenberg.

Jung-Stilling was Private-Aulic-Counsellor to the Grand Duke of Baden.* He was in a position to know whether or not the remarkable history was regarded as genuine by the Royal houses of Germany of his day. Add to which, Stilling himself was a man of high conscientiousness and integrity, and he assures us that the account existed at one time "in the Saxon archive." Can any of our German readers obtain information, of a more recent date, as to the existence of the original State documents?

"The Principality of Saxe-Altenburg was divided towards the end of the seventeenth century into three parts, one of which appertains to Gotha, another to Saalfeld, and the third—namely, Eisenberg—had its own regent, whose family, however, became extinct with Duke Christian, in the year 1707, on which Eisenberg was again added to Gotha.

"This Duke Christian had a very remarkable apparition not long before his death, which has all the testimonies of historical authenticity in its favour, and was preserved in one of the Saxon archives, at least, where it may probably still be found.

"It forms the 10th article in the 'Monthly Discourses on the World of Spirits,' p. 319, published at Leipzig, by Samuel Bergmann Walter, in 1730.

"I will insert it here, as I find it in the work above-mentioned, in the style of those times," continues Stilling:—

"About the year 1705, as Christian, Duke of Eisenberg, who died in April, 1707, was reposing upon his couch at noon, in his closet, and occupied with a variety of spiritual meditations, some one knocked at his closet-door. Now, although the Duke could not comprehend how this could happen, as the guard and the other servants were in the ante-chamber, he, however, called out 'Come in!' on which a female figure, representing Anna, daughter of the Elector of Saxony, entered in an ancient

* In urging Jung-Stilling to write his life, Goethe rendered a great service to the cause of genuine Christianity.

His life is one of the most remarkable and triumphant examples of living faith. From a poor tailor's son, he rose to be not only a professor of Marburg and Heidelberg, but a most successful operator for the cure of cataract, and a very popular writer in defence of Christianity. The Grand Duke of Baden became personally attached to him, delighted to have him near him, and gave him a handsome stipend to devote himself to literature and to the cure of cataract gratuitously. By this means Stilling not only restored sight to many hundreds of the blind, but spread over all Germany, and into many foreign lands, the radiance and joy of his own faith.—Howitt's "History of the Supernatural," pp. 21-22.

princely attire. When the Duke, who had raised himself up, and was seized with a slight trepidation, asked her what was her pleasure, she answered, 'Be not afraid, I am no evil spirit; no harm shall befall thee.'

"On which the Duke no longer felt any apprehension, and inquired further, who she was.

"She gave him for answer—'I am one of thy ancestors, and my husband was the same that thou art now. His name was John Casimir, Duke of Coburg. But we have both been dead a hundred years.'

"Now, when the Duke inquired further what she requested of him, she expressed herself in the following manner:—'I have a request to make of thee, in my own name, and in that of the Duke, my husband, because we were not reconciled before our end, in consequence of a quarrel between us, although we both died trusting in the merits of Jesus Christ; and that is, that thou effect this reconciliation between us, at this time, which God has appointed for it. With respect to myself I am already in a state of blessedness: but I do not yet enjoy the full vision of God, but have been hitherto in a state of silent and agreeable repose. But the Duke, who would not be reconciled to me at my death—though he afterwards repented of it, and left the world in real, though weak faith in Jesus Christ—has continued hitherto, between time and eternity, in cold and darkness, yet not without hope of salvation.'

"Now, when the Duke made many objections against this proposition, the spirit refuted them as inappropriate and irrelevant, and said also, that as soon as she entered into the Eternal world, she ascertained that one of their descendants was destined to assist them in bringing about a reconciliation, and she was the more rejoiced to find that he, the Duke, was the instrument appointed by God for this purpose. Finally, the spirit granted the Duke a week for reflection, after the lapse of which, she would again appear at the same hour and await his decision: on which she vanished from his sight.

"The Duke, being on terms of particular intimacy with a learned divine, the Superintendent Hofkunzen, who resided at Torgau, fourteen German miles distant, with whom he was wont to correspond, by express, on spiritual, temporal, and even political matters, immediately despatched a messenger to him, communicating in writing all the particulars of the apparition he had seen, and desiring his advice and opinion whether he ought to comply with the spirit's request or not. The matter appeared to the divine a little suspicious at first, and he was inclined to regard it as a dream; but after duly considering the singular piety of the Prince, his extensive knowledge and experience of spiritual things, his tender conscience, and at the same time the circumstance of the spirit showing itself in broad daylight, when the sun was shining, he made no scruple of returning the following answer to the Duke:—'That in so far as the spirit should not desire of him any superstitious ceremonies, or such as were contrary to the Word of God, and if he, the Duke, had sufficient courage for such a transaction, he would not advise him against fulfilling the spirit's wishes. Yet, that he ought to continue in fervent prayer, and in order to prevent deception, cause the passage to his chamber and closet to be well watched by his guards and domestics.

"In the meantime, the Duke gave orders for the ancient records to be searched, and found that all the spirit had said was according to truth, so that even the dress of the deceased princess and that of the apparition agreed minutely.

"Now when the appointed hour approached, the Duke laid himself upon his couch, after having given strict orders to the guard before his chamber, not to suffer a single individual to enter, and having begun the day with prayer, fasting and singing, he read in the Bible whilst waiting for the spirit, which made its appearance at the same hour as the week before, and at length, upon the Duke's calling out 'Come in!' entered the closet in its previous costume.

"It immediately asked the Duke, whether he had resolved on complying with its wishes, on which the latter replied that he would do so in God's name, in so far as what she desired was not contrary to the Word of God, nor accompanied by anything of a superstitious nature; she need, therefore, only tell him plainly how he was to act in the matter.

"Upon receiving this declaration, the spirit expressed itself to the following effect:—'During my life-time, the Duke, my husband, suspected me, though groundlessly, of being unfaithful to him, because I frequently conversed in private with a certain cavalier upon religious subjects. On this account, he cherished an irreconcilable hatred to me, which was so violent, that though I sufficiently proved my innocence, and even entreated a reconciliation on my death-bed, yet he would neither abandon his hatred and suspicion nor resolve to come to me. Now, having done everything in my power in the matter, although I died in true faith in my Saviour, and likewise entered rest and peace, yet I do not hitherto enjoy the full vision of God. My husband, on the contrary, as mentioned above, repented, it is true, after my death of his implacability towards me, and died at length, also in true faith; yet he has continued until now, between time and eternity, in distress, and cold and darkness: but now the time appointed of God is arrived for thee to reconcile us, in this world, with each other, and by so doing, aid us in attaining felicity.' 'But what shall I do in the matter, and how shall I act in it?' asked the Duke; and received this answer from the spirit: 'To-morrow night, hold thyself in readiness; and I and the Duke will come to thee (for although I come by day, yet my husband cannot do so); and each of us will state to thee the causes of our existing quarrel. Thou shalt give judgment which of us is right, join our hands together, promise the Lord's blessing upon us, and afterwards unite with us in praising God.' After the Duke had promised to do so, the spirit disappeared.

"The day following, the Duke continued his devotions until evening, when he expressly commanded his guards to let no one enter the chamber, as also to pay attention if they should hear anyone speak. Hereupon he ordered two wax-lapers to be lighted and placed upon the table, and also a Bible and Hymn Book to be brought, and thus expected the arrival of the spirits.

"They made their appearance at eleven o'clock: first came the Princess, as before, as though alive, and again stated to the Duke the causes of their quarrel; then came also the spirit of the Prince, in his wonted princely dress, but looking very pale and death-like, and gave the Duke quite a different account of their disagreement.

"Upon this the Duke gave judgment, that the spirit of the Prince was in the wrong; to which the latter also assented, and said, 'Thou hast judged right.' On this the Duke took the cold hand of the Prince, laid it in the hand of the Princess, which possessed natural warmth, and pronounced the blessing of the Lord upon them; to which they both said, 'Amen!' The Duke then began to sing the hymn, 'We praise Thee, O God!' &c., during which it seemed to him, as if both really sang with him. After finishing the Princess said to the Duke, 'God will reward thee for this, and thou wilt soon be with us.' On which they both vanished. The guards had overheard nothing of this conversation, except what the Duke said, who, if I mistake not, died a year afterwards, and for secret reasons ordered his body to be buried in quick-lime." Thus far the narrative.

Regarding this remarkable history, Jung Stilling makes various reflections, the following of which will not be without interest to the reader since they entirely accord with the spirit-teachings of our own day.

"This apparition suggests to me," he says, "several important remarks." That Duke Christian possessed a developed organ of presentiment, is clear from the circumstance that only he saw the spirits and heard them speak. Perhaps it was on account of this natural disposition, that he was chosen for this singular judicial procedure. The appearance of the Princess in her earthly clothing, and the circumstance of her being still deprived of the bliss of the Divine presence, notwithstanding her state of rest and inward peace, is a proof that she was still in Hades; that the quarrel with her husband detained her there, and that her imagination was not yet freed from every earthly bond. . . . When we reflect upon the fate of Duke John Casimir, we must be struck with amazement and awe. How dreadful to continue for a hundred years together in cold and darkness, inwardly grieving at the supposed infidelity of the Princess, without anything to refresh the senses in the wide and desert Hades, and God knows in what society, or else in none, and consequently alone. . . . A soul that cherishes the slightest animosity, and takes this feeling with it into eternity, cannot be happy."

Stilling is inclined to believe that "it was contrary to the natural laws of the spiritual world" that a person in the flesh should accomplish the reconciliation between the princely pair, and he is convinced "that this step was taken by these two spirits, through error and mistake; every back-road into the visible world, from the invisible being unlawful."

The student of our modern-spiritual experiences may, however, possibly be inclined to modify the stern judgment passed by our author on the ghostly actors in this dignified and impressive narrative. To him it may rather appear as a striking example of intercourse permitted for mutual cleansing, and for mutual growth in knowledge of Divine things, between spirits incarnate, and disembodied of very varied states; but all bound together by Law Divine in a most mystical and indissoluble union for mutual aid:—one of the innumerable instances in the great scheme of redemption from sin and suffering of our "Everlasting God, who has obtained and constituted the services of angels and men in a wonderful order."

TO GERALD MASSEY
ON HIS COMPLETION
"THE NATURAL GENESIS."

After long sailing over trackless sea,
Where man before had never dared to roam,
Victor in toil that heroes well might flee,
Welcome, brave mariner, to land and home!

With thee for guide we now at ease can dream
As dreamt our sable fathers of the wild.
Once more our brains with Nature's lessons teem
And manhood steps in time with tottering child.

Fearless we follow thy assuring clue
Through Egypt's catacombs and pillared halls,
And mystic wisdom dawns upon our view
From mummies' ceremonies and sepulchral walls.

Nay—on the vault of Heaven itself we trace
The pictured horn-book of the earlier man;
A chart so old, the life of all our race
As told till now appears but as a span.

At last the dogmas of our priests are shewn
In their true shape, perverted savage lore,
And simple natural types, in ages grown
To huge mind-prisons darkening every shore:

Prisons and dungeons where the fettered soul
Toils in the gloom throughout life's little day;
For metaphysic clouds around it roll,
And hide or else refract truth's genial ray.

But down shall come beneath this last assault
The despot Superstition's grim Bastille,
And cunning hands in subterranean vault
Forged title deeds to priestly power reveal.

Then, Massey, take the thanks of all the wise,
Forgot in them the hide-bound pedant's sneer;
The day of just requital swiftly hies
When England's sons shall hold thine honour dear.

S. E. BENGOUCH.

The German weekly Spiritualist journal, Der Sprechsal, of Leipzig, is not now published, it having been merged with the Psychische Studien of the same city.

Dr. Ditson, writing to the Banner, says:—"It may be remembered that Madame Kardec left to the Society for the publication of her husband's works quite a sum of money; but the will was contested by an aged distant relative, said to be under the influence of the Catholics, and much difficulty was anticipated. I learn, however, that a compromise has been made, and that a larger portion of the widow's estate is to be devoted to the object intended. Few persons have written so much and so well, continuously, on Spiritualism as M. Kardec. His works have been translated into many languages, and almost a fabulous number of editions have been printed of them. There is in them a sustained force and aim, a logic and lucidity, which have won popular favour. His views, however, of re-incarnation, are not accepted by many of the Orientalists, who feel that his conception of the subject is not the right one. The Theosophists are trying to throw light upon the matter, and, in the opinion of not a few students of this abstruse question, have the more acceptable survey of it. If re-incarnation be a truth, it underlies and explains many of those abnormal conditions, strange freaks, propensities, and passions witnessed in human nature, not otherwise accounted for.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

"Esoteric Buddhism."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—It is wonderfully surprising to an outsider that anyone with a practical knowledge of occult phenomena, an acquaintance with Madame Blavatsky, and a Fellowship in the Theosophical Society, should so sadly bungle over Esoteric Buddhism as does Mr. G. L. Ditson. Certainly, inasmuch as every criticism in his letter contains either a misinterpretation or an inconsequent argument, he has no locus standi of complaint that, "in a scientific and logical point of view, Mr. Sinnett's works are very defective."

Although I am without your correspondent's qualifications for the task, I, too, have read Mr. Sinnett's books, but with the intensest interest, and my gratitude to the author prompts me to repel Mr. Ditson's attack.

There is first the complaint that "Mr. Sinnett has not imparted" the "exact and experimental knowledge" on which he declares the importance of occult teaching turns. But, sir, as everyone knows, it is not pretended that this spiritual knowledge, exact and experimental as it is, can be proved upon paper, or tested in the laboratory, but only by the development in the student of the proper faculties. Mr. Sinnett states and reiterates this in the books which Mr. Ditson says he has read. To demand the impossible is safe, but it is no argument.

But whence comes that strange "declaration so often made by Eastern Theosophists, that we never receive any information from the (so-called) spirits, which conveys information not in possession of the medium, or some other person present." This man of straw, at which Mr. Ditson strikes out so valiantly, is of his own setting up. The real declarations of Eastern Theosophists in the Theosophist are widely different from this rough and ready summary of Eastern thought on the subject. In fact, they contain the exact converse. But these requiring for their comprehension a little time and attention, have evidently escaped Mr. Ditson's survey. They are (should he wish to return to them) to be found in the Theosophist for October, 1881.

There is an unfortunate fatality in your correspondent's comparison of occult, with spiritualistic phenomena. In the first place, the object of the Mahatmas, as I understand it, has not been to parade their unique powers with a view to impress Spiritualists with rival phenomena. Their primal offer is to teach us—if so we will—not the way to work wonders, but the way to work the great wonder of salvation from our seces, in which miraculous process miracles are but incidents of the march. And thus, while the "Occult World" contained the credentials, "Esoteric Buddhism" is the real message. Of the validity of these credentials Mr. Ditson does not complain, only of their paucity; he merely cries, like the surfeited Scribes and Pharisees of old, for a new sign.

This is general; but Mr. Ditson's naïveté tempts me to the special, for in this unfortunate comparison he unwittingly shows the great superiority of occult over Spiritualistic methods. An adept can project his soul. "But," says Mr. Ditson, in great glee, "one who was not an adept had his soul projected." The immense difference between the two cases will be at once appreciated by all who prefer personal control over their own affairs to the interference of an outsider. To be plain, but I trust without offence, the adept is his own master, the medium is in temporary servitude to others. Herein we see the rationale of Occultism, for it teaches us to discover spiritual forces in ourselves, rather than in the uncertain vagaries of foreign intelligences.

For the rest, your correspondent's quibbles and jokes do but testify to the invincible worth of Mr. Sinnett's books; and were it not for that concluding threat that "he may refer to this again," I should, in my simplicity, have mistaken this later attack for the "forlorn hope" of an expiring Philistinism. At all events, after breasting these waves of laughter and contempt, might not Esoteric Buddhism now be permitted to enter that second stage, in the history of every truth, of sober criticism?—Yours, &c.,

Lewisham, S.E.

GEORGE J. GILL.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In a communication that appeared in your issue of July 21st, "G. W., M.D.," reviewing "Esoteric Buddhism," says: "Regarding this Koot Hoomi, it is a very remarkable and unsatisfactory fact that Mr. Sinnett, although in correspondence with him for years, has yet never been permitted to see him." I agree with your correspondent entirely; and this is not the only fact that is unsatisfactory to me. On reading Mr. Sinnett's "Occult World," more than a year ago, I was very greatly surprised to find in one of the letters presented by Mr. Sinnett as having been transmitted to him by Koot Hoomi, in the mysterious manner described, a passage taken almost verbatim from an address on Spiritualism by me at Lake Pleasant, in August, 1880, and published the same month by the Banner of Light. As Mr. Sinnett's book did not appear till a considerable time afterwards (about a year, I think), it is certain that I did not quote, consciously or unconsciously, from its pages. How, then, did it get into Koot Hoomi's mysterious letter?

I sent to Mr. Sinnett a letter through his publishers, enclosing the printed pages of my address, with the part used by Koot Hoomi marked upon it, and asked for an explanation, for I wondered that so great a sage as Koot Hoomi should need to borrow anything from so humble a student of spiritual things as myself. As yet I have received no reply; and the query has been suggested to my mind.—Is Koot Hoomi a myth? or, if not, is he so great an adept as to have impressed my mind with his thoughts and words while I was preparing my address? If the latter were the case he could not consistently exclaim: "Percent qui ante nos nostra dixerunt."

Perhaps Mr. Sinnett may think it scarcely worth while to solve this little problem; but the fact that the existence of the brotherhood has not yet been proved may induce some to raise the question suggested by "G. W., M.D." Is there any such secret order? On this question, which is not intended to imply anything offensive to Mr. Sinnett, that other still more important question may depend. Is Mr. Sinnett's recently published book an exponent of Esoteric Buddhism? It is, doubtless, a work of great ability, and its statements are worthy of deep thought; but the main question is, are they true, or how can they be verified? As this cannot be accomplished except by the exercise of abnormal or transcendental faculties, they must be accepted, if at all, upon the ipse dixit of the accomplished adept, who has been so kind as to sacrifice his esoteric character or vow, and make Mr. Sinnett his channel of communication with the outer world, thus rendering his sacred knowledge exoteric. Hence, if this publication, with its wonderful doctrine of "Shells," overturning the consolatory conclusions of Spiritualists, is to be accepted, the authority must be established, and the existence of the adept or adepts—indeed, the facts of adeptship—must be proved. The first step in affording this proof has hardly yet, I think, been taken. I trust this book will be very carefully analysed, and the nature of its inculcations exposed, whether they are Esoteric Buddhism or not.

The following are the passages referred to, printed side by side for the sake of ready reference.

Extract from Mr. Kiddle's discourse, entitled "The Present Outlook of Spiritualism," delivered at Lake Pleasant Camp Meeting on Sunday, August 15th, 1880.

"My friends, ideas rule the world; and as men's minds receive new ideas, laying aside the old and effete, the world advances. Society rests upon them; mighty revolutions spring from them; institutions crumble before their onward march. It is just as impossible to resist their influx, when the time comes, as to stay the progress of the tide."

And the agency called Spiritualism is bringing a new set of ideas into the world—ideas on the most momentous subjects, touching man's true position in the universe; his origin and destiny; the relation of the mortal to the immortal; of the temporary to the Eternal; of the finite to the Infinite; of man's deathless soul to the material universe in which it now dwells—ideas larger, more general, more comprehensive, recognising more fully the universal reign of law as the expression of the Divine will, unchanging and unchangeable, in regard to which there is only an Eternal Now, while to mortals time is past or future, as related to their finite existence on this material plane; &c., &c., &c.

New York, August 11th, 1883.

HENRY KIDDLE.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The letter from "A Catholic Priest," in your last edition, is mentally refreshing. He is, if not as I feel inclined to call him, "an excellent Buddhist," already a disciple of that universal religion which is to bind all men in one brotherhood. But if we were all true followers of our Lord Jesus, we should all be "Buddhists,"—if the Divine wisdom religion, esoterically inculcated by Jesus, should bear any name savouring of sectarianism. That Jesus was a Buddhist (esoteric), or trained in those ancient schools of adeptship which brought forth Gautama Buddha, is elaborately proved from the pages of "Isis Unveiled"—that monument of astounding research, knowledge, and wisdom. I will call only one small quotation from innumerable others bearing even more powerfully upon this point:—"When they find that—1, All His sayings are in a Pythagorean spirit, when not verbatim repetitions; 2, His mode of ethics is purely Buddhist; 3, His mode of action and walk in life, Essenean; and 4, His mystical mode of expression, His parables, and His ways, those of an initiate, whether Grecian, Chaldean, or Magian (for the 'Perfect,' who spoke the hidden wisdom, were of the same school of archaic learning all the world over), it is difficult to escape from the logical conclusion that He belonged to that same body of initiates."

Eliphas Levi (the renowned Abbé Constant) calls Jesus "the most powerful of Initiates."

This is the age for winnowing the true from the false. Need we fear the truth? The truth can only make Christianity grander and more glorious! weeding out all the old, false overgrowths, and unveiling its hidden beauty and majesty. According to the Kabala (the veiled wisdom and secret science of Hebrew adepts) was the Bible written; and we must dive deeply into occult philosophy if we would understand truly the Christian or any religion. Says Eliphas Levi:—"Occult philosophy seems to have been everywhere the nurse or god-mother of all religions, the secret lever of all intellectual forces, the key of all divine mysteries, and the absolute queen of society, in those ages when it was exclusively restricted to the education of the priests and kings." Again, he says: "The Kabala alone consecrates the alliance of universal reason with the Divine Word; it establishes by the counterweight of two forces, apparently opposed, the eternal balance (equipoix) of Being; it alone reconciles reason with faith, power with liberty, science with mystery; it possesses the keys of the present, the past, and the future."

Now, when the hidden is being revealed, and those may see who have eyes to see, there is no longer need for mystery or ignorance. The true student, emancipated from bigotry and that prejudice which arises from an egotistic love of our own ideas, than which nothing can be more stultifying, may now, in the wondrous light of occult science, solve all problems, and stand face to face with the Infinite. "Science," says the Abbé Constant, in his eloquently sententious style, "is the absolute and complete possession of the truth."

And further—"The initiates know; that suffices. As for others, let them laugh, believe, doubt, menace, or fear, what does it matter to science—or to us?" We must have the opposite end of the pole, however, and there will ever be those whose intellectual orbs are unfitted to see by the light of this divine science.

To borrow an expressive image from Eliphas Levi:—

"Thou may'st hold this right:
If thou shew'st the light
To a bird of night,
Thou wilt take from him his sight,
For it blinds his eyes:
With alarmed surprise,
To the shade he flies,
For darkness to him is light."

The God-Idea.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In last week's "Notes by the Way" you quote, with apparent approval, from the author of "Natural Religion," who, you say, "defines an atheist as one who 'disbelieves in any regularity in the universe to which a man must conform himself under penalties.'" This seems to me to be a new and a very erroneous definition of the term atheist, which, according to the dictionaries, means "one who denies the existence of a God." A man may deny, disbelieve in, or doubt the existence of a God, and yet believe, as most of the exponents of what is termed atheism do, in a regularity in the universe to which a man must conform himself under penalties.—Yours sincerely,

F. J. THOMAS.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—May I be permitted, with the deepest respect, to deprecate a confusion of terms which I find in the papers on the "God-Idea," contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)," to the numbers of "LIGHT" for August 4th and 11th. In them he uses this expression: "A personal God, by which is understood a God in human form." If I dare say so, this seems to me a petitio principii, for, as far as I can judge, there are many people who would by no means so conceive of a personal God, and I fear that by letting it go forth to the world that a personal God is denied by Spiritualists, we may lay ourselves open to grave misconception, which, if I have hitherto read him aright, would be most of all unfair to "M.A. (Oxon.)," himself.

There appeared in "LIGHT," some few months since, a letter, in which was very concisely and ably shown the fallacy of compounding personal with corporeal, and pointing out the source of the error to be such common sayings as, "taken from the person," &c., to which "M.A. (Oxon.)," replied at the time very gracefully.

As far as I myself am concerned, the idea of an anthropomorphic God is so strange that I am amazed to find it so largely held and contested; when I was a child, I was taught that representations of God the Father were a mistake, though a reverently intended one, as it was impossible to represent Him as He is; and therefore, the colossal human form, in which mediæval artists loved to clothe Him, was as much to me a symbol as the lamb for the second, and the dove for the third persons of the Trinity. (Surely we Spiritualists, to whom so much has been taught by that same system of symbolism which has prevailed throughout all ages, should be the last to perceive the letter only and to reject the spirit of these teachings.) I have never found anything in our Bible to suggest the idea of an anthropomorphic God, except perhaps in the mystic pages of the Revelation, the expressions in which are obviously figurative. This is, indeed, the solitary passage: "In the image of God created He them," but can there be any very great question whether this applies to the immortal spirit of man, or to the frail, perishable envelope which he inhabits during his brief stay here on earth? "God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth." "And the Spirit of God beareth witness with our spirit that we are the sons of God." When our Lord says: "Be ye perfect, even as your Father which is in Heaven is perfect," does He mean that we are to strive to resemble our Father in body or in spirit? We are told that He pervades all things, and that in Him we live and move and have our being, a thought with which the anthropomorphic idea is inconsistent. The more one gains of spiritual teaching, the more clearly one sees that this human body of ours is but a very imperfect and feeble exponent of our real and living selves, a comparatively clumsy machine trammelling the faculties which employ it. Those who communicate with us from the other side do not appear to be so trammelled; to us movement from place to place means walking, swimming, flying, or being carried, yet it is not impossible to us to conceive of motion independent of these methods, although it is impossible to us to speculate how such motion may be accomplished. As it is with the human spirits, so, in infinitely higher degree, must it be with the greatest of all Spirits; why should we deny in Him the existence of all faculties in absolute perfection, because our finite minds cannot conceive the means of that perfection? It is well to remember that the finite may apprehend, but cannot comprehend, the Infinite.

But on the other hand, while the idea of a God in human form is utterly unreal to my perfection, my God is to me personal beyond any of His creatures. He is no mere vague abstraction, but a personal Father, Friend, and Counsellor; He has upheld and protected me through trials and troubles unspeakable, and I can go to Him in difficulties with a confidence which no creature can inspire, since He knows me better than I know myself. That His mercies pass to me by means of messengers I doubt not, but the alms of a rich man to a poor one come none the less from him because he sends them by a servant.

While I am about it, I cannot refrain from referring to the difficulty of the writer in the Spectator with regard to the Sunderland disaster. As he very justly observes, this distressing incident appeals to our imagination because it has been brought under our notice, but it is probable that more children died unmarked that day in the United Kingdom than on that sad spot. Surely, to no one who thinks at all, can this vast subject of the lavish outlay of life, visible through all the economy of nature, have failed to present itself as a problem pregnant with suggestion; some great truth is obviously to be deduced from so universal and noticeable a fact, and it depends very much on the individual bent of our minds whether we argue from one end thus: "Things happen which seem to me hard and unjust, therefore God cannot be good, or does not exist"; or from the other: "I know by experience that God is good; therefore, although I see things happening around me which seem hard and cruel, I can believe that He allows no pain to be suffered but for a loving purpose, and I can wait in patience for the restoration of all things, and remembering that 'whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son that He receiveth.'" We are still groping in deep ignorance of the Ways of God, and the mystery of pain is still a great mystery to us, but yet there are glimpses of light gleaming through the darkness, whereby we can see somewhat to cheer our hearts. That pain, and what we call death, are not evils in themselves, we are already beginning to see, for without these achievement and progress are impossible; of which truth we have a constant memorial in the anguish which is forgotten by the mother for joy that a child is born into the world; how many a poor suffering soul, too, can look back upon its fiery ordeal, and say with David: "It is good for me that I have been in trouble." To regret that lives should be cut short here, and precluded from further effort in this world, is to fall back into the mediæval notion that this little globe is the centre of the Universe, and that the sun goes round it. If this small plane were the only field of action for God's creatures, then might we well wail and mourn all our days and all day long for pity of the slaughter, and the outrage, and the wrong: the lives unfinished and some scarce began, the savage and untaught lives that go down into the grave like sheep, and with less conscience than the higher brutes, and even at the best for the fullest lives, which here go unsatisfied. It is the very despatch of our case, if this world be all, that gives us hope, for we know in our inmost hearts that this cannot be all, but is only one side of the picture. If we poor, imperfect, simple creatures are so strongly moved by love, compassion, justice, mercy, whence do we derive these sentiments? Everything that exists must have a source, and to what source can we refer so readily as the God who has told us that His name is love—that love which originates and includes all the virtues. Is it not reasonable to conclude that these, and every good gift and every perfect gift, are from above, and cometh down from the Father of Lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of changing, although their manifestation in us must, perforce, owing to our undeveloped condition, be but very faint reflections of their perfection in Him. If this were not so, we should be greater and better than God, as it seems to me some people in their secret hearts think they are; indeed, I think that many of us are in danger of supposing that we feel for our fellow-creatures more than God does, rejecting the saying, "If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in Heaven give gifts unto them that ask Him." I think we are apt to step into the judgment-seat too rashly; it does not appear to us ridiculous that we should attempt to criticise the workings of God's will from the standpoint of "this very elementary world of ours," yet we should not regard with gravity a learned treatise by a little boy of three on the government of his country, based on his experiences in the nursery.

It may be objected to all this that I take my stand upon certain texts of our Bible which have no authority for many readers of "LIGHT." To this I reply that they and I can have but this common ground, viz., that at present neither their view nor mine is capable of absolute demonstration, and that all theories can only be judged by their consistency outwardly with known facts, and inwardly in their own component parts. Such being the case, the personal experience of each individual soul has its own value, and I am well assured that when I offer my testimony that I have never gone to my God for help and teaching without obtaining the comfort and assistance that I needed, I speak not as one alone, but as one of millions who can support my witness with their own. Why, when such is our experience, should we go out of our way to say: "This is not His work, Whose it purports to be, but is wrought by others of less power and wisdom"? If the prayer is answered, what right have we to say it has not reached the All-Father, to whom it was addressed? This is to pile up difficulties rather than to lessen them.

Trusting that these remarks will be received in the kindly spirit in which they are offered, I have the honour to remain, sir, faithfully yours,

A. E. MAJOR.

August 19th, 1883.

P.S.—We have been, and still are, abroad, and have only recently received the numbers of "LIGHT" referred to; last Friday's has not yet reached us.

Christian Symbolism.

SIR,—“A Catholic Priest” has, in his otherwise excellent letter, made a mistake in calling water the synonym of the flesh. It always stands for the soul; so that it is not of flesh and spirit that the man regenerate is born, but of the operation of a pure spirit (or God) in a pure soul. For, to be fully regenerate, one must have no material admixture. I commend this correction and definition to his consideration, confident that if he will follow to its fullest extent the clue it presents, he will some day no longer be able to sign himself “A Catholic Priest.”—Yours,

E. M.

SIR,—In continuation of my last letter will you permit me to show the Esoteric teaching contained in the rites and ceremonies of the Mass in the Catholic Church, which alone possesses it unmitigated. The Sacrifice of the Mass is not a bloody sacrifice as it is often alleged by the ignorant, but a bloodless and pure oblation. It is the marriage of the man and the woman, of the Divine and the human, the atonement of the spirit, and matter of Heaven and earth. In this rite, be it observed, are two elements denoting the Divine duality, the man-womanhood in God; the unit of these elements, the bread is feminine, that which is passive, substantial; the wine is masculine, that which is active, spiritual-penetrating. The paten also is masculine and solar; the chalice is feminine or lunar (the crescent shape); as I said before, the water used is feminine, representing the humanity, while the incense is masculine as it ascends, and penetrates the holiest by its Divine aroma elicited by fire. The four sides of the altar symbolise the four seasons and also the fourfold constitution of man. (See "Perfect Way.") The Tabernacle on the altar is the house of the Son (Sun). The celebrant is the Pontifex, the bridge maker who at-ones, unites. He begins at the centre, the autumn equinox; being, the true beginning of the years of the dark season; west side then goes to the south side, following the sun's path then, (in the Eastern rite) by the East, then to the North, the place of darkness, where is read the Gospel, and lights are kindled at the reading of it, and then, finally, which is finished (Missa-cet) is the West. It is the path of the Sun. The mingling of the water with the wine is the union of the human with the Divine in the person of the atoner in order that the body of humanity (signified by the wafer) being penetrated thereby may be raised to the Divine and this occurs at the conclusion of the rite, a portion of the wafer is immersed in the chalice and penetrated by the wine and this is called "the holy union." The feast is then ready and the communion commences, that they who partake of the body of God, (i.e., the Divine Substance, also the Universe, the Church or Bride of God, which is elected from men for the redemption and raising up of the rest) and by the Blood of God (i.e., the Divine Spirit manifested in force astral fluid which pervades all things, also the Divine Spouse who lifts up His Bride to union with Himself) should be made members of that one Body, manifesting the One Life and Substance, and then raised from the material and sensual into the ideal and spiritual, and united with God. The Holy Bread borne in the Pyx, and saturated with the Sacred Wine, is also symbolical of the universe filled with astral fluid and of the Divine Substance filled with the Divine Life—which is being ever given, ever shed, for the good of the All, the Scene of existence.

This is the true doctrine, the mystic truth contained in the rites and ceremonies of the Christian Sacrifice as celebrated by Rome and Greece. At the so-called Reformation the spiritual was cast out for the material. Purgatory was rejected for eternal torture, invocation of the departed for glorification of heroes, the intercession of Maria for the supremacy of the Devil, and an all-compassionate Father for a vindictive monster.—Yours,

A CATHOLIC PRIEST.

P.S.—In my last letter for "after" read "ages of"; for "in regenerate" read "is regenerate."

The Banner of Light, in its issue of August 18th, quoting from our columns, speaks of Mr. Morell Theobald as a Reverend. This is hardly correct. That gentleman's father, however, was one of the most popular of the Congregational ministers of his time.

"BIOGRAPHIES OF DR. KERNER, MESMER, AND WM. HOWITT," BY MRS. HOWITT-WATTS.—This work is now rapidly approaching completion. GERALD MASSEY'S LECTURES AT ST. GEORGE'S HALL.—We have much pleasure in again calling attention to these lectures, the first of which will be given on Sunday afternoon next. Mr. Massey's reputation as a scholar and public speaker should secure him a very full audience, notwithstanding the somewhat unfavourable season of the year chosen for the course. On reconsideration, we have decided not to print a verbatim report in these columns, as such a course would be unfair to Mr. Massey, who intends to make the lectures, as announced, part of a much more extended series of addresses to be delivered in other quarters. For the information of our readers, we append the announcement in extenso:—"Lectures—Archaic, Evolutionary, and Theosophic, addressed to thinking men and women. Previous to his departure for America, Gerald Massey will deliver a course of four lectures in St. George's Hall, Langham-place, Regent-street, on Sunday afternoons in September. Subjects—September 9th, at 3 o'clock—"Man in Search of His Soul During 50,000 Years." (As revealed by the Bone Caves.) This lecture will include an explanation of the fundamental difference between modern "Spiritism" and that of "Esoteric Buddhism." September 16th, at 3 o'clock—"The Non-Historic Nature of the Fall of Man, and What it Meant as Fable." September 23rd, at 3 o'clock—"The Non-Historic Nature of the Canonical Gospels indubitably Demonstrated by Means of the Mythos, now for the First Time Recovered from the Sacred Books of Egypt." September 30th, at 3 o'clock—"Why does not God Kill the Devil?" (Man Friday's crucial question.) Doors open at half-past two o'clock. Admission—Hall, one shilling; gallery, sixpence. Course-tickets, for reserved seats, 5s. each, may be obtained of Messrs. Williams and Northgate, publishers, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, and at the doors.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon.)"

I am happy to welcome Mr. Gerald Massey back into the lecture field. Almost my first experience of public Spiritualism was as a listener to some lectures of his delivered in St. George's Hall. I did not then know enough of the subjects with which the lecturer dealt to appreciate his mastery of them as I have since done. But I knew enough of platform oratory to feel that Mr. Gerald Massey is eminent among the best public speakers, and that he then impressed his audience as few could have done. At this juncture it is well that one so capable should come forward to deal with subjects which agitate the public mind, and which, if not fully ripe for solution, are at any rate open to discussion with some prospect of advantage. Mr. Gerald Massey is to discuss the Esoteric Buddhism revealed to us by Mr. Sinnett, and to point out the fundamental difference between it and Spiritualism. This should attract a large audience. The only regret is that Mr. Gerald Massey's engagements should compel him to select a time of the year when London is comparatively empty. Many, like myself, will be deprived of the pleasure of listening to a course of lectures full of interest. We must hope that they will, before long, be in print, and meantime that many, more fortunate than ourselves, will crowd St. George's Hall to listen to them.

I record, with regret, the death of Dr. J. R. Newton. He was well known both in England and in America as a successful psychopathist. When in this country, in the year 1870, he gave convincing proof of his powers, and testimony was borne to them in the public prints by many unimpeachable witnesses. Dr. Newton had attained the good age of 73 years, and since the year 1858 had devoted his gift of healing to the service of his fellows, especially to the poor, without consideration of reward. His zeal was consuming, his energy untiring, and he literally followed in the footsteps of the Master in that "he went about doing good." His generosity was without stint, and he died poor in purse, but rich beyond most men in the blessings heaped on him by those whose sufferings he had alleviated. Few can look back on a life so well spent; few have so richly deserved to be esteemed as benefactors of their race. Dr. J. M. Peebles, Professor J. R. Buchanan, Judge Nelson Cross, and other leaders of American Spiritualism, bore eloquent testimony to his worth; and many in this country will cordially acquiesce in that estimate, and mingle their regrets at humanity's loss with admiration of a noble and well-spent life.

Though late, it is not, perhaps, too late to put on record an opinion that on the 16th of August the Times printed an article on Swedenborg, with incidental allusions to the occult in various directions, which was more phenomenally full of ignorant and ludicrous blunders than any that I remember to have read before or since. "Swedenborg, it is almost needless to say, was out of his mind during the last thirty years of his life." That is a specimen of the writer's calm assumptions. Further on we are informed that the "whole host of Spiritualists, table-turners, thought-readers, clairvoyants, traces its origin to"—Andrew Jackson Davis! Lastly, to pass over the minor vagaries of a writer who seems to think everybody mad except himself (a symptom that should inspire alarm among his friends), the Society for the Promotion of Psychical Research (he cannot even write the name correctly!) is advised to go to the centenary meeting of the Swedenborgians, to see how many "apostles, and prophets, and departed saints have come back to the assembly." "G. A. S." in this week's Illustrated London News complains that he is getting mentally befogged. He wonders whether age or the heat may perchance have done it, but on the whole inclines to attribute the ailment to an attempt, with elbows on the table, and wet towel round his head, to read and comprehend Mr. Sinnett's "Esoteric Buddhism." Let him be content. His own symptoms are not apparent, and he has a brother in affliction whose case is desperate. Is it due to the same terrible cause?

The St. James's Gazette, like "G. A. S.," has had a bad time with "Esoteric Buddhism." It is almost pardonable to guess that Mr. Rhys Davids himself has relieved his overcharged feelings in that review by warning Mr. Sinnett off his own private reserves of Buddhism. For the Reviewer tells Mr. Sinnett that "he knows nothing about Buddhism," and it is no secret that Mr. Sinnett's mysterious instructors entertain the same opinion about Mr. Rhys Davids and the Western school of dabblers in Eastern lore. "The Cosmogony of an Artificial Fifth Rounder," as the review is entitled, is amusing enough, smart, flippant, and readable. The writer shares an opinion widely held that Koot-Humi's existence and identity are not sufficiently proven to lift him out of the region of myth into that of sober fact.

"Irreverent Anglo-Indians, we believe, have declared that Bombay and not Tibet is Koot-Humi's usual place of abode. Nay, have gone so far as to assert that could we (in Theosophic phrase) pierce the inner penetralia of Koot-Humi, and discover the esoteric nature of simple Mr. Sinnett's Adept Guru, we should find in place of one Oriental sage two Occidental humourists, who have each contributed a syllable to the well-sounding name of this fictitious Wise Man from the East. We do not for a moment wish it to be understood that we support any such assertion. Koot-Humi is plainly a reality for Mr. Sinnett, who need not be suspected of inventing 'this vast and complicated cosmogony' all by himself. Only we are bound in charity to conclude that the Adept Guru knows no more than his ingenuous disciple about Buddhism; otherwise the misuse of familiar terms—Arhat, Karma, Nirvana, and the like—would deserve to be qualified by a word too severe to apply to the ready faith and light-hearted assurance of his candid if not over-wise disciple."

This is unkind. If Mr. Kiddle is not wrong in his facts, Koot-Humi seems to be acquainted with the literature of the West, so far at least as to have perused one number at any rate of the Banner of Light, and to have adopted some part of its contents, and incorporated Mr. Kiddle's ideas into Esoteric Buddhist teaching. That seems a more serious contribution to the discussion than the St. James's flippant sneers about "artificial fifth rounders" working on through endless corkscrew gyrations, sevens by sevens, to a Nirvana of "ineffable catalepsis."

I have received Part II. of the second volume of "Facts" published in Boston, U.S.A. It contains some thirty or forty detailed narratives of various manifestations of spirit-power. These are authenticated by the name of the contributor, and are published by the Editor on that authority. I do not understand that he pursues the method of personal sifting which the Literary Committee of the Society for Psychical Research uniformly adopt. Beside these records there are various short articles and some extracts. Among these latter it is surprising to find a long excerpt from Oahspe, which can hardly come, I should have thought, under the head of "Facts." The Society for Psychical Research is favourably noticed, and some extracts are given from its Proceedings as quoted in the Spiritual Record.

No. 4 of this last-named magazine fully sustains the tone of the preceding numbers. It contains a striking account of a materialisation séance with Mr. Bastian, which is a model of what such records should be. The facts are worth record, and they are worthily recorded; being in these respects a contrast to many unimportant and trivial occurrences which are often so loosely recorded as to be doubly valueless. The striking testimony of the Earls of Dunraven is continued. These records are rare and scarce, being printed for private circulation only, and their reproduction is a distinct gain. Mrs. A. M. Howitt-Watts contributes some excellent matter; and a kindly review of "Spirit-Teachings," for which my acknowledgments are due, places the book favourably before the readers of the Record.

Mr. Denovan writes to complain of the notice of his "Evidences of Spiritualism" which I contributed to "LIGHT," on April 21st. I have refreshed my memory by a reperusal of the remarks I then made, and I have also referred again to the passage in Mr. Denovan's book. Mr. Denovan's special desire is that the medium should be exonerated from any imputation of fraud. If he will re-peruse my remarks he will see that I made none: and if what I said seems to him susceptible of any such construction, I will at once put aside any such reading of my criticism. My object was other than that which Mr. Denovan fancies. I have now been occupied for a long time in sifting the evidence for the materialisation of the full form, and, while I entertain no doubt that this phenomenon occurs frequently, and under conditions that leave no doubt of its reality, I am also convinced that the term materialisation is often misapplied to such a case as that recorded by Mr. Denovan. There, as he tells us, and as I stated in my remarks, "the unconscious medium" was discovered by the light of a vivid flash of lightning, "passing round the circle with King's light in his hand, and some drapery on the front of his body." Now, to apply the term materialisation to such a case is as misleading as to talk of conscious fraud on the part of an unconscious medium. I believe that the invisible operators often use "the unconscious medium" in this way. For that reason among others I have consistently protested against a medium being placed in a position where such trickery is possible. For, unconscious though experienced investigators may deem him, it is certain that he would, in the opinion of the mass of persons, be compelled to bear the blame of what they would call a piece of imposture. This risk it is the duty of those who know what the manifestations sometimes are, to protect him from. My aim was to enforce this: and also to protest (I hope not unfairly) against the loose use of terms which Mr. Denovan is repeatedly guilty of. For instance, in his comments on the case, he tells us that it was subsequent to certain other phenomena that "the materialisations seemed to centre on the medium." As a matter of fact, there was no materialisation or form-manifestation at all, but only a use of the body of the entranced medium, which was none the less calculated to mislead, because he was, as Mr. Denovan says, unconscious of what was being done. Mr. Denovan will see that the proof of such a phenomenon as materialisation must be unimpeachable; and this is all that I desire to secure. I am too fully conscious of the very difficult task imposed on a medium by the conditions under which our folly often places him, to cast any imputation of conscious fraud, except on distinct proof. Others, however, will not always be so scrupulous.

"The Editor of 'LIGHT' is out of town," and in the last number are some misprints which are too good to go unnoticed. In the extracts from my "Spirit-Teachings" which close the exhaustive and appreciative notice for which I am so greatly indebted to my kindly Reviewer, Imperator is made to say that the regenerated spirit in dealing with man would not "cut down the veriest cucumber" instead of cumberer, of the ground! In a short note at the foot of p. 389, George Fox, the Quaker, is credited with the foundation of a "line of occultists and mediums extending to the present day"! These, however, are errors that only amuse, and are in strong contrast to the exceptional accuracy which admittedly characterises the printing of this journal.

MR. GERALD MASSEY AT ST. GEORGE'S HALL.—To some people, who are apt to imagine that London is empty when they are not there, Mr. Gerald Massey's venture in lecturing during the month of September will appear as desperate as Captain Webb's last swim. And many of us who cannot attend the lectures must regret that the time chosen is exactly when, as the saying is, "everybody is out of town." Mr. Massey was not free, however, to take the platform until he had finished his twelve years' work, the last sheet of which, we learn, is now in the printer's hands. This was the sole time possible for the lectures, and the only month in which St. George's Hall could be had, so his friends and supporters must just make the best of unfavourable circumstances. London is a place of many people, and Mr. Massey's is not an unknown name. To repeat a paragraph which appeared in "LIGHT" some weeks since, "The usefulness and activity of the years 1874-78, was clearly traceable to a course of lectures delivered in 1872 by Mr. Gerald Massey, at St. George's Hall. Then, as now, there was a spirit of inquiry abroad, and those meetings were very largely attended by the general public, and were the means of inducing many to investigate Spiritualism. We hope that the new era of activity upon which we are seemingly entering will tend to similar useful results." There are especial reasons known to Spiritualists why so fundamental an explorer as Mr. Massey should be heard at the present time. His first lecture emphasises the original difference between Esoteric Buddhism and current Spiritualism, in an examination of the primitive physics which underlie and account for so much modern metaphysics that is at present playing tricks with the ancient symbolism. Mr. Massey also propounds the theory that what has been labelled the Phallic Religion did not begin with a worship of the powers of generation, but that the imagery found about the world and reaching right back to the Paleolithic age, proves the Primitive Man to have been burying his dead with the idea of rising again,—the natural imagery of reproduction in this life being repeated symbolically in denoting the reproduction and resurrection for another; and that the burial customs shew this idea to have been dominant over death some 50,000 years ago.—The subject for next Sunday is announced as "Man in Search of His Soul During 50,000 Years." The lecture will commence at three o'clock

MINISTERING SPIRITS.

"Are they not all ministering spirits sent forth to minister?"

No. 1.

A Youthful Angel Instructs and Comforts a Poor Widow.*

On the 25th of May, 1829, three days after the Feast of Ascension, about noon-day, went the widow of Thomas Felgers, of Schorndorf, fifty-eight years of age, to her plot of land to hoe potatoes.

About half-past twelve, by which time she had hoed several rows, there came to her a young girl, who might have been about fourteen years old, dressed in a loose black-cotton blouse, a short petticoat, a large white collar, a fine white apron, white stockings and nice, clean shoes. Her hair, which she wore without any band or comb, was shining and tastefully arranged. Her countenance was white as snow, her cheeks, however, rosy. She came up to the widow, and placing herself right in front of her, said: "God help thee! Art thou hoeing?" "I am turning up the ground," said the widow. "That is pretty much the same thing," returned the girl; and looked upwards and around her in such wise that the widow inquired, "Is she looking for some one? Or is she looking for a plot of land?" "No," returned the girl. "I am seeking no one; what I find here pleases me." Saying which she looked intently at the widow, and pointed up to Heaven. Then added:—"You need not say she,† for we have all of us a higher Lord above us to whom we all say, 'Our Father which is in Heaven,'—and we who believe in Jesus Christ are brothers and sisters in Him."

Having said this, she seated herself on the next plot of ground, and said:—"Why art thou so alone? How is it with thee?"

Then answered the widow:—"Since I have been a widow it has gone very hard with me. I was a long time ill, that cost me a lot of money, so that I cannot manage to borrow any; I can only save." "Thou must not take on so," replied the girl, "neither lament so much over the sickness and the expense; that has been a gracious call from God to thee, and it will bring thee far more happiness and blessing than thou knowest of. The dear Lord God is giving thee strength; be ever grateful to Him; sing and pray industriously; and only hope in Him. He will help thee out of thy trouble." She then shewed her how faithfully God had led her so far, and said:—"Do give thanks to the Guardian of thy life; has He not, indeed, led thee in safety until now? What thankfulness comes when one has wept till one can weep no more! Then one's heart is like a house within which the sun shines! Then, indeed, does the heart rejoice, for what has been emptied, the comfort of God fills once more. This is all pure love in the Saviour, who wishes to draw thee to Himself. Only remain firm, and do not falter. Now we will sing together a song in praise of God, 'Praise the Lord, the Mighty King of Glory.'"

The widow observed that she could not sing well enough. She would prefer that the young girl should sing. She would prefer to listen.

"All right," returned the girl; "only you must listen very attentively."

She then sang the hymn in a very sweet manner; all the time with her countenance up-raised towards the sky, as though she beheld there the form of her Saviour. Then she said to the widow—"I perceive that thou art very bashful; thou indeed dost not know me; if only thou didst but know the home from whence I come, thou wouldst be much more cheerful. But thou mayst converse with me, just as though the dear Saviour Himself stood near. But I cannot quite reveal myself to thee, for thou art still too weak."

She then spoke to her of the Ascension of our Redeemer, and said how He had made a road for us, and prepared a mansion; and how already this was a great and joyful festival for us on earth; but that in Heaven it was still more joyfully celebrated. She then explained the significance of the prayer for Ascension Day in the Prayer-book, and sang the hymn, "Jesus heavenwards ascendeth."

The widow observed how much she should like to celebrate this festival in Heaven. "Only remain faithful," replied the young girl, "and patiently and willingly endure whatsoever the Lord God sees fit to send thee, whilst thou dost remain here below—and there will always, until the end, be something to endure; in that way thou wilt come the sooner to enjoy the festival in Heaven. But, indeed, everywhere this beautiful festival may be celebrated—grace can be given in all places."

The widow, however, replied that her cares left her no peace; she was for ever thinking what was to become of her, now that she was so very weak and could earn so very little.

Answered the young girl: "So soon as the cares come, at once fall down upon thy knees and raise heart, lips, and hands towards God, and always walk in the commandments of God." From the hymn, "Raise, O my soul! thy thoughts above," she repeated the five last verses, and continued to speak as follows: "Thou must not deter thyself from singing by the belief that thou canst not sing well; thou must both sing and pray to the Redeemer when thou art alone. He requires no fine speaking. He is pleased with the prattle of children: only let thy heart always be turned towards God."

She pointed out to her in Starkes' Prayer-book the first eight verses of the hymn, "Ah, now, how strong is the conflict!" To the verse, "Behold the crown placed on my brow." And out of the book itself she sang: "Jesus remains my comfort;" and what she thus sang, she also explained to her.

As the widow continued to move on, row by row, in her hoeing of the potatoes, the young girl accompanied her, and gazed cheerfully into her face, saying: "Thou must pay attention to what I sing, and look all out again in the book at home, as well as thou art able."

It was a puzzle to the widow why the girl remained so long with her, seeing that she appeared to have no occupation in the field; and she could not exactly make out whether she were a real earthly person or a spirit: for a sort of awe and fear crept over her.

The girl sang several more hymns out of the old hymn-book: "Rejoice, O soul, that thou must bear thy Saviour's yoke!" "All is good that my God willeth." And "Jesus beloved; Jesus faithful ever."

Never before had the widow heard such sweet singing as this of the young girl. From the new hymn-book she also sang, "Unto Thee, O Father! take my heart"; and the two first verses of the hymn, "The Lord He calleth me," she explained; then sang "The Lord He calleth thee; to Him be faithful unto death."

Towards the evening the widow made the remark that had she only known that she should have had company, she would have brought bread with her, to which the girl smilingly replied, "that she stood in no need of food, since the Kingdom of God was neither eating nor drinking, but righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. Thou wouldst not have been able," added she, "to have done thy work unless thou hadst been strengthened from above. Ah! how great is the love of Jesus to thee, since He is accustomed to give thee His cup to drink, for what is good to Him should also be good to thee. It is my greatest joy to give life to a troubled soul.* Now," said the girl, "is the time of evening-rest come."

* Observe that the girl here speaks as if the Lord spoke through her as His medium, as once before. There is a wonderful mystical character in all the words of the girl. As in the case of various of the saints in the Roman Catholic Church through her spirit the indwelling Saviour appears to shine forth like a light through the globe of a lamp.

* Translated for "LIGHT" from "Blätter aus Prevorst."

† A mode of address which implied a marked difference in rank.

"Yes," replied the widow; upon which the girl began to sing:

"How sweet reposing after toil,
Peace after care and earthly toil."

Then rose up and sang—

"Now to our home must I away,
Arise! ascend to perfect day!
Comfort to many a heart we bring,
To all hearts who adore our King."

It was now seven o'clock in the evening, and the girl rose up to go; the widow accompanied her till they came to the place where several ways met, and at a cottage she took her leave, saying, "Now, God have thee in His charge. I am going the way of all the world; and thou art going into thy rest." She then passed on between two rows of trees quickly up a steep hill, between the Otellen-berg and Röhrenwald wood. At length she appeared to become quite shining, and was lost from the sight of the widow.

This narrative was, as recounted by the widow herself, put upon record a few days after the apparition, as here given. The story was on the lips of everyone when the writer of this came to Schorndorf, in the beginning of September, 1823.* The story aroused his curiosity, and he determined to inquire further into the matter. He went to the widow, and found her a retiring, honest, simple woman, with a clear, open glance. Public opinion regarding her was, that she was a woman of a retired, quiet, industrious nature, in whom no instance of extravagant enthusiasm had ever been observed, and deception was considered quite foreign to her disposition. The writer of this, so far as he is aware, being perfectly impartial, requested her to repeat to him the account of her experience on several occasions, both as a whole and in parts; he sought to entangle her by unexpected questions, and to lead her to contradict herself. But he found, as a result, that not alone did she never contradict herself, but that she never forgot anything, unless it were occasionally that the detail was not related in exactly the same order.

Also he ascertained that this appearance had repeated itself frequently since the 25th of May, a circumstance which she had mentioned to no one else. About twelve o'clock a form appeared and shewed itself to her near her bed in the room in which she slept alone. A fine, transparent, ethereal form, as if wrapt in a veil of light, of great beauty, in which she thought she could recognise the features of the young girl seen in the field. She was called by her Christian name; and when she had quite wakened up from sleep, the conversation was carried on by the spirit-form much as before; good things were taught and explained; hymns were sung to her and explained, and she was ever more tenderly exhorted to be enduring and trusting. It was especially told her that all this was repeated, because this intercourse would not always continue, and that she was now only permitted to come, because what had been taught on the first occasion was not fully remembered.

The writer inquired whether the widow had never questioned the spirit. She said, "No," that she never had had the courage to ask anything. He requested her, however, if the spirit again appeared, to put to her a few questions.

This occurred on September 8th, at eleven o'clock at night. After having called the widow, as usual, with a beating-heart the question was asked: "Who art thou?"

"I am a Ministering-spirit sent to enlighten thee, and to comfort thee in thy weakness." To this the spirit added several holy texts, which were appropriate to her needs. Especially did she enjoin upon her reading the Bible as source of all consolation and instruction.

The widow was now instructed to address several more questions to the spirit when next she should appear. On the following night the familiar form once more appeared before the widow's bed.

* The writer is believed to be Dr. Kerner.

When she had been called by her name, the woman asked "Wherefore this appearance had come especially to her?"

"Because," she replied, "especially didst thou require this, through the great need in thy conflicts." Then did the spirit console the poor widow and assured her that her sins were forgiven; "but," added the spirit, "remain firm in the Word of God, and exercise thyself in it. God," added she, "had seen her struggle and wished to comfort her."

Another question which she asked was: "Whether such apparitions are needful for the blessedness of a soul?" The spirit replied, "Who truly believes in Christ is blessed: only such as struggle in despair need such visions." But now, the spirit told the widow, that "she must sing, and pray, and proceed along the path of God."

The last question put by the widow was "Might she mention her experiences to other people?"

"Certainly she might do so," was the reply, "to souls who had been in struggle and temptation; BUT ON NO ACCOUNT TO PERSONS WHO WOULD TURN ALL INTO RIDICULE."

Again the spirit exhorted the widow to perseverance and endurance, making use of various texts from the Bible and verses from hymns. After this the spirit did not again appear during the writer's sojourn in Schorndorf.

"The writer visited with the peasant woman the scene of the first apparition, in order upon the spot, to test the accuracy of her account. He saw the places where the spirit had stood; where she had taken leave: and had very carefully pointed out to him the spot where, as a form of light, the spirit had vanished. The woman's account was always firm and decided. On the way, as the writer penetrated more into the confidence of the poor woman, she gave the following fuller explanation of her mental necessities.

"In her very early years, she, whilst at school, had greatly wished to be permitted to write with red ink. Not knowing how she should procure red ink she cut her finger and wrote in her blood her name upon a small sheet of paper. Whilst doing this she became alarmed and immediately left off writing, and thought no more at the time of the sheet of paper. Years later she had read in an old book that if the name of a person written in their own blood happens to fall into the possession of the devil he can obtain possession of their soul! With the weight of lead this youthful deed now lay upon her heart. Ever since which time, so terrible an anguish had rested upon her soul that she had considered herself unworthy to take the Sacrament and fully believed that her soul was lost utterly. She had never dared to confess her misery to any human being. Her misery had reached its height when this spirit had appeared to her, and brought her consolation."

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.—A meeting of the Council of this Association will be held at 6.30, on Tuesday evening next, at 38, Great Russell-street. As there will be some important matters for consideration it is hoped that all member of the Council who can do so, will make a point of attending.

Those of our readers, and they are not a few, who have seen Mr. Cornelius Pearson's beautiful water colour drawings, which he has often so generously lent for the gratification of visitors to the soirées of the B. N. A. S. and Central Associations, will be pleased to learn that he is now sojourning at Eastbourne where he proposes to spend his annual vacation among artistic and Spiritualist friends. He will find in both Old and New Eastbourne, in the glades of "Paradise," on the Duke of Devonshire's Estate, in the pretty village of Meads, in Hurstmonceux and Pevensey Castles, the stupendous cliffs, and Beachy Head, ample scope for the exercise of his graceful and industrious pencil. Many of Mr. Pearson's friends consider some of his latest drawings amongst his very best.

Mr. Rutherford's Dream.

From "The Antiquary," Note D., p. 66.

Mr. Rutherford, of Bowland, a gentleman of landed property in the vale of Gala, was prosecuted for a very considerable sum, the accumulated arrears of teind (or tithe), for which he was said to be indebted to a noble family, the titulars (lay improPRIATORS of the tithes). Mr. Rutherford was strongly impressed with the belief that his father had, by a form of process peculiar to the law of Scotland, purchased these lands from the titular, and, therefore, that the present prosecution was groundless. But after an industrious search among his father's papers, an investigation of the public records, and a careful inquiry among all persons who had transacted law-business for his father, no evidence could be recovered to support his defence. The period was now at hand when he conceived the loss of his law-suit to be inevitable, and he had formed his determination to ride to Edinburgh next day and make the best bargain he could in the way of compromise.

"He went to bed with this resolution, and with all the circumstances of the case floating in his mind. In dreams men are not surprised at such apparitions as appear in them. Mr. Rutherford thought that he informed his father of the cause of his distress, adding that the payment of a considerable sum of money was the more unpleasant to him, because he had a strong consciousness that it was not due, though he was unable to recover any evidence in support of his belief. 'You are right, my dear son,' replied the paternal shade; 'I did acquire right to these teinds, for payment of which you are now prosecuted. The papers relating to the transaction are in the hands of Mr. —, a writer (or attorney), who is now retired from professional business, and resides at Inveresk, near Edinburgh. He was a person whom I employed on that occasion for a particular reason, but who never on any other occasion transacted business on my account. It is very possible,' pursued the vision, 'that Mr. — may have forgotten a matter which is now of a very old date; but you may call it to his recollection by this token, that when I came to pay his account, there was difficulty in getting change for a Portugal piece of gold, and that we were forced to drink out the balance at a tavern.'

"Mr. Rutherford awakened in the morning with all the words of the vision imprinted on his mind, and thought it worth while to ride across the country to Inveresk, instead of going straight to Edinburgh. When he came there he waited on the gentleman mentioned in the dream, a very old man. Without saying anything of the vision, he inquired whether he remembered having conducted such a matter for his deceased father. The old gentleman could not at first bring the circumstance to his recollection, but on mention of the Portugal piece of gold the whole returned upon his memory. He made an immediate search for the papers, and recovered them; so that Mr. Rutherford carried to Edinburgh the documents necessary to gain the cause which he was on the verge of losing.

"The author has often heard this story told by persons who had the best access to know the facts, who were not likely themselves to be deceived, and were certainly incapable of deception. He cannot, therefore, refuse to give it credit, however extraordinary the circumstances may appear.

"It may be added that this remarkable circumstance was attended with bad consequences to Mr. Rutherford, whose health and spirits were afterwards impaired by the attention which he thought himself obliged to pay to the visions of the night."

An Unacceptable Ghost.

Notes to "Rokeby."

Note G., p. 24. (Poetical Works of Scott, edited by Rev. George Gillilan, Edinburgh. James Nichol, 1857.)

"How whistle rash bids tempests roar."

"That this is a general superstition is well known to all who have been on shipboard, or who have conversed with seamen. The most formidable whistler that I remember to have met with was the apparition of a certain Mrs. Leaky, who, about 1636, resided, we are told, at Minehead, in Somerset, where her only son drove a considerable trade between that port and Waterford, and was owner of several vessels. This old gentlewoman was of a social disposition, and so acceptable to her friends, that they used to say to her and to each other it were pity such an excellent, good-natured old lady should die; to which she was wont to reply, that whatever pleasure they might find in her company just now, they would not greatly like to see or converse with her after death, which, nevertheless, she was apt to think might happen. Accordingly, after her death and funeral, she began to appear to various persons by night and by noonday, in her own house, in the town and fields, at sea and upon shore. So far had she departed from her former urbanity that she is recorded to have kicked a doctor of medicine for his impolite negligence in omitting to hand her over a stile. It was her humour to appear in the same garb and likeness as when she was alive, and standing at the mainmast, would blow with a whistle, and though it were never so great a calm, yet immediately there would arise a most dreadful storm, that would break, wreck and drown ship and goods. When she had thus proceeded until her son had neither credit to freight a vessel nor could have procured men to sail, she began to attack the persons of his family, and actually strangled their only child in her cradle. The rest of the story shewing how the spectre looked over the shoulder of her daughter-in-law while dressing her hair at a looking-glass; and how Mrs. Leaky the younger took courage to address her; and how the beldame despatched her to an Irish prelate famous for his crimes and misfortunes to exhort him to repentance and to apprise him that otherwise he would be hanged; and how the bishop was satisfied with replying that if he was born to be hanged, he should not be drowned—all these, with many more particulars, may be found at the end of one of John Dunton's publications, called Athenianism, London, 1710, where the tale is engrossed under the title of The Apparition Evidence."

SPIRIT IDENTITY.

Some years ago I had a most remarkable case of spirit identity with Mrs. A. (about whom Mrs. Howitt Watts wrote lately in "LIGHT").

I was staying with her, and one evening she, her husband, and I were sitting round the fire chatting, when she suddenly turned to me, and said: "There is a female spirit here for you. She has passed away many, many years, but I have never seen her before. She holds up something in her hands like a tiny pair of spectacles. If you repeat the alphabet you will get a message." I began immediately, and went slowly through the alphabet, and, when nearly at the end, I got W, and so on until I had the following: "Why have you not, Myri?" I went on and on for ten minutes, getting no other letter, and I was utterly puzzled. At last N G came, and I exclaimed, "Oh! Mrs. Grattan!" when a tiny round table, close to my side, began to dance in an excited manner, and gave knocks for the alphabet again, and I had the following given to me: "I wish you to wear my ring, for I seem to see your eyes through it. You were more than a sister to me in that day of trouble." This was a dear old friend of mine, who had died in my arms in 1844—and of whom I had not thought for years. She had left me a ring, which she always wore, and for her sake I had worn it till my knuckles swelled from rheumatism, and I had been obliged to leave it off—this was before I had the pleasure of knowing Mrs. A., who had neither seen nor heard of it, yet her description of it was correct in every particular, proving that she was looking at it. There are two good-sized diamonds set round with very small emeralds, and a small space between each diamond, so that the ring did look like spectacles. A. S.

WALSALL.—A correspondent, after paying a visit to this town, writes that the Society there is "quite active and flourishing."

ROCHDALE.—Mr. Peter Lee, writing from this town, says:—"We are getting on very nicely here. There is a spirit of inquiry abroad, and private circles are becoming rapidly more numerous. Investigating circles at our meeting-room are also objects of attraction, and the phenomena are interesting alike to inquirers and those who are already satisfied of the fact of spirit communion. Mr. C. Groom, of Birmingham, will visit Rochdale on September 16th."

ON THE PHENOMENA OF MATERIALISATION.

By DR. CHAZARAIN.

(From the August number of Le Spiritisme, Paris.)

The exterior of a spirit is fluidic, ordinarily invisible, but capable of becoming, under certain conditions, and en rapport with, or in the sphere of, some mediums, visible, and of exhibiting will and action. Such have been, without doubt, the apparitions of which the world has so many verified records, and such are those so numerous manifesting themselves of late years in Europe and America.

What account can science give of such transformation of ethereal into material bodies? There are many phenomena which science admits and utilises, but which it cannot at present explain; take for example the attraction of iron by the magnet.

There is an analogy between the phenomena of materialisation and the effects of compression and cold upon vapours and gases; the effects of the electric spark upon certain mixtures of gases, in inducing the formation of certain liquid and solid bodies; and those of an electric current in precipitating or decomposing salts from certain solutions and transferring them to other determinate bodies.

A rationale of the phenomenon presents itself to my mind thus:—The spirit whose seeks to materialise himself, having placed himself in the sphere of the medium, interpenetrates him with his magnetic fluid, which returns to the spirit in a continuous circular current charged with living molecules from the medium's organism, and which are transferred to the spirit's fluidic body, analogously to the electric current, in the operation of galvanoplastic gilding and silvering, carrying to the saline solution the metallic particles to be transferred to the bodies to be gilt or silvered. The diminution of the weight of the medium in the spirit's operation might thus be accounted for.

In the varied Temple-Spiritualism of the Ancients such materialisations formed part of the greater mysteries reserved to the higher priests, and to which none could be admitted until after long study, preparation, and passing through various stages of initiation.

Modern Spiritualists, however, being in accord with the present age, renounce keeping knowledge to themselves—knowledge which they have acquired by patient observation, experimentation, and study,—and which they believe will aid in solving obscure problems in physical science, mental philosophy, sociology and medicine.

This phenomenon of spirit-materialisation has been amply verified. In England the eminent William Crookes obtained in London numerous photographs of a well materialised spirit. In America it has frequently been witnessed and testified to by numerous well-instructed and careful investigators. In France it has been testified to by many whose evidence is unimpeachable.

There are difficulties, however, in the way of witnessing it, on the one hand from the rarity of the peculiar kind of medium required; and on the other from the negating action of light in the operation.

Of the mediums for the phenomenon among us in Paris, some have been developed spontaneously; others under the direction of their spirit-guides. They are in various stages of development. The best of them known to me is Madame Bablin. This medium's sances in February, 1882, when I first knew her, were held without light. The spirits manifested their presence by rapping sounds, and by touches of their materialised hands. After a time the hands became visible by a light of their own. After a few months more, their entire forms could be made out by a pale light emanating from themselves. Some of the circle recognised thus departed relatives and friends. I myself recognised several; among them were children, who touched and embraced me. These phenomena were witnessed by me not only at the medium's, but in my own house, and in the houses of friends, with her as medium.

But some of the constant investigators with me were desirous to continue their observations, under such conditions as would render pointless suggestions—which were not wanting—of deception or collusion, and so we arranged with the medium to have a special series of sances. This series commenced February, 1883, under the following conditions:—A cabinet was extemporised by enclosing a corner of the room with a pair of curtains hanging to the floor from a curtain-rod fixed near the ceiling. In this triangular space a chair was placed, on which the medium seated herself, after passing through the searching hands of a committee of ladies. She was then well bound with broad tape and fixed immovably in the chair, which was then secured to the floor. By the side of the medium was a small table, on which were placed a musical box—the weight of which was ten kilogrammes—a hand-bell, a fan, paper and pencil. In the opposite corner of the room was another table, on which was a lighted lamp, shielded by cylinder within cylinder of tissue paper, shedding a mild light sufficient to enable us to recognise each other. All being thus arranged, we closed the curtains and sat in a semi-circle in front of, and a few paces from, the curtains, all holding hands; and presently our ears informed us that the medium had passed into the sleep of trance.

Then rapping sounds came, the bell rang, and the musical box played. Presently this emerged from between the curtains, resting on the finger-tips of a hand. Then one of the curtains was drawn aside revealing the form of the spirit holding the box, clad in a large-sleeved white robe. He advanced a little, holding to him the curtain with his free hand, as if doubtful of the effect of the light upon his form. After a little he let the curtain go, and asked through the mouth of the medium for more light. This we furnished by removing one of the tissue paper cylinders enclosing the lamp. Seeming to find that he bore it well, he moved about in the space between us and the curtains, the musical box playing in his hand, placing it at request on our heads and shoulders, spoke with the direct voice, touched some of us with his hand, patted and shook hands with others. Such were the phenomena at our first sance under the condition of light.

At subsequent sances under the same conditions, other forms manifested themselves, male and female, sometimes children; at one a male form held an infant in his arms, and finally placed it on the knees of a lady in the circle, Madame F. A week before she had laid in the grave the body of her infant, six weeks old. In her lap she also found two chaplets which had been placed on the child's grave.

At two of the sances the spirit, as if to shew his objectivity, lifted the little table from its place, and put it in our midst with noise; as he withdrew into the cabinet he held the curtains apart, and enabled us to see him and the medium at the same time.

At our next sance the spirit, after being in our midst some time, passed behind the curtains, and immediately returned with a handful of roses; these he distributed with much ceremony, waving each gift over his head before gracefully bowing and presenting it. At the sance following, this same spirit came forward with the musical box playing in one hand, and pointing at it with the other; then replacing it, he returned, passed before each of us, touched or shook hands with some, and embraced M. Deshayes; then withdrawing as if to recruit his force, he returned, approached a lady, Madame Nögrath, took her hand, led her gracefully about, and then back to her seat. Then after moving to and fro alone for a little while, he parted the curtains, pointed to the medium in her chair, gracefully inclined himself, and let the curtains fall. Then an aged woman came out, who took paper from the table, but made signs that there was no pencil; one was handed to her. She partly withdrew behind one of the curtains, and, kneeling, laid the paper on the floor and wrote something; then rose, pointed to the writing, let the paper fall, and disappeared. On the paper was written, "My friends I love you, and will often come to you.—Florence Hannecourt;" then followed the names "Paul, André, Charles, Maurice."

The medium informed us that Florence Hannecourt was her mother's name. The other names were of spirits known to different members of the circle.

Before concluding I must mention a striking phenomenon which had occurred at three of our sances. At their conclusion we found the medium's jacket, which buttoned in front, had been turned inside out, and was accurately buttoned inside while on her. Our attention could not but be drawn to it by the lining being of a bright red colour.

REMARKABLE SEANCES.

It is a good idea—that originated by my esteemed friend, Mrs. S. (the widow of Colonel S. whose brother was one of the men of mark of the century): it may be useful, and certainly will be interesting to print, or to reprint, some of the earlier records of remarkable "sittings." That lady proposes to give some; I can give several: other of your readers may thus contribute to your pages valuable matter.

Foster who was in London, in 1861, several times at my house, visited us and our friends. I find among papers left by Mrs. S. C. Hall a record of one of these sittings. It is at your service if you like to print it. I may follow it up by tendering to you other statements of a similar character—probably of greater interest.—Truly yours,

S. HALL.

A Seance with Mr. Foster in 1861.

Mr. Foster told us to arrange ourselves just as we liked around the table. Soon after we were seated, raps were heard on different parts of the table, more or less loud and distinct. Mr. Foster then said there was a spirit standing between Mr. and Mrs. Hall—described her, and said she wished to give her name. Mr. Hall then pointed to letters on a printed alphabet, and "Elizabeth Barrett Browning" was spelled out. Afterwards

"Charlotte"—again the alphabet, and "Bronte" was written—exact facsimile of the earthly signatures. Then he said a spirit was close—"mother." Whose mother? She wished to give her initials. Mr. Foster then bared his arm, and S. E. F. was written in large red letters on it, in her accustomed style, which was peculiar (he not knowing either her name, or anything concerning any of the family. Mrs. S. E. F. was the mother of Mr. S. C. Hall). Then Mr. Fairholt said he would like to think of some dead friend. (Mr. Fairholt was a distinguished author of several art books.) Mr. Foster told him to write six or seven Christian or surnames on tiny slips of paper, and the right name among them, not telling him, or anyone, which it was. This Mr. Fairholt did, folded each piece separately himself, and placed them in a heap on a table in front of him. He then took up one pellet after another, and the spirit knocked when he touched the right one; that he opened and found the name he had had in his mind; this was done several other times. Mr. Fairholt's "dead" father's and mother's names were given correctly (they were German s); his father's occupation when in life was stated, and the place where his mother died—all correctly, and all unknown to any but Mr. Fairholt himself. Fannie then wrote several names (telling them to none), and among them put her own mother's maiden name—mixed it with the rest; she then mentally asked her mother's spirit to separate the slip of paper containing the name, which was done immediately—Mr. Foster meanwhile asking different questions of other spirits at the other end of the table. Mr. Foster then asked a spirit if he could write the middle name of Mr. Fairholt's father, and the allusive three knocks being given, he put a tiny piece of pencil not an inch long, between two small slips of paper, pinched together at one end, and holding it about three seconds under the table with one hand: three quick knocks proclaimed it written—and there was the middle name of old Mr. Fairholt, written to his son's satisfaction. Several things of the same sort were done as regards each of the party, and once again initials, mentally asked for, were written on the medium's bare arm, and in the ordinary style of the spirit's hand when on earth. Fannie was then desired by the spirit of her grandmother to place her handkerchief close to her feet, under the table—other manifestations went on, and in about five minutes she was told that she must get up and open the drawing-room door: this she did. Presently Mr. Foster seemed agitated, and starting up, evidently under spiritual compulsion, came towards her, held out his hand, which she took, and by gentle force and gestures led her out of the open door—down the long passage leading to the garden, and with excited movements pointed out something on the floor, close to the door of the passage, crying, "look! look!" and there she saw her handkerchief lying on the floor, knotted tightly in three places. It had been carried some nine or ten yards out of the room. Two or three messages were written, a spirit writing in Mrs. Hall's own hand, Mr. Foster not having anything to do with them. Also Mrs. Hall thought of a name, and wrote it with five or six others on slips of paper, rolled into tiny pellets; these she held in a cup under the table. In a few seconds the knocks proclaimed they had abstracted the pellet, and on raising her handkerchief it was found knotted tightly at one end, and on undoing the knot, the pellet was found inside it, with the name she had mentally wished for.

Three or four long messages were given all illustrative of the spirit's identity; unknown to the medium always, and unknown to anyone present except the mental inquirer.

The messages were given in a loving Christian spirit—the name of Christ mentioned—and the whole sance conducted with reverence and gravity.

HEAVEN, PERHAPS, NO FAR-OFF LAND.

"Tis said that when life is ended here,
The spirit is borne to a distant sphere;
That it visits its earthly home no more,
Nor looks on the haunts it loved before.
But why should the bodiless soul be sent Far off to a long, long banishment?
Talk not of the light and living green!
It will pine for the dear familiar scene,
It will yearn, in that strange bright world to behold
The rocks and the streams it knew of old.
'Tis a cruel creed, believe it not,
Death to the good is a milder lot."

Bryant must have been a Spiritualist or he could not have written the above.

TRANSITION OF DR. J. R. NEWTON.

(Abridged from the "Banner of Light.")

Dr. J. R. Newton, the acknowledged foremost disciple of the practice of healing by laying on of hands in the opening days of the Spiritual Dispensation, has just passed to spirit-life, aureoled with well-spent years, and the blessings of thousands who have been aided by him to the attainment of health during their mortal pilgrimage, and who, at receiving the intelligence of his decease, will speak of him in grateful terms.

The great healer passed to his reward on Tuesday, August 7th, 1883, at the ripe age of 73 years. He was in his usual state of health to within ten days of his transition. The swift and fatal disease which was finally the gate of his emergence from physical life, and under the effects of which he passed suddenly but peacefully away, was hemorrhage of the kidneys.

Funeral services, which were largely attended, were held at his late residence in New York City on Friday, August 10th, whereat Dr. James M. Peebles delivered an eloquent tribute to his memory, and Prof. J. R. Buchanan, Judge Nelson Cross, Dr. J. V. Mansfield, Mrs. Spence and others added appropriate remarks expressive of their deep and heartfelt appreciation of his life-work, and the lessons flowing out of what this wonderful man had accomplished during his stay in the mortal body.

Dr. Newton was from first to last unyielding in his devotion to Modern Spiritualism, and was ready at all times to acknowledge the puissant aid of attendant and ministering spirits, in his efforts to bless the suffering ones of earth. He was radical in his opinions on medical topics, and an uncompromising foe of vaccination, and held that a large proportion of surgical operations were really the infliction of wicked and useless torture and the remarkable results which accompanied his treatments bore out his assertions in a wonderful degree. It would be extremely difficult, if not impossible for the present generation of our readers to comprehend or realise the intense excitement which in Modern Spiritualism's earliest days he created among the members of the public at large, calling together as he did, wherever he went, crowds of seekers after health, which were composed of representatives of every class of society, every order of belief or non-belief, in every community visited and doing by his cures a tremendous amount of missionary work which has since borne abundant fruit for the spreading of the light among men.

His motto of life—the principle upon which his actions were based—finds clear expression in the words attributed to him by a New Orleans correspondent of a northern paper, when speaking of his departure from the Crescent City:—"Tell all your friends, and impress it upon their minds, that any person who will try to heal the sick by laying on of hands will never succeed if he lays his hands on the pockets of the poor."

"In 1858 Dr. Newton," says the biographer, "commenced practice as a public healer in Cincinnati, Ohio. 'He was here,' says a narrator, 'inaugurating a new method of curing disease, and encountered at first the usual amount of incredulity and scepticism attendant on the introduction of any new system; but proofs were too numerous and powerful to withstand even the strongest current of opposition, and all who saw were compelled to believe.' After performing some very remarkable cures, his fame and practice were so great that his rooms were daily crowded with invalids. The average number of patients treated by the Doctor, in these his first months of healing, was about 'one hundred a day.' The Press invariably gave favourable accounts, and cases of cures were cited to verify their statements."

Dr. Newton remained in Cincinnati some eighteen months, going next to Cleveland, where even greater success awaited him. He then launched out upon a course of beneficent labour extending through many years, and embracing in its sphere Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, Baltimore, New Haven, Hartford, Indianapolis, San Francisco, Washington, Savannah, New Orleans, and other of the principal cities and towns of the United States; he created the most profound excitement in Havana, Cuba, whether he had gone to rest, but whither, also, his fame had preceded him; he did wonderful work in London, Liverpool, Swindon, Birmingham, Maidstone, Halifax, Nottingham, Northampton, and others of the chief municipalities of England, on his second visit, in 1870, to that country (his first visit in 1864 being rendered abortive by that settlement of bigotry in high places, which he was called to face frequently in many of his fields of labour). Wherever he went, whether on this or on the other side of the Atlantic, his patients were drawn from every class in society, and he welcomed and relieved with equal joy and promptitude the poor in this world's goods or the prominent in the domains of statemanship, authorship, the histrionic art or business circles, who sought his presence.

Occasionally some could be found, like one female bigot in New England whose case stands recorded, who refused to be cured by him because she believed him to be inspired by the devil; but she was the loser, not the Doctor, and so were her imitators. Occasionally cases would arise where efforts would be made to call in the aid of the law to repress him, as was done in Baltimore, where certain merchants complained to the Mayor that his (Newton's) crowds of patients were blocking up the public thoroughfares, and asked that he be removed—but the worthy Mayor refused, alleging that "Dr. Newton is doing a vast amount of good to the poor, and shall not be disturbed." Once at least he was prosecuted for his good works, the instance being the action of the priest-ridden relatives of a patient in Philadelphia whom he had without pay really benefited, but who made allegations in her name to the contrary, claiming injury rather than benefit—but when the complaint came on for trial the injustice of the action was so transparent that even the District Attorney himself declared in court that there was "no case," and the jury returned at once a verdict of acquittal, the Doctor thus going forth unscathed from his struggle with a bigotry which sought to hide itself behind the forms of law.

The work done by Dr. Newton was of the most surprising and satisfactory nature, though of course he could not cure all cases brought into his beneficent presence. His power seemed to lie in being able to establish a subtle rapport between his own spiritual nature and that of a patient, whereby he was able to bestow in a measure commensurate with the completeness of that rapport the strength needed to remove the disturbance in the conditions of the physical organism under which that patient was suffering. Hence in such cases as were not helped, the individual failing to receive such aid contained (though perhaps unwittingly) within his or her own mental state the conditions inimical to the successful operation upon him or her of the Doctor's gifts. He was a powerful aid in yellow fever cases, he having lost none among the plague-stricken passengers treated by him on the Golden Gate, in 1853, while the ship's surgeon lost every patient but one that he attended; he relieved some of the most pronounced cases of blindness, paralysis, rheumatic affections and contractions, &c., &c., in the briefest periods of time, and in most instances without pain or expense to the patients. Hundreds of canes, and crutches, and curious surgical appliances were left behind in his possession by his relieved and grateful patients, as ocular and tangible demonstrations of their no longer needing their aid.

We have spoken of the innate generosity of Dr. Newton. There is every reason to think that not twenty persons out of one hundred he ever treated were called upon to pay for his services. Sometimes he turned the tables, and when unable to help a poor patient physically, he bestowed pecuniary aid upon him.

Everywhere Dr. Newton went, up to his life's latest day on earth, he won his way by kindly sympathy and superabundant merit into the affections and respect of the best people with whom he came in contact; his earnest zeal, his steadfast integrity, his overmastering generosity (which, despite the tremendous amount of labour he accomplished during his long and active life, prevented his accumulation of any great amount of worldly possessions), and his world-wide love for humanity. His worthy spirit has now passed to experiences new, and rewards well earned. Well may his stricken widow exclaim (as she did in her note informing us of his decease): "A noble human life has closed, and a glorious immortal life begun! When I think of the joys that now are his, I say to my saddened heart: Be still! Rejoice! Mourn not!"

Ideas of Supreme Deity.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—To attempt to controvert any opinion of the publishers of "Spirit Teachings" seems to my case as unsuitable as a dwarf lifting a lance against a giant; yet ever since Goliath's overthrow weak combatants have had excuse for hoping to effect something by their contemptible small missiles. In his strictures on the idea of a personal God—which, it must again be said, is only a stop-gap word, used because we have no other for exactly expressing what is meant—this writer seems to me to confound ideas of the being of God with ideas of His manifestation. As to what the Source of all existence is, apart from what He makes known to the finite creatural mind, surely every sane person must be an Agnostic; the absolute and unconditional cannot possibly be defined or comprehended by the conditioned and limited intelligence of man. But the contention of a Christian is that, whereas professed Agnostics declare that they have got no farther in their conceptions of Deity than the Athenians who worshipped the Unknown God in the time of St. Paul, he accepts and rejoices in the revelation of Jesus Christ. N.B.—a re-veiling of truth [not the entire opening of a mystery which no mortal man can even proximately fathom] under a fresh aspect of conceivable ideas. As the loving Father of spirits, Jesus Christ represented to us the character of the Supreme Being with whom we have to do; and, using His words, we who accept this revelation say to those who are so ill-satisfied with it as to seek out their God in nature:—"Ye worship ye know not what; we know what we worship." And though I fully share "Imperator's" dislike of a text being used in place of an argument, I must refer to one (Rom. viii. 15), for I find the seal of the truth of the revelation of Jesus Christ in the ineradicable instincts of the human heart, which, in everyone, betrays the "spirit of adoption whereby we cry Abba, Father." A cry which, in some form or other, bursts spontaneously from every heart—whatever the head may think—when need is sudden, or anguish dismaying, and no fellow creature can avail to help.

Dread of an anthropomorphic representation of God appears to be grounded on two mistaken notions; first, that an incarnate manifestation of infinite life dishonours the idea of God by its restrictions, though at a far lower level, we never for a moment think of our own visible personality as an equivalent for the being of which it reveals a very small part. There was light before the sun existed, but for our group of worlds that concentration, and no doubt abatement, of supernal heat and light was an essential mediator—at once a conductor, and a visible sign of unseen intensities of both, which no creature in those worlds could feel and live. The incarnate Word of God is thus the sun of our spiritual universe; we do not suppose that it communicates or represents to us all that there is in the God of Gods, but all that we are capable of knowing.

And, secondly, when anthropomorphic conceptions of God are rejected as childish and lowering, is it not from total ignorance of what true and original humanity was?—ignorance which nothing seen on earth now can testify.

If anything is believed of the Biblical account of man's beginnings as a creature, it must be allowed that in some sufficient sense he was made in the likeness of God. Is it not perverse if, believing this, we refuse to think any correspondence of nature possible between the original and the copy?

What peace or safety for man from being in harmony with the laws of nature!—laws that lead animals to fight savagely for their prey, to trample down the weak, and leave the suffering unpitied and unhelped, to destroy or cherish life with equal serenity—even in his present, far removed from original glory? The instincts of man are nobler, his standard of good higher than we can detect in nature—nature over which he was destined to rule, which he has made low enough to be obliged to combat as a rival.

"God we know in our image indeed, since we are in the image of Him,

Of His splendour a faint low beam, of His glory a reflex dim."

But:

"The rocks are built up of death, earth and sea teem with ruin and wrong;

The sole law in nature we learn, is the law that strengthens the strong." *

Astrology.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Some year or two ago your excellent and indefatigable correspondent, "C. C. M.," who is always willing to give us of his store of knowledge, stated that he was about to look into the question of Astrology, and intimated that he would, at a future time, give us his opinion as to the result, whether it was "full of emptiness," or whether there was "something in it."

I venture, therefore, to ask him, through your columns, if he is in a position to give your readers some idea of his conclusions. The opinion of such a prolific and potential writer, would, I am sure, be greatly appreciated by them on this subject.

"The God-Idea" and "Wonders" from the "Wizard of the North."

SIR,—Permit me to call the attention of your readers to 'The Basis of Religion, being an examination of "Natural Religion," by the Rev. A. W. Momerie, M.A., D.Sc., professor of Logic and Metaphysics in King's College, London, as an antidote to the recent teachings of "M. A. (Oxon.)" in "LIGHT."

Allow me also to supplement the references to Sir Walter Scott, now being made in your journal, by a quotation from Dr. W. Chambers' "History of Peebles-shire," giving an account of Sir Walter's first meeting with the original of the "Black Dwarf."

"At the first sight of Scott, the misanthrope seemed oppressed with a sentiment of extraordinary interest, which was either owing to the lameness of the stranger, or to some perception of an extraordinary mental character in this limping youth, which was hid from other eyes. After grinning upon him for a moment with a smile less bitter than his wont, the dwarf passed to the door, double-locked it, and then coming up to the stranger, seized him by the waist with one of his iron hands, and said: 'Man, ha'e ye ony poo'er?' By this he meant magical power, to which he had himself some vague pretensions. Scott disavowed the possession of any gifts of that kind, evidently to the great disappointment of the inquirer, who then turned found and gave a signal to a huge black cat, hitherto unobserved, which immediately jumped up to a shelf, where it perched itself, and seemed to the excited senses of the visitor as if it had really been the familiar spirit of the mansion. 'He has poo'er' said the dwarf, in a voice which made the flesh of the hearer thrill, and Scott, in particular, looked as if he conceived himself to have actually got into the den of one of those magicians with whom his studies had rendered him familiar. 'Ay, he has poo'er,' repeated the recluse; and then, going to his usual seat, he sat for some minutes grinning horribly, as if enjoying the impression he had made; while not a word escaped from any of the party. Mr. Adam Ferguson at length plucked up his spirits and called to David to open the door, as they must be going. The dwarf slowly obeyed; and when they had got out, Mr. Ferguson observed that Scott was as pale as ashes, while his person was agitated in every limb. Under such striking circumstances was this extraordinary being first presented to the real magician, who was afterwards to give him such a deathless celebrity."—I am, &c.,

Christian Symbolism.

SIR,—As my letter stands in the issue of the 1st, it is so full of errors that it is impossible to make out the sense. May I, therefore, ask you to reprint it, as I now send it, corrected? I proceed to shew the Esoteric teaching contained in the rites and ceremonies of the Catholic Church, which alone possesses it un-mutilated. The Sacrifice of the Mass is not a bloody sacrifice, as is often alleged by the ignorant, but a bloodless and pure oblation. It is the marriage of the Man and the Woman, of the Divine and the human, of spirit and matter, the at-one-ment of Heaven and earth. In this rite be it observed are two elements denoting the Divine duality, the man-woman-hood in God the Unity; of these elements the Bread is feminine, body, that which is passive, substantial; the Wine is masculine, spirit, that which is active, spiritual, penetrating.

The paten is also masculine and solar, as the chalice is feminine and lunar, crescent shaped. As I said before, the Water used is feminine representing the humanity, while the Incense is masculine representing Divinity, as it ascends and penetrates the holiest and the unseen by its divine aroma, elicited by fire. The four sides of the Altar symbolise the four seasons, and also the fourfold constitution of man (see "Perfect Way"). The Tabernacle on the Altar is the house of the son (sun). The celebrant is the Pontifex, the bridge-maker who at-once, unites. He begins (in the Western rite) at the west side, the autumn equinox being the true beginning of the year, and of its dark season; then he goes to the south side, following the sun's path; then (in the Eastern rite) by the east; then to the north side, the place of darkness, where is read the gospel, and two lights are introduced at the reading of it, to signify that by the inner light of the Spirit only it can be apprehended. Then comes the oblation, which is lifted up, heaved, and veared to the four points of the compass, signifying its universality. The mingling of the Water with the Wine shews the union of the human with the Divine in the person of the At-one, in order that the body of humanity (signified by the wafer), being penetrated thereby, may be raised up to the Divine; and this occurs when the oblation being elevated, the "pax" is said, and the kiss of peace given, and a portion of the sacred wafer is immersed in the chalice, and penetrated by the wine. And this is "the HOLY UNION."

The feast is then ready, and the Communion commences, that they who partake of the Body of God [i.e., the Divine Substance of the Universe, also the Church, "the body of Christ," and the bride of the Divine Spouse which is elected from men for the redemption and raising up of the rest, and of the Blood of God, i.e., the Divine Spirit manifested in force, astral fluid, which pervades all things, also the Divine spouse who lifts up His bride to union with Himself], should, through the reality of this partaking, be made members of that one Body and Blood, manifesting the One Life and Substance in themselves, and thus raised from the material and sensual into the ideal and spiritual (the only real), and unified with God.

The Holy Bread borne in the Pyx and saturated (in the Eastern Church) with the Sacred Wine is also symbolical of the Grand Presence—in the lower plane of the Universe filled with the astral fluid; in the higher plane of the Divine Substance filled with the Divine life—which is being ever given, ever shed for the good of the ALL—the SUN of Existence.

Thus far have I corrected my letter written last week, and I would beg of your readers to look more into the Catholic rites and ceremonies of the Missal and Breviary of the West and East, and pursue the hints above given, and which, I fear, they will not be able to find thus elucidated in any book at present; and let them remember there are, and ever will be, the three grand divisions in the Temple of Humanity—the inner, the middle, and the outer; the Esoteric, the Mesoteric, and the Exoteric; the spiritual, the intellectual, and the materialistic, and these three are one in the Eternal Unity, which comprehends all things; and in the Inner Temple, where God alone is the light, they will find the unity which underlies the varying doctrines and rites of the middle and the outer—Ile missat est.

Since writing my first letter on Symbolism, I have had my attention called by a valued friend to my use of the term flesh, as signified by water. His criticism is most just, and, indeed, after the plain teaching of "The Perfect Way," I wonder how I came to revert to my former mode of symbolising. Readers will, therefore, kindly correct my mistake by reading soul for flesh, which will make all correct. From this it will, of course, follow that the primary significance of the Master's words was purely spiritual, referring to the fact of the regeneration of the soul by the spirit within. But from this, of course, follows the fact of physical regeneration as its earthly correspondence and its necessary means.

It will be seen the interest of my remarks has been in no way altered, but more clearly expressed by adopting the kind criticism of my friend.—Yours,

A CATHOLIC PRIEST.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you permit me space to express my cordial sympathy with the exposition given by "A Catholic Priest" in your last number of the Ritual of the Mass? Now that the claims of Orientalism are being so widely and popularly discussed, it is most proper and timely to point out the admirable mysticism and the profound learning of the holy Catholic Church of the West. If only the esoteric doctrine of that Church, and the sublime truths embodied in the Liturgy and Creed of Rome, were clearly comprehended and laid to heart, there would be no reason to fear lest some of us should suppose "Esoteric Buddhism" to be in opposition to "Esoteric Christianity."—I am, sir, yours,

TRANSITION OF MR. CROMWELL VARLEY.—It is with regret that we have to announce the unexpected transition of Mr. Varley, on Sunday last, at his residence, Cromwell House, Bexley Heath. Mr. Varley was so well known amongst those interested in psychological research as a keen observer and an uncompromising advocate of the facts of Spiritualism, that there is no need to specially revert to them in this place. Writing in 1880, he said:—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception."

The Times thus summarises Mr. Varley's public career:—"Mr. Varley will be remembered as the electrician of the Electric and International Telegraph Company, who were the first to successfully lay a cable across the Atlantic. Two unsuccessful attempts had been made to connect the American Continent with the British Islands in 1857-8, the first of which failed through the breaking of the cable, and the second through a violent storm, when a third voyage proved more successful. The two countries were joined in August, 1858, but the insulation of the wire was faulty, and gradually becoming more and more so, the power of transmitting intelligence utterly ceased in September. For the next few years scientific men were making improvements in the form of the cable and in the apparatus for submerging it, and a new company having been formed and the necessary capital raised, the Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company made an entirely new cable, much thicker and more costly than the former one. The cable, weighing more than 4,000 tons, being 2,300 miles in length, it was resolved to employ the Great Eastern steamship to carry it out and lay it. On July 15th, 1865, the Leviathan, with the cable in her three enormous tanks, sailed from the Thames for Valentia Island, Mr. Varley, with Professor William Thomson, superintending the paying out of the cable. The voyage prospered until August 2nd, when the cable snapped by over-straining, and the end sank to the bottom in 2,000 fathoms of water at a distance of 1,064 miles from Ireland. For nine days the cable was grappled for under the directions of the eminent scientific men on board the vessel, but their efforts were attended by a series of disasters, the breaking of swivels and the loss of grapnels and ropes, and at last the Great Eastern had to return to England. New capital and new commercial arrangements altogether were needful for a renewal of the attempt, and these were provided by the reconstitution of the company as the Anglo-American Telegraph Company. Another cable was made slightly different from the former, and enough being manufactured to span the Atlantic, with allowance for slack, while a sufficient addition of the 1865 cable was provided to remedy the disaster of that year. As is well known, the new operations proved of a successful as well as remarkable and interesting kind, and the Great Eastern safely entered the harbour of Heart's Content, Newfoundland, on July 27th, 1866. After this operations commenced for recovering the end of the 1865 cable and completing the submersion, and the squadron at length succeeded in laying a second line of cable from Ireland to America. In addition to his connection with the laying of the Atlantic cable Mr. Varley was an exceedingly accomplished scientific man, and had patented or introduced many useful inventions, one of these being a musical telephone, which he produced in 1870, and which was played on at the Queen's Theatre, Long-acre, and at Covent Garden early in 1877."

NOTES BY THE WAY.

HIBBERT'S PHILOSOPHY OF APPARITIONS.

I have been looking up my "Hibbert on Apparitions" to which allusion was recently made in "LIGHT." It is, as was then said, a rare book, and one that is worth reading, if only to trace the effect of a study of the subject with which it deals on the mind of an acute and sceptical observer. Dr. Samuel Hibbert was a Fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, secretary to the Society of Scottish Antiquaries, and a member of various medical, philosophical, and learned societies. I do not know whether his book went through more than one edition. My copy is dated 1824. The origin of the book seems to have been an essay on Spectral Impressions which the author read before the Royal Society of Edinburgh. The limits of a short paper were too contracted, and as a result he published a small volume of some 450 pages. The theories he propounds are not worth much attention, though they square fairly with those which are now held by learned specialists in medicine like Dr. Hibbert. But his book deserves careful study from its collection of cases, and the elaborate classification that the author has attempted, as well as from the hints that it gives of laws which govern certain classes of mental phenomena. Doubtless, such a book as Dr. W. B. Carpenter's "Mental Physiology" has superseded Hibbert, but half a century has elapsed since the latter book was published, and the later volume, if more accurate and full, is not less amusing in its assumptions, and in the real ignorance it shews of many classes of phenomena which it ought to treat, and respecting the causes of which the author is sadly at sea.

The scheme of Dr. Hibbert's work is this. He sets out with a view of the morbid affections connected with the production of phantasms. He assumes that there is a morbid affection in every case; and he regards apparitions as intensely vivid ideas or recollected images of the mind. He lays much stress on Sir Humphry Davy's experiments with nitrous oxide, which he details at length. After respiring some eighty quarts in an air-tight box during an hour and a quarter, Sir H. Davy respired twenty quarts of unmingled nitrous oxide. He found "a sense of tangible extension, highly pleasurable in every limb . . . visible impressions dazzling and apparently magnified . . . all connection with external things lost: trains of vivid visible images rapidly passing through the mind. . . I existed in a world of newly-connected and newly-modified ideas." This state soon passed. The ideas which had been so vivid became feeble and indistinct, but there remained the impression which caused him to exclaim "with the most intense belief and prophetic manner"—"Nothing exists but thoughts. The universe is composed of impressions, ideas, pleasures, and pains."

The visionary world to which Sir Humphry Davy thus introduced himself, with its vivid and embodied images, is the realm which Dr. Hibbert sets himself to investigate. The pathological principle which he deduces from Sir H. Davy's experiences, and from certain premonitory symptoms of the influence of the febrile miasma of Cadiz and Malaga, is that "when sensations and ideas are, from some peculiar state of the sanguineous fluid, simultaneously rendered highly intense, the former arrive at a state of vividness, and gradually become fainter, while the latter, in an inverse ratio, increase in vividness; the result being that recollected images of thought, vivified to the height of actual impressions, exclusively, or nearly so, constitute the states of the mind." These morbid states he proceeds to investigate at length, and with much interesting detail in regard to their predisposing causes. Some spectral illusions (as he calls them) are traceable, in his opinion, to a highly excited condition in certain temperaments: others to hysteria (on which occult disease he casts, however, very little light). Some, it is amusing now-a-days to note, are attributable to the neglect of accustomed periodical blood-letting. Some are the accompaniments of the hectic state; some point to the presence of febrile and inflammatory affections, especially of the brain. Some, lastly, shew a highly excited state of nervous irritability throughout the system. Such are the spectres of the hypochondriac.

At this point Dr. Hibbert is apparently confronted with a recollection of the apparitions that are recorded in the Bible. If all are to be referred to dyspepsia, hypochondria, hysteria, and the like, what of Abraham and Paul and the seers of old? He is equal to the occasion. Modestly disclaiming any special knowledge of what the Deity may have done then "for signal purposes," he considers that "He does not communicate with man in any such way since the Apostolic Age." He will therefore treat all post-apostolic apparitions as deserving "a medical rather than a theological investigation." This treatment has the merit of simplicity. It is impossible, however, for any one who has had the advantage of face to face converse with the world of spirit not to pause and wonder over the logic of the author, and the difficulty he manifestly finds in believing in the reality of any apparition at all. If he dared, he would class the Bible stories with hallucinations and illusions. But even a scientific writer did not dare to do this fifty years ago. So he draws a veil over the past, and dissects post-apostolic miracles only.

Into this dissection I have not space to follow the learned Doctor. He has some acute and suggestive remarks respecting the transition of ideas to sensations, and vice versa, under the influence of exciting or depressing causes. And this portion of his argument may fitly be studied by those who are disposed to seek a supernatural cause for every occurrence that seems superficially inexplicable. This is a not inconsiderable class among Spiritualists. Those who constitute it have been brought into familiar contact with the world of spirit; they have grown used to the companionship and guidance of its unseen inhabitants; and they find themselves puzzled to set bounds to their interference in human affairs. From this standpoint of security, which they find ignorantly and dogmatically assailed by science, the transition is easy to a standpoint as absurdly insecure as is the negation of the materialist. The feelings are enlisted, the desire to enforce and illustrate the action of spirit becomes excessive, the sense of proportion is lost, and we get the enthusiastic Spiritualist who refers every common and uncommon occurrence to a supra-mundane agency, ignoring alike ordinary natural causes, and those more subtle and less known laws of nature and of mind which are but partially known to those who have devoted a laborious lifetime to their elucidation. It should be unnecessary to say that all possible natural causes for a mysterious occurrence must be exhausted before the convenient deus ex machina is imported—as unnecessary as to point out that to refer all authentic cases of apparitions to illusion and disease, as Dr. Hibbert does, is unscientific and absurd.

Yet it is unfortunately necessary to make constant effort to keep a level and unprejudiced mind in dealing with subjects such as the complex and intricate series included in what is badly called Spiritualism. It is as necessary for the Spiritualist to remember that there are morbid states and illusions and delusions such as Dr. Hibbert treats of, as it is to remind him and the numerous body of his modern representatives, that the evidence for the reality of apparitions, for instance, is not to be disposed of by the methods that he and they adopt. What, for example, is to be said of the logic that can treat as a mere illusion such a story as that of the celebrated apparition of Ficinus to Mercato? These two friends had made a compact that whichever first died should return to the other and inform him of his state. Mercato was in his study at work, when suddenly he heard the sound of horses' feet, which ceased at his door. His friend's well-known voice cried in his ears, "Oh, Michael! Michael! those things are true." Mercato turned to the window and saw his friend galloping away "on a pale horse." "At that very moment Ficinus died at Florence." Regarding this story, Dr. Hibbert quotes, with approval, some remarks of Dr. Ferriar in his "Theory of Apparitions." "Many attempts have been made to discredit it, but I think the evidence has never been shaken. I entertain no doubt that Mercato had seen what he described. In following the reveries of Plato, the idea of his friend and of their compact had been revived, and had produced a spectral impression, during the solitude and awful silence of the early hours of study!"

This is a fair specimen of the way in which a theory is tortured to explain away admitted facts by philosophers of the Hibbert school. I need not waste time in discussing the folly or in exposing the manifest unfairness of such a method of argument. The Society for Psychical Research is about to publish the first of a series of volumes, which will have the merit of dealing in an exhaustive and impartial manner with a subject which has suffered much at the hands of both friends and foes. The cases which will be recorded have been submitted to careful scrutiny, and have been elaborately verified at first hand, where that has been possible, and they will be dealt with, arranged, classified, and commented on by those whose ability to weigh evidence and criticise what they deal with will be disputed, if at all, only by persons whose prejudices have obscured their reasoning faculties. Such volumes, so prepared, will be an invaluable addition to our store of knowledge.

EBERHARD STILLING'S VISION.

Eberhard Stilling was grandfather to the well-known German philosopher and mystic, Heinrich Jung Stilling, who rose from a peasant lad to be Counsellor to the Grand Duke of Baden, in the eighteenth century. Jung Stilling's life is full of interest to Spiritualists, because of the experiences of spirit intercourse, and mediumship which were to him of frequent occurrence.

The following account I have taken from "Jung Stilling's Life and Autobiography." "Eberhard" was tenderly devoted to his little grandson, and frequently took him into the woods, adjoining the village of Tiefenbach (Westphalia), in which the Stilling family had resided for many generations, to converse with him upon religious subjects.

Upon one occasion Jung's Aunt Maria was with them, and, taking the little boy with her, they went for a little walk together, leaving the old man alone. On rejoining him they saw his countenance beaming, as with great joy. "Children!" he exclaimed, "I shall die soon, how glad I am at the thought! As I was entering the wood, just now, I saw, at a distance before me, a bright light, as of the sun-dawn, on a bright morning. What is it? I thought. The sun is already up. Is it a new sun? I went towards it, and as I approached, I came to a large plain. I have never seen anything so glorious. The perfume in the air was inexpressibly lovely; the whole region was white with light,—a sunny day is as night beside it; and there were innumerable castles, looking as if they were built of silver. There were also gardens, bushes, brooks! Oh God! how beautiful! I found myself standing close to a glorious mansion, and out of the door of this mansion walked a glorious angel! It was our beloved Doris!* With her old loving look, she came to me and said, "Father, yonder is our spirit home; you will soon come to us!"

From this day the good old man was like one in a strange land. Still he was in his usual health. But a few months after this beautiful vision, he met with the accident (falling from the top of a cottage, whilst repairing the thatched roof) which freed his waiting spirit from his aged frame.

This happened about the year 1750, when Jung was ten years old.

He felt his grandfather's removal very much, and continually talked to Margaret, his grandmother, about him.

Jung imagined Heaven to be a glorious country; full of woods, fields, and meadows in all the glories of the opening spring. He would picture to himself his grandfather, Eberhard, "walking about with a glory round his head, and a silvery robe flowing around him." Margaret once said to him, "Jung, what thinkest thou thy grandfather is now doing?" "He will be travelling to Orion," replied the child; "or to Pleiades; and take a good view of everything. Then, astonished, he will exclaim, as he used to do here, 'Oh! what a wonderful God!'"

"But I have no mind for all this," exclaimed the simple old woman. "What shall I do there?"

"Act like Mary, who sat at the feet of Jesus," the grandchild answered.

Jung Stilling's account of the manner in which he wrote several of his books, proves him to have been a highly developed writing and impressional medium. He had a firm and life-long belief in "apparitions," spirit-intercourse, and in the continual presence of "ministering spirits." His many works upon these subjects form a most valuable addition to the Spiritualistic literature of the present day.

F. J. THEOBALD.

CALIGRAPHY OF THE ANGELS.—St. Bernard had one day the consolation of seeing the angels chronicling the prayers of the religious, some in letters of gold, others in letters of silver, while some were written in ink, and some in water, according to the fervour of their natures.

* Doris was Jung Stilling's young spirit mother.

PSYCHICS IN THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, CANONISED AND UNCANONISED.

St. Dunstan.

He was born in the year A. D. 925, in the beginning of the reign of Athelstan, the grandson of Alfred. His early years were passed in the neighbourhood of Glastonbury, where he afterwards became a professed monk. He profited by all the means of instruction which that great seminary placed at his disposal. He became not only learned in books, but an accomplished scribe, and made himself master of those arts which, according to the rule of the order, were carried on within the walls. He was a painter, a musician, and an excellent artificer in metal. He constructed an organ "with trap pipes, filled with air from the bellows, and which uttered a grand and sweet melody." He repaired at a very early age to Court, where he was at first much beloved by King Edmund, who took much delight in his musical talent, which was then rare, and which, added to his skill in mathematics, his mechanical dexterity, and the power he obtained over the king, exposed him to the imputation of sorcery. His enemies persuaded the king that he was assisted by a demon; and Edmund reluctantly drove him from his presence. Some time afterwards, as the king was hunting, having outstripped his courtiers, it happened that the stag and the hounds in full pursuit coming suddenly to the edge of a precipice, fell over and were dashed to pieces. The king following at full speed, and seeing the precipice, endeavoured to rein in his horse. But unable to do so, and seeing his impending destruction, he recommended himself to God in prayer;—recalling, and at the same time repenting, his injustice to Dunstan. His horse, on reaching the edge of the precipice, instead of tumbling headlong, stood still, trembling and panting. The king was saved; he sent for Dunstan, who had retired to Glastonbury, where he was occupied with his usual pursuits. The famous story of the devil seems to be referred to this period. One night, as Dunstan was working at his forge, the most terrible howls and cries were heard to proceed from his cell. The devil, as he related, had visited him in the form of a beautiful woman, and endeavoured to tempt him from his holy work. He had seized the disguised demon by the nose with his red-hot tongs, which had caused him to roar with pain, and to flee discomfited. A much more beautiful legend is that which relates that on a certain day, as Dunstan sat reading the Scriptures in his cell, his harp, which hung on a peg against the wall, sounded untouched by human hands; for an angel played on it the hymn, Gaudete animi, to the great delight and solace of the holy man.

In the year A. D. 960 he made a journey to Rome, was received there with great honours by Pope John XII., from whose hands he received the pallium as Primate of the Anglo-Saxon nation. Returning to England, he set himself assiduously to found monasteries and schools, and to extend everywhere the taste for knowledge and the civilising arts. His miracles, his supernatural arts, and his visions form a large part of the ecclesiastical history of his time. He relates himself a vision in which he beheld the espousals of his mother, for whom he entertained the profoundest love and veneration, with the Saviour of the world, accompanied with all the circumstances of Heavenly pomp, amid a choir of angels. One of the angels asked Dunstan why he did not join in the song of rejoicing? when he excused himself on account of his ignorance. The angel then taught him the song. The next morning St. Dunstan assembled his monks around him, and relating his vision, taught them the very hymn which he had learned in his dream (vision), and commanded them to sing it. Sharon Turner calls this an impious story.

MRS. JAMESON.

St. Francesca Romana.

Though unwearied in her devotions, yet if, during her prayers, she was called away by her husband on any domestic duty, she would close her book, saying that "A wife and a mother when called upon must quit her God at the altar, and find Him in her household affairs." Now it happened once, that, in reciting the Office of Our Lady, she was called away four times just as she was beginning the same verse, and returning the fifth time, she found that verse written upon the page in letters of golden light by the hand of her guardian angel. It is further related of her, that like St. Cecilia, she was everywhere attended by an angel visible to herself alone.

MRS. JAMESON.

Joan of Arc.

"A saint, indeed, in faith and destiny. Never was human creature more heroically confident in, and devoted to, inspiration coming from God, a commission received from God. Joan of Arc sought nothing of all that happened to her; nothing of all she did, nor exploit, nor power, nor glory. It was not her condition," as she used to say, "to be a warrior to get her king crowned, and to deliver her country from the foreigner." Everything came to her from on high, and she accepted everything without hesitation, without discussion, without calculation, as we should say in our times. She believed in God and obeyed Him. God was not to her an idea, a hope, a flash of human imagination, or a problem of human science. He was the Creator of the world, the Saviour of mankind through Jesus Christ, the Being of beings, ever present, ever in action, sole legitimate Sovereign of man, whom He has made intelligent and free, the real and true God, whom we are painfully searching for in our own day, and whom we shall never find again, until we cease pretending to do without Him, and putting ourselves in His place.

"Four centuries have rolled by since Joan of Arc, that modest and heroic servant of God, made a sacrifice of herself for France. For four-and-twenty years after her death France and the king seemed to think no more of her. However, in 1455, remorse came upon King Charles VII. and upon France. Nearly all the provinces, all the towns were freed from the foreigner; and shame was felt that nothing was said, nothing done for the young girl who had saved everything. At Rouen, especially, where the sacrifice was completed, a cry for reparation arose. It was timidly demanded from the spiritual power which had sentenced and delivered over Joan as a heretic to the stake. Pope Calixtus III. entertained the request preferred, not by the King of France, but by Isabel Romée, Joan's mother, and her whole family. Regular proceedings were commenced and followed up for the rehabilitation of the martyr. And on 7th of July, 1556, a decree of the court assembled at Rouen, quashed the sentence of the previous century with all its consequences."—Guizot's History of France.

CELESTIAL WISDOM.—"My soul was then, it appeared to me, like a leaf or feather which the wind carries whither it chooses; it yielded itself up entirely to the operation of God; equally to all that happened to it, whether internal or external, without any choice, content to obey a child or a man of knowledge and experience, regarding only God in that man, and that man in God—who never permits a soul entirely given up to Him to be deceived."—MADAME GUYON.

CREMATION.—One of the strongest arguments in favour of cremation is, that cemeteries are perennial sources of contagion. This theory has received additional confirmation in the discovery recently made by Dr. Freire, of Rio Janeiro. In examining the earth where the victims of yellow fever had been interred the year before, he found myriads of microbi, exactly identical with those found in the vomitings of persons sick with yellow fever. These germs he has cultivated, and has produced the disease in animals, whose blood after death he found to be filled with the seeds of yellow fever in various stages of growth.

ACCOUNT OF WONDERFUL PHENOMENA

WRITTEN FOR

Mrs. Hardinge Britten's New Work, "Nineteenth Century Miracles,"

By WILLIAM OXLEY.

The circumstances of which I send you a written statement herewith, may be fresh in the remembrance of some of our English Spiritualists, but I am under the impression that they will be new to most of the readers of "LIGHT." Perhaps they will be none the less acceptable from the fact that records of phenomena are now less commonly to be found in the pages of our spiritual journals than treatises on philosophy, which, to my crude way of thinking, ought to be deduced from our facts, in order to become authoritative. I have yet to discover the superiority of those theories which are based purely on the opinions of men in the nineteenth century, over those sectarian forms of belief which are derived from the opinions of men in past centuries, unless we have some mediatorial standard of appeal which presents us with a basis of FACTS on which to found our opinions. Such a standard has been vouchsafed to us in the modern spiritual manifestations. For the first time in eighteen centuries we stand face to face with the proofs of spiritual existence, and through an immense mass of corroborative testimony, we are enabled to learn tidings of that long hidden and mysterious "far country," to which so many of our best beloved have pushed on before us, and whither our own pilgrim feet are inevitably tending. Whether we are, as yet, in a position to drift off from this inestimable post of vantage into all manner of theoretical speculations, as groundless as the credal faiths which we see crumbling into ruins on every side of us, is a question which I do not in this place care to discuss. I may say in brief—and that at the risk of being branded with the popular epithet of "a mere phenomenalist"—that I am not willing, nor do I feel myself authorised, in abandoning the stupendous anchor of facts that I have seen positively let down from Heaven, like the "common and unclean things" of Peter's vision, to stay our tempest-tossed barques of faith from drifting about any longer on the shoreless sea of speculative opinion. It is in this spirit, as well as in compliance with the desire of some of your readers, that I venture to send you a well-written paper, furnished me by our esteemed fellow worker, Mr. William Oxley, of Manchester, together with a fine series of plates of the objects referred to, for the English section of my forthcoming work—"Nineteenth Century Miracles." I make no apology for retaining my kind correspondent's closing words. They, like the irrefragable statements contained in his paper, are too clear and characteristic to be excised. I have only to remind the reader that in this, as in every reported case of spiritual phenomena, each séance must stand or fall on its own attendant circumstances. Prejudice against the mediums engaged, or well-proven defalcations on their part, must be judged of severally and singly, but should not mar the force of indisputable testimony in other cases. "Judge righteous judgment" and "the truth against the world," under all circumstances.

EMMA HARDINGE BRITTEN.

The Limes, Humphrey-street,
Cheetham Hill, Manchester.

To MRS. BRITTEN.—I have the pleasure to furnish you with engravings of a materialised spirit's foot, which represents with perfect exactitude the plaster cast, moulded by a professional artist, from the paraffin wax envelope. Apart from any suggestions of trickery and collusion the cast itself tells its own tale, for it has the cuticle marks in the crucial parts, which it would be impossible to produce under any circumstances without a mould formed of many parts, as any mechanician, or even ordinary person can see at a glance. The cast foot is eight inches long by three inches in the widest part, and nine inches in the widest part. The opening at top of the foot is 2½ inches diameter. And yet through this opening the foot was instantaneously withdrawn.

The medium was Mrs. Firmans (now deceased). The modus operandi was as follows:—I prepared the melted hot liquid paraffin, into which the little spirit form dipped her foot several times, so as to make it of sufficient thickness to maintain its figure. After this operation the spirit form—known to us as Bertie—put out her foot with the wax mould upon it, and asking me to take hold of it, which I did, the foot was withdrawn (or dissolved, I know not which) and the mould left in my hand. This was at the house of a friend in Manchester, April 11th, 1876, and next morning I took the wax mould to Mr. Bernaditto, who filled it with plaster, and, after melting the wax from the plaster, the result was a beautiful feminine human foot, of which the illustration is a faithful copy. The crucial test of this wondrous phenomenon is seen by reference to figure II. The ball of the toe, (see D C), half an inch thick, had to be drawn through an opening only a quarter-inch deep (see B A), which of course, under ordinary circumstances, is a physical impossibility, without destroying the fine bridge, (see A C), and it is exactly on this bridge that the cuticle marks are delineated as perfectly as on the human foot. Your space will not permit me to give the means employed to eliminate anything like fraudulent action on the part of the medium, neither is it necessary to do so, as the cast itself—still in my possession—leaves its own stamp of genuineness, for there is not a single mark that betokens anything contrary to what it really is, viz., a cast from a whole and perfect mould, without a division; and I challenge the world to produce the like, otherwise than by similar agency. I, myself, made the so-called cabinet, which was the recess of a bay window, into which nothing could get without being seen by ten pairs of watchful eyes (there was a good light all through the séance). The medium, who was a woman of great size, went inside, and in the course of some fifteen minutes, the little psychic form of Bertie presented herself, and went through the operations as described above. After the performance she disappeared, and in a moment or two I drew the curtain aside, and there was Mrs. Firmans entranced, and the sole occupant. Where was Bertie?

The other illustration is from a photograph of a plant with flower, produced through the mediumship of Mrs. Esperance, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, August 4th, 1880. The reader must take all accessories for granted, as it is superfluous to enumerate all the precautionary measures to ensure genuine phenomena.

The cabinet was a plain wooden box, five feet high, closed at top and bottom, with a gauze division in the centre, and a curtain covering the whole front, about six feet wide. The medium sat in one compartment, and the company (about twenty persons) sat round in horse-shoe fashion. In a short time, a little figure, draped in white, known as Yolande, emerged from the other (empty) compartment. That it was not the medium was evident from the fact of the figure being much less in size, and different in outline, and I heard Mrs. E. breathing hard while the figure was outside. Yolande requested my friend, Reimers, to get a glass water-bottle, and some sand and water, which, when mixed, he put into the bottle, and returned to his seat. Yolande then made a few passes over the bottle, and actually created a white gauzy cloth before our very eyes. She then retired about a yard from the bottle, and sat down on the floor. Presently we saw—for there was sufficient light to clearly distinguish the operation—the gauze veil gradually rising, as if there were something moving it upwards. In about two minutes, after rising about sixteen inches, Yolande rose to her feet and went to the bottle, from which she removed the covering, and lo! there was a plant with green leaves grown out of the bottle, with its roots in the sand: but there was no flower on it. After we had somewhat recovered from our astonishment, Yolande took it up, bottle and all, and gave it into my hands. She then retired into the cabinet. After the company had inspected it, I placed it at my feet, and waited for what should come next. In a few minutes raps were heard, and then the alphabet was used. "Look at your plant" was spelt out, and taking it up I found, not only that it had grown very considerably in size, but there was a beautiful flower about four inches diameter on it. This was produced while it was between my feet. I took it to my hotel, and next morning had it photographed, of which the engraving is an exact copy. The next night Yolande gave me a small rosebud on a short stalk, with not more than two leaves on. This I put in my bosom, and kept it there during the time that the séance lasted; but having the impression that something was going on, I put my hand to feel it, and noticing that it felt different I kept my own counsel and did not disturb it. When the séance was drawing to a close, I drew forth my rosebud, when, strange to relate, it had developed into a bunch of three large full-blown roses with a bud as well! These I also put away with the plant.

APPARITION OF THE LIVING.

Extensive as has been my experience—now ranging over many years—with psychic sensitives, there have been no results more satisfactory and pleasing—i.e. on the physical plane—than the above which I have narrated, and curtailed, so as to give only the bald facts. The top leaves (six inches long), with a part of the stalk and remains of flower plant (preserved under glass), together with the foot—along with other hand casts—produced under similar circumstances as told—are before me as I write, and I trust they may be kept for ages to come as souvenirs, or first-fruits of that mighty spiritual force and movement—now in its commencement—which is destined to change the face of the whole earth, both as a physical orb, and also the social status of humanity that, from generation to generation, will live and move upon its surface. Without trespassing further on your time and space, allow me to congratulate you on the part which you have been destined to play in this wondrous drama; and unless I grievously err, the time will come—and at no very distant date—when this new volume, which you are now giving to the world, will be recognised and appreciated at its vastly more than mere money value. Each pioneer has his or her own specific work to perform; and amongst these, none have laboured more assiduously, and more unselfishly, than the gifted editress of "Art-Magic"; "Ghost Land"; and the authoress of the "History of the Modern Spiritual Movement all over the Earth." So states

Your Fellow Workman,

WILLIAM OXLEY.

MESMERISM AND CLAIRVOYANCE.

The Reminiscences of Georgina Baroness Bloomfield (Kegan Paul and Co., 1883), dedicated by permission to the Queen, contains (p. 105) the following interesting testimony on the subject of mesmerism and clairvoyance:—

"In the winter of 1844, my sister-in-law, Mrs. Liddell, was much interested in mesmerism, which was being practised by Miss Martineau, at Tynemouth, and she tried it upon my mother's young maid who was suffering much from palpitations; its soothing effect was remarkable; and under it she became clairvoyant. Our parish clergyman, the Rev. J. Collinson, doubting this faculty asked permission to test it. This not being objected to, he brought a sealed packet, none but himself knowing the contents. The next time the girl was mesmerised, the packet was put into her hand and she opened it and drew forth a lock of hair, which, after stroking it a little, she threw from her, saying there was no light about and it was disagreeable to her. My sister-in-law put it in her hand again, asking her to say why she did not like it. The girl shuddered and said, 'It is the hair of a dead person; there is no light in it; it is the hair of a person who had a hard struggle before dying.' On its being handed back to Mr. Collinson with the words of the girl, he told us that it was the hair of his daughter, deceased eighteen months, and that it was true that her death was preceded by a painful struggle.

"On another occasion, I had just come home from one of my waitings on the Queen. I had just unpacked my books, amongst them was a Prayer Book, with the music of chants and hymns at the end. I took up this book casually as I left my room to go into that where the mesmerising was going on. Some experiment was being made as to her clairvoyance, and her eyes were bandaged. I put my Prayer Book into her hand, the end of the book upwards. She felt the first page, she opened it with the tips of her fingers, and said, 'What a funny book—music instead of words'; she used to read with the tips of her fingers or with the back of her head, and when her eyes were bandaged, if asked to tell the hour, she turned the back of her head to the clock.

"I have never seen mesmerism practised since, but I can testify to the truth of these facts. Its soothing power with this girl was extraordinary; the palpitation of the heart was so excessive that one could see the pulsations in her neck, then after three minutes of the magnetic sleep the palpitations would cease and the pulse beat regularly and quietly. The doctor declared that no power of medicine could have produced such a result so speedily."

For many years I have been a suffering invalid. I have a most valued attendant and friend in the person of Miss G——, who has been with me nearly twenty-two years. A few years ago she went to the wedding of her eldest brother, who then resided more than 100 miles from the place I was living at. A younger sister of Miss G—— remained with me during her absence. On the day appointed for Miss G——'s return, I felt extremely uneasy and restless all the afternoon. The appointed time passed and Miss G—— did not return. Her sister was quite easy about her, saying that doubtless she had missed the train, and might come by the night train. I did not believe this could be, but would not retire to rest. At twelve I rose from my couch, and went to the window to look through the Venetian blinds at the moonlit street; everything was seen as clearly as at noonday, and I saw Miss G—— come quickly up to the door, put her foot on the first step, and then look up with a radiant smile. The moon shone bright on her face, and I said to her sister, who was standing beside me, "There she is, M——, run down and let her in." M—— replied, "I do not see her." I said, a little impatiently, "Oh, do run down, she is waiting at the door." M—— went down, and the lady in whose house I lived, being anxious about me, had not retired to rest, then joined M—— in the passage, both going to the door together—no one was there. Both stepped out into the moonlit street—no one was to be seen from one end to the other. Then they came to me and tried to persuade me I had been mistaken; but I had distinctly seen her, looking radiant in the moonlight. At first I concluded an accident had occurred, and that she had been killed. I went to bed. During the almost sleepless hours of the night, I considered that had she been killed; she loved me too well to look so bright in her last moments, and this somewhat consoled me. At half-past one next day, Sunday, she was in my arms, expressing her fears that I had been much alarmed. She had found that the train she left L—— by the day before, stopped at L—— two hours, and as she had cousins there she went to see them, begging her cousin to mind the train, and they started for the station, as they considered, in good time; but her cousin's watch was some minutes slow, and when they arrived they had the mortification of seeing the train just beyond the platform, rapidly moving away. She said she was very miserable all the afternoon, but was persuaded not to come by the night train, which would arrive in London at a time no cabs could be had, and her friends would be so uneasy; so at twelve she determined to go to bed, wishing devoutly she could just let me know she was safe—she had not thought of a telegram—and determining that nothing should make her lose the earliest train in the morning. I have never been able to account for this vision but by considering that it was produced by the strong sympathy existing between us, and her great affection for me.

"WONDERS FROM THE RECORDS OF THE WIZARD OF THE NORTH."—In an article bearing this title in "LIGHT," August 25th, 1883, reference is made to the superstition connected with the ringing of bells. The following remarks of Mrs. Crowe touch upon this subject:—"I meet," says Mrs. Crowe, in "The Night Side of Nature" (p. 133, sixpenny edition, Routledge, 1882), "with numerous records of a preternatural ringing of all the bells in a house: sometimes occurring periodically for a considerable time; and continuing after precautions have been taken which preclude the possibility of trick or deception, the wire being cut and vigilant eyes watching them, and yet they ring on day and night just the same."

(WHEN in mental or worldly trouble) "Neither be cast down, nor yet sink into despair. Submit calmly to the will of God, and for the love of Jesus Christ suffer all that may happen to you; for summer succeeds to winter; day returns after night, and after the storm comes the great calm."—THOMAS-A-KEMPIS.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Editor of "LIGHT" will esteem it a favour if readers and subscribers will make a point of introducing this journal to the notice of those who are interested in the subjects discussed herein from week to week.

THE DISCUSSION ON ESOTERIC BUDDHISM.

It appears to us desirable that the controversy on Esoteric Buddhism which has been going on in these columns for the past few months should, for the present at any rate, be discontinued. We have in type a long article on the subject, by the Hon. Roden Noel. This will appear in our issue for October 20th, together with any letters on the subject which may reach us in the meantime, and, in order not to close the correspondence in too hurried a fashion, we shall be pleased to insert any further communication bearing on Mr. Noel's critique, or any outstanding point in connection with this question in the following issue, viz., that for October 27th. After that the matter must drop for the present. Not by any means that the subject has been threshed out, but simply because our general readers have a claim for attention which, while gladly meeting as far as possible the views of those desiring to discuss special questions, we are bound to consider. Having regard to the necessarily limited character of a newspaper discussion, the pros and cons of the subject have been very fairly stated as far as they go. And now it seems to us something very much like a dead-lock is arrived at. On the one side a speculative philosophy is put forward, resting solely on the ipse dixit of a somewhat shadowy authority, all proofs, even of the existence of such authority, being denied save to two or three persons, and on the other side is found an emphatic refusal to believe unless the required proofs are forthcoming. At present these are conspicuous only by their extreme paucity, and even those which are vouchsafed to us are invalidated by discoveries such as that recorded by Mr. Henry Kiddle in "LIGHT" for September 1st, to explain which no attempt has yet been made. If there is any question at all to consider it is surely one of fact, and we may endeavour to solve the mystery later in the year. For the present the matter must remain as indicated above.

MINISTERING SPIRITS.

No. II.

"Are they not all ministering spirits sent forth to minister?"
Hebrews, chap. I. verse 14.

A Fisher of Souls.*

Half an hour's walk to the south-east of my father's village of Neviges, by Elberfeld, there lived upon a farm called the Bradde, some forty years ago (the writer is writing in 1835), a pious woman, the wife of the farmer, a Frau S., who was accustomed, to her confidential friends, to relate the following occurrence. It has reference to the loving ministration of spirits from above to pious, but troubled, souls on earth.

Frau S. had the misfortune to lose a favourite child, through drowning in a pond upon the farm.

During the seasons of busy work in the country, the whole household is accustomed to go forth together, to labour in the fields or woods. One person alone, usually the mistress of the family, remains at home, fully occupied in preparing at the hearth food for the hungry labourers upon their return.

The youngest children, such as are not able to labour in the fields, or who are not old enough to attend school, remain with the busy mother. But she is frequently so much pressed with her duties, as for a time to lose thought of her children.

Thus was it that the child of Frau S. met its death. The mother remained for weeks and months utterly inconsolable; her anguish in recalling her negligence, and her sense of her own part in the misfortune, approached despair. No word of consolation from human lips, nor even in the pages of her so-beloved Bible, could make any permanent impression upon her mind.

In this sad, desponding state, one beautiful summer's morning she visited the church in Neviges. The sermon of the clergyman, however, only rendered more keen the need of comfort for her soul.

In a deeply pitiful condition did she, at noon, set forth homewards. Close to the farm stands a small oak wood, through which the road leads. In this wood lies a damp hollow, which, especially in the rainy season of autumn, becomes a pool of water; but at the present season was almost dried up.

Spite of her melancholy mood, she, nevertheless, had her attention drawn to the fact that a gentleman, handsomely attired, according to the fashion of the day, stood close to the road, and with a grand fishing-rod was angling with much steadfastness in the hollow. Approaching nearer with a courteous greeting to him, she could not resist asking "Whether he in reality expected to catch any fish there?" The gentleman replied, "Why not? Do you think, then, that I shall not have any success?"

Frau S. replied: "You had best leave off, for it will be foolish to continue; the boggy hollow is nearly dried up."

THE STRANGER: "Is it not remarkable, my friend, that persons can give one another the excellent advice of which they themselves stand in need? I will follow your counsel if you will follow mine. As probable is it, that I, with my fishing-rod, shall draw fish out of this dried-up hole, as that you, with your unending grief, should draw forth, again alive, your beloved child, drowned in the pond."

Overwhelmed with astonishment, but not distressed, Frau S. inquired whence the stranger came, and how it was that he could thus read the depths of her heart? Putting aside her question, the stranger, with great sweetness and earnestness, sought to shew her in the midst of her grief and humiliation what was displeasing to God in her excessive lamentation. His words, like oil and wine, penetrated her heart, and though she felt her conscience stricken, she could not resist her desire to invite the stranger into the farm and offer him her rural hospitality, hoping to hear more of his instructive words. Not unlike to the feelings of the two disciples who conversed with the Lord on the way to Emmaus, were those of this good farmer's wife, and she might have truly exclaimed with them, "Did not our hearts burn within us, as He spoke with us by the way and opened the Scriptures unto us?"

Meanwhile she had drawn near to the farmhouse. Going a few steps in advance to open the door she turned round again to invite the stranger to enter, when, behold! he was no longer there! He had vanished! But with him had vanished, for ever, all her devouring sorrow! The extraordinary occurrence had, however, so greatly overpowered her, that she, being in a fainting condition took to her bed. Her perplexed husband summoned a doctor, who bled her; but she experienced an internal and abiding peace of mind, which is above all reason. This peacefulness, before long, restored joyful health to her once more.

On later occasions, when questioned as to the apparition she had nothing extraordinary to describe in the appearance of the stranger, beyond what has been already said, with the exception, that she remembered to have remarked that the linen of the stranger had a sort of yellow shine about it—not being "quite white."

Communicated by A. Kottgen, of Langenberg, to Dr. Kerner. "Blätter aus Prevorst," 7th volume, 1835, p. 203.

CHILDHOOD OF DR. MESMER.

How the Great Healers gather together vital force for future beneficent uses, may be seen strongly exemplified in the case of Franz Anton Mesmer. The free breath of pure nature can alone be expected to feed the physical healer with the vital force of physical health, even as the free breath of the pure Spirit of God can alone be expected to feed with vital force the healer of spiritual and moral disease.

In the "Researches after Memorials of Mesmer in the Place of his Birth,"—the last work published by Dr. Justinus Kerner, and from which copious extracts are given in the forthcoming first volume of "Pioneers of the Spiritual Reformation," appears the following notice of the early health-giving surroundings of one of the greatest healers ever born into the world. "His infancy and boyhood were passed by Mesmer amidst the glorious scenery of the Lake of Constance. Upon the banks of the Rhine and of the lake, in the fields and woods, he was left to wander about and play by himself. His father was a huntsman in the employment of the Bishop of Constance. The child Mesmer exhibited an especial affection for water, for running brooks and streams, which he always followed up to their springs, and thoroughly loved to investigate upon their courses. During Professor Wolfart's last visit to Mesmer, the aged man of wonders referred to this, his youthful inclination, and he related how in his eighth year, when attending school, and his way lay along the banks of the Rhine, his desire to follow up the course of the streams which flowed into that great river frequently caused him to neglect his school duties. In all places where waters flowed, he loved also to seek for stones and shells; and wind, storm, rain, hail and snow had early attracted the boy's attention and become subjects for reflection to him, and he would, in order to study their nature, rush forth into their midst with joy.

"Through this life, in the bosom of free nature, he appears, even whilst still a child, to have drawn towards himself a natural power unpossessed by the dwellers at the fire-side, a power which appears to delight to flow into those who maintain a many-sided intercourse and struggle with nature; as, for instance, in the case of sailors, hunters, shepherds, mountaineers, and tillers of the soil. In such persons is discovered the development of a special sense and of a special power, which in his later life, continued to develop itself in Mesmer, and which he, as so-called Magnetism, first recognised, and as a means of healing carefully examined and made known; a power which is not inherent in all men, but markedly is not so in men of vitrified understanding and whose knowledge is alone that of the schools."

REMARKABLE EXPERIENCE OF MISS E. OWENS BLACKBURNE.

This lady, so well known in the literary world, writing from Caramore, Sutton Howth, Dublin, on September 5th, 1883, gives the following account of a remarkable incident which recently occurred to her. She says:—

"Thank you very much for 'LIGHT.' I have had an experience in this house of the account which you may make a paragraph of, if you like. This is an oddly built house; the bath-room has two doors, one opening on the landing, the other opens outside where there is a high flight of steps leading down to the yard; about twelve yards from the foot of the flight of steps there is another shorter flight leading up to a gate in the sea-wall, and a shorter flight again leading down to the strand where we bathe. One night lately I could not sleep, and wanted to go down stairs to get a book—it was about half-past four, and I had plenty of light without taking a candle. As I stood at my room door on the upper landing I was directly opposite to the bath-room door; it was open; the door opposite to it leading down to the bathing place was open also. A man with a large whitish dog, which he held by a chain, crossed the doors, went out through the outer door, and lashed the dog down the steps. I was rather startled, and went into my mother's room opposite; she came out—the doors were shut and everything silent. Two days afterwards I was coming down our back steps to get down on the strand when a coastguard spoke to me and hoped I was stronger than when I came down here. I said, 'Yes! Howth air had given me new life.' He hesitated for a moment and then remarked that no one about the place ever expected that we would have stayed in it, as it was 'well known that Curtis' (the man who had owned the place and died here) was always walking about it, leading the big white vicious dog that he beat to death in one of his terrible fits of fury.' We have a little girl of five years old on a visit with us. Yesterday she was desired to go to the bath-room for something. She refused, saying 'Mr. Butler's' (our next neighbour) 'big white dog was always in the bath-room,' and she was afraid of it. Mr. B. has only one dog, a black-and-tan. It is certainly an uncanny sort of house, and I should like to be able this coming winter to do something to find out something more."

"HOW TO INVESTIGATE SPIRITUALISM."—Mr Farmer's little pamphlet under this title, has been reprinted by Colonel Bundy, (Religio-Philosophical Publishing House). Sundry additions and alterations have been made in order to adapt it for American readers.

In the early part of my investigation I arrived at the conclusion that the genuineness of a spirit communication depends upon, first and primarily, (1) the medium through whom it comes; (2) the person or persons present who receive it; (3) the circumstances under which it is given; and (4) the character of the communication itself; and I have never accepted a communication without a careful analysis and consideration of all these points.—HENRY KIDDLE.

SPIRITUALISM IN FICTION.—The following, clipped from an exchange, is stated by a correspondent who has seen advance sheets to refer to a book which will cause much interest and speculation:—"John Lovell and Co., New York, have in press a volume entitled 'Beyond the Sunrise: Observations by Two Travellers,' which is a clever work by two anonymous writers. The subjects treated in it are psychology and clairvoyance, as apart from and distinct from Spiritualism, and the authors have evidently had an extended experience with the subjects treated. It has become the fashion for agnostics and others who entirely discredit the spiritualistic philosophy to affect the study of Theosophy, and the writers of this work are evidently posted in regard to this tendency. In an elementary way they outline the philosophy of American Occultism and give in its pages some remarkable revelations. In the form of sketches they relate phenomena not possible to be obtained through the avenue offered by those who believe in Spiritualism. The book will certainly be read with interest."

CURIOUS CASE OF SENSITIVENESS.

From Report of British Home for Incurables, at Clapham, for 1883.

A very singular case is that of Mrs. Croad, who has been an out-patient ever since 1867. She was born at Plymouth in 1810, and when about thirteen was seized by an illness which deprived her for three years of the use of her limbs. From this she apparently recovered, and was married when only nineteen to a young sailor, who first took her to America and afterwards established his home at Brading, in the Isle of Wight. There the young wife twice fell down a flight of steps, injuring herself in a manner that brought on epileptic fits. While she was in this state her little boy was scalded to death, and her malady was much aggravated by grief, and the sudden loss of her husband a few months later brought on a stroke of paralysis, followed soon after by a second, ever since which she has been a prisoner to her couch. In 1870 she lost the power of speech and of taking solid food through lockjaw, and has since become blind and deaf, and has so little use of her arms and hands that for long she could only write with difficulty by fastening a pencil to her right forefinger with a piece of elastic and steadying the slate between her body and the side of her crib; but is now reduced to holding the pencil between her teeth.

The strange part of her story is that the skin of her face is remarkably sensitive, and her friends now communicate with her by writing words on it. If she receives a letter she passes it across her cheek, and immediately perceives from whom it comes. She also knows who is approaching her by their step, which she says produces in each case a distinct and different quiver throughout the length of her spine. If friends take her hands and form a circle while singing, she grasps the harmony so accurately as sometimes to surprise them by whistling a second treble. Her own account is that each note strikes a nerve of her face. She can distinguish photographs by passing them across her cheek, even in the case of a group, designating the exact position of each one. Colours she can tell in the same manner, whether they be those of stuff, ribbon, china, or any other substance. Her explanation is that each colour has its peculiar degree of heat, smoothness, roughness, or projection. White is cold; black, hot or raised; red, very hot and smooth; blue, hot and grating; brown, very grating, &c.

SPIRITUALISTIC PUBLISHING.—Until quite within the last two years the need of a firm of publishers for works on Spiritualism and occult subjects (who should, while possessing the confidence of the public, also be in a position to produce the works, entrusted to their care, in a good style), was very widely felt. This is, however, hardly the case now, for the Psychological Press Association has slowly been building up a business in this direction, for some time past. How well this firm have succeeded is borne out by the fact that during the last two years they have probably put into circulation a greater number of works on Spiritualism than anyone else has done during the whole of the previous decade. Amongst these may be mentioned Mr. Farmer's "New Basis," and "How to Investigate Spiritualism"; "M. A. (Oxon's)" "Psychography and Spirit Teachings"; Miss F. J. Theobald's "More Forget-Me-Nots," &c. These are shortly to be followed by a volume from the pen of Mrs. Howitt Watts, and two more volumes of "M. A. (Oxon's)," all uniform we understand, with the latter's recently issued "Spirit Teachings." They have also issued large editions of suitable works at very low prices,—prices which will bear comparison with those charged for the many popular reprints now before the public, e.g.,—"The New Basis," which was issued at threepence, "Psychography," at sixpence; and "How to Investigate," at slightly over a penny. The Psychological Press Association are, at present, occupying temporary premises at 38, Great Russell-street, where a large and varied selection of works is kept in stock, and where any work or journal on occult or kindred subjects may be obtained. We understand that towards the end of the current year they intend taking permanent premises in a more central position, and when we inform our readers, as we think we may without violating any confidence, that any surplus of receipts over expenditure is devoted to the disseminating of the literature of Spiritualism, we are sure all will wish them success in their very important work.

A Greenland Seeress and a Spirit Seance in the time of the Vikings.

"The Pirate," Note N, p. 241. Fortune-telling Rhymes.

... "There lived in the same territory (Greenland) a woman named Thorbiorga, who was a prophetess, and called Little Vola (or Fatal Sister), the only one of nine sisters who survived. Thorbiorga, during the winter, used to frequent the festivities of the season, invited by those who were desirous of learning their own fortune, and the future events which impended. Torquil being a man of consequence in this country, it fell to his lot to inquire how long the dearth was to endure with which the country was then afflicted; he therefore invited the prophetess to his house, having made liberal preparation, as was the custom, for receiving a guest of such consequence. The seat of the soothsayer was placed in an eminent situation, and covered with pillows filled with the softest eider-down. In the evening she arrived, together with a person who had been sent to meet her, and shew her the way to Torquil's habitation. She was attired as follows:—She had a sky-blue tunic, having the front ornamented with gems from the top to the bottom, and wore around her throat a necklace of glass beads (crystal?). Her head-gear was of black lamb skin, the lining being the fur of a wild white cat. She leant on a staff, having a ball at the top. The staff was ornamented with brass and the ball or globe with gems or pebbles. She wore a Hunland (or Hungarian) girdle, to which was attached a large pouch, in which she kept her magical implements. Her shoes were of seal-skin, dressed with the hair outside, and secured by long and thick straps, fastened by brazen clasps. She wore gloves of the wild cat's skin, with the fur inmost. As this venerable person entered the hall, all saluted her with due respect. But she only returned the compliment of such as were agreeable to her.

"Torquil conducted her with reverence to the seat prepared for her, and requested she would purify the apartment and company assembled by casting her eyes over them. The table being at length covered, such viands were placed before Thorbiorga as suited her character as soothsayer. ... The table being removed, Torquil addressed Thorbiorga, requesting her opinion of his house and guests, at the same time intimating the subject on which he and the company were desirous to consult her.

"Thorbiorga replied it was impossible for her to answer their inquiries until she had slept a night under his roof. The next morning, therefore, the magical apparatus necessary for her purpose was prepared, and she then inquired as a necessary part of the ceremony, whether there was any female present who could sing a magical song called Vardlokur. When no songstress, such as she desired, could be found, Gudrida, the daughter of Torquil, replied, 'I am no soothsayer or soothsayer; but my nurse, Haldisa, taught me, when in Iceland, a song called Vardlokur.' 'Then thou knowest more than I was aware of,' said Torquil. 'But as I am a Christian,' continued Gudrida, 'I consider these rites as matters which it is unlawful to promote, and the song itself as unlawful.' 'Nevertheless,' answered the soothsayer, 'thou mayest help us in this matter, without any harm to thy religion; since the task must remain with Torquil to provide everything necessary for the present purpose.'

"Torquil also earnestly entreated Gudrida till she consented to grant his request. The females then surrounded Thorbiorga, who took her place on an elevated stage. Gudrida then sang the magic song with a voice so sweet and tuneful as to excel anything that had been heard by any present. The soothsayer, delighted with the melody, returned thanks to the singer, and then said, 'Much have I now learned of death and disease approaching the country, and many things are now clear to me which before were hidden as well from me as others. Our present dearth of substance shall not long endure for the present, and plenty in the spring succeed to scarcity. The contagious diseases, also, which the country has for sometime afflicted, will in a short time take their departure. To thee, Gudrida, I can, in recompense for thy assistance on this occasion, announce a fortune of higher import than anyone could have conjectured. You shall be married to a man of name here in Greenland, but you shall not long enjoy that union; for your fate recalls you to Iceland, where you shall become the mother of a numerous and honourable family, which shall be enlightened by a luminous ray of good fortune. So my daughter, wishing thee health, I bid thee farewell.'

Habitual Apparition of the Living.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

Sir,—It is to be regretted that in the remarkable account of Mademoiselle Sagée in your issue of the 18th ult., you did not mention who the narrator was, who received the account from Mademoiselle de Guldenstubbé. When so astonishing a story is given to the world, it ought not to be weakened by the omission of any link in the chain of evidence by which it reaches us.—Yours, &c. H. W.

[We mentioned in a foot-note, that the narrative appeared in the first edition of "Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World," by the Hon. R. Dale Owen.—Ed. of "LIGHT."]

George Fox.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

Sir,—With regard to the paragraph quoted from the Medium and Daybreak in the last number of "LIGHT," let me say that if Mrs. Fox Jencken be related to George Fox, it cannot be by descent, and I have never heard of his having any relatives. He married, somewhat late in life, Margaret Fell, the widow of Judge Fell, whose sons had then grown up. There have been other families of Fox in the Society of Friends, and some of the name have been ministers.—H. T. H.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON &amp; THE PROVINCES.

The Late Dalston Association of Inquirers into Spiritualism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

Sir,—Kindly grant us space in your columns to announce that the above named Association, which has existed since 1870, has now had its affairs voluntarily wound up, and its existing members and the Society's effects have been transferred—on an equitable basis—to the Metropolitan Spiritual Lyceum, which body will carry on our work with increased facilities and advantages, as shortly it will enter into new and commodious premises in a central position.

All outstanding debts have been discharged, and an honourable record for the past thirteen years is the best evidence that the Association has not existed in vain.

On behalf of the members, we are, yours, &c.,

J. J. MORSE, President.

JOS. N. GREENWELL, Hon. Secretary.

GERALD MASSEY'S FIRST LECTURE AT ST. GEORGE'S HALL.

No more satisfactory or eloquent report of Mr. Massey's first lecture could be given than the authorised statement that the receipts of the first day, including the sale of course tickets, cleared the expenses of all four lectures. The audience, though not so numerous as on the opening day of Mr. Massey's earlier series in the same hall, was a large one, and thoroughly representative all round; including men of science, Spiritualists, and secularists, and the intellectual quality was obviously as fine as the day itself. "Thinking men and women" had responded to the lecturer's invitation. Mr. Massey's lecture was one that would be impossible to report, one that is difficult to summarise and not altogether easy to characterise. It was an application of the principle of evolution and the doctrine of development to the pre-historic past of man, with the view of shewing that from the time of the palæolithic age archaic man was burying the bones or bodies of the dead in the cave or grave as a place of re-birth. The Egyptian Mesken, which was continued in the European Miskin, means literally the re-birthplace. All the types that were buried with the dead, the horn of reindeer, bones of children, branch of birch, the hair, skin or shoe, the dog as watcher by night and guide through the darkness, the shapes, names, and total typology of the tomb, illustrated the idea of renewal, of reproduction or resurrection for another life. The natural genesis of embalment, which began when the bones were first coated with red earth, as in the mounds at Cochness, together with the Egyptian practice of it as a perfect art, were elaborately described, the meaning and the motive being traced step by step. In his reply to the Esoteric Buddhists Mr. Massey contended that they were misinterpreting or misapplying the ancient typology, which was once a common possession of all the Gnostics, and is Kamite in its origin.

At each stage the legends, beliefs, and superstitions respecting the different souls were referred to or related, and thus the natural genesis was traced to phenomena. For example, when the soul was represented as breath the Transmigration of souls was a possibility. In Egyptian, the word "sen" signifies both breath and transmigration; and the "ancestral soul" of breath was held to transmigrate from generation to generation. But this was neither physical nor spiritual in the modern sense.

"The prophetess, having afterwards given answers to all queries which were put to her, either by Torquil or his guests, departed to show her skill at another festival to which she had been invited for that purpose. But all which she presaged, either concerning the public or individuals, came truly to pass."

"The above narrative," adds Sir Walter, "is taken from the Saga of Erick Randa, as quoted by the learned Batholme in his curious work. He mentions similar instances, particularly of one Heida, celebrated for her predictions, who attended festivals, for the purpose, as a modern Scotsman might say, of spacing fortunes with a gallant tail or retinue of thirty male and fifteen female attendants.—See De Causis Contemptæ a Danis adhuc Gentilibus Mortis, lib. III. cap. 4. (Hafnia 1680, 4to.)

CURIOUS DREAMS.

The undermentioned dreams of mine may be interesting to the readers of "LIGHT."

"I once dreamt that I was lying in my bed and conversing with my father-in-law, who was standing before the looking-glass, brushing his hair. He was talking to me about his own funeral, and enjoining on me his wish that it should be a very simple one. The door being open, leading into the next room, I could see him lying in his bier, prepared for burial, and at the same time he was standing before the glass, as already stated. The judgment or the power of discriminating between the real and ideal—the natural and absurd being dormant—the brain held the two facts of his being alive and dead at the same time without any notion of their incongruity."

Another curious dream which I had at Chagford, Devon, last summer, was the following:—

"I was in a spacious room, in the centre of which was a table, and round it were seated some seven or eight officers in scarlet uniform, constituting, as I supposed, a court martial. Two individuals among them were evidently civilians from their sable garb, and both were very corpulent—one I imagined to be Mr. Herbert Spencer, and the other Mr. R. D. Blackmore, the novelist, though I have never seen either myself, and know nothing of their build, &c. Rising in a passion, as it seemed, I addressed this visionary tribunal, telling them in a burst of eloquence that though they imagined themselves to be bond fide creations of flesh and blood, I knew better—knew that they were only phantoms—simulacra, and that they would speedily dissolve into empty air again! I remember one of the civilians placing his hand on his forehead, and looking pityingly at the others, evidently implying that I was touched in the upper story. Then the whole scene faded away, and another dream followed."

This example is interesting as shewing, first, how very strong is the consciousness of individuality in dream (we never lose the sense of our own identity); next, how we reason logically from absurd and baseless premises—for, premising that the two civilians were Spencer and Blackmore, I addressed each in suitable words, making, if I remember rightly, some allusion to their respective works. Thirdly, this dream shews that occasionally, though rarely, we are conscious we are dreaming, aware and that the whole fabric of self-induced images will presently dissolve into nothingness. This might be called in the words of Poe "a dream within a dream," for I dreamed that I was dreaming! Some very subtle psychical process was exhibited here. Fourthly, this dream shews the exaltation of the intellectual (in this instance, the reasoning powers) in dream, for I spoke in words of burning eloquence, and am not especially eloquent in my waking state.—F. B. DOVETON.

Colonel Olcott's Buddhist Catechism has been translated into French under the title of "Le Bouddhisme selon le Canon de l'Eglise du Sud sous forme de Catéchisme."

PROGRESS IN SPAIN.—There is a marked increase of the love of reading in our rising generation, and many are attracted by works on psychological subjects. The circulation by our circle in Pampluna of books on Spiritualism has brought us an accession of members, and among them some mediums. The older disciples appreciate the efforts of us younger ones in this direction, and aid us with means for extending the knowledge of our rational philosophy. A circle has been formed for the systematic study of standard works on Spiritualism, and for progressive study of the phenomena, to enable us to speak to inquirers and answer opponents with effect.—Revue Spirite.

The Pythagorean doctrine of Metempsychosis was derived from this primitive original, perverted in the course of descent until it was no longer a true likeness of the archaic coinage of human thought. So when Plato, or any other metaphysical impostor, tells us that our knowledge is derived from memory, and our science is reminiscence, that is a sophism which may be traced back to the time when the faculty of memory, as internal perception, the manas, was the highest representative of a soul. In this way the lecturer showed the phenomenal origin of the Seven Souls of the Egyptians, Hindus, British and others.

The lecture culminated in a demonstration that the existence of a seventh soul, the highest, was made known in the Mysteries by means of abnormal phenomena, and that the final transformation in the series was effected by entrance into the trance conditions which constituted the perfect adept in the Mysteries. This was the secret of secrets in the ancient Gnosis. This was the secret of Buddha, of Hermes, and of Paul.

The subject of Mr. Massey's second lecture on Sunday, September, 16th, will be the "Non-historic Nature of the Fall of Man, and what it meant as Astronomical Mythos and Physiological Fable."

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

We learn from the Newcastle Daily Chronicle that on September 3rd, Mr. Frederick Ogle, mesmerist, made a number of mesmeric experiments in the hall of the Newcastle Spiritual Evidence Society, Weir's Court, Newgate-street, Newcastle. The gathering was promoted solely through a correspondence that has been going on in the columns of the Chronicle. Mr. T. P. Barkas in the first instance had asked in a letter if any person could recommend him to a clairvoyant sensitive. Mr. Grey, notary, of Newcastle Quayside, in another communication, made light of Mr. Barkas's application, and this was followed by a note from Mr. Ogle, intimating that he would, if requested, produce clairvoyants who might remove some of Mr. Grey's apparent incredulity. Beyond this the matter resolved itself into a challenge and an acceptance, Mr. Grey undertaking to present a bank cheque if a sensitive, under proper conditions, could, with his or her eyes blindfolded, read the number of the cheque. This was the principal test for which the meeting was fixed, and the interest in it drew to the hall an audience that filled it to an uncomfortable extent, while many persons were unable to obtain admittance at all. Dr. Ellis was voted to the chair, and the following gentlemen were selected as a committee to see that proper conditions were followed:—For Mr. Ogle—Messrs. T. P. Barkas, Burton and Thompson. For Mr. Grey—Dr. Evers, LL.D., and Messrs. Laverick and Rae.

The Chairman said he came prepared to put some tests himself, but having been elected to the chair he would undertake to fill that position.

After addresses from Mr. Ogle and Mr. Grey, and some discussion as to terms, it was agreed that the sensitive should read out, with his eyes blindfolded, the number of the cheque, the numbers of the date written on it, and the number denoting its value. The subject or sensitive employed by Mr. Ogle is known as "Dick, the pit lad." He is a short, slim young man, with something of an old-fashioned look about him. Mr. Ogle mesmerised him, until his features had almost become rigid, and he then was put through a number of ordinary mesmeric tests, such as singing, being compelled, while blindfolded by a handkerchief, to stop with a wave of the hand and so forth. The cheque test, however, involved more stringent conditions. His eyes were completely plastered up with gummed paper by Mr. Ogle, and this was covered with other paper until Dick fairly presented the appearance of a person who had been in battle and been sorely injured. The papers were surmounted by a thick handkerchief bound tightly round his head. Mr. Grey and his committee desired that a towel should also be thrown over his head, but this was resented by both Mr. Ogle and the audience, who held that the conditions had been fairly fulfilled. A minute examination of the arrangements for rendering the sensitive unable to see having been made, and adjudged satisfactory, the test proceeded. Mr. Grey produced his cheque; the numbers on the corner were folded in a certain position, and the cheque was handed to Mr. Ogle. It was handed, however, in a way that absolutely prevented the experimentalist from seeing the numbers. The latter were held about two feet away from the sensitive, at an elevation almost on a level with his brow, and in that position he was expected to exercise his marvellous power. There was a long pause, undisturbed by a single movement on the part of the audience. Then the voice of the pit lad was heard—"There is a crease at the commencement; I cannot make out the first number." The note was handed back to the chairman, and after the crease had been smoothed down, it was again placed in front of the blindfolded young man. "217206," he remarked. The signal that the reading was correct was given by Mr. Grey himself applauding, a step that was followed by others throughout the hall. In the second test—the numbers of the date—the sensitive was scarcely so correct, as he made out the numbers to be 4883. He, however, qualified his assertion, even before it was made, by the remark that he thought the first number was 4, but he was not quite sure. The chairman explained that this might be caused by the fact that part of the numbers were written in red and part in black ink. The test was at this point considered complete, the reading of the numbers representing the amount was not insisted on, and it was generally allowed that Mr. Ogle's subject had done all that could possibly be expected from him. This being so, the bandage was removed, and the process of tearing off the gummed paper from the eyes of the mesmerised subject was one evidently attended with pain, for it had become firmly affixed to the eyes and their surroundings. After this operation the sensitive was in a much exhausted condition. His features were very pale, his lips firmly compressed, and he appeared almost dead. Indeed, the chairman, after feeling his pulse and the region of his heart, declared that he was breathing very little.

Mr. Ogle said he had no doubt his subject had gone through a perfect agony of pain during the hour he had been under the mesmeric influence, but there was a power in the science to effectually restore him. This was done to the relief of all in about ten minutes afterwards, and the pit lad, safely again restored to his senses, left the platform amid hearty cheering.

Dr. Evers, one of Mr. Grey's committee, said he must express himself thoroughly disappointed with that evening's proceedings, because Mr. Ogle had insisted upon having all his own conditions. He would have been very much more pleased and satisfied if Mr. Ogle had allowed some conditions from the other side. So far as he was concerned, he felt convinced that the lad was thoroughly blindfolded, but he was dissatisfied that Mr. Ogle had insisted on all the conditions.

Mr. Grey, who appeared somewhat embarrassed, said he could not see how the sensitive could see—(loud laughter)—and he shared to some extent the sentiments expressed by Dr. Evers. He had, however, great pleasure in handing to Mr. Ogle the cheque, and he only wished it had been of greater value than it was. (Cheers.)

Mr. Ogle returned thanks for the cheque, and expressed himself gratified with the results. He had, however, another sensitive, a lady, whom he would introduce on the following night, and whom he thought would show still further the power of clairvoyance. They were willing to meet any of them again for another cheque—(laughter)—and would be happy to submit on Tuesday night to still further tests.

Mr. Barkas addressed the audience, commenting on what had been seen, and which he held to be of a most conclusive kind so far as the power of clairvoyance was concerned.

Votes of thanks to Mr. Grey and to the Chairman concluded the proceedings.

A second entertainment has been given by Mr. Ogle in the hall of the Newcastle Spiritual Evidence Society, Weir's Court, Newgate-street. There was again a crowded attendance, and Mr. T. P. Barkas presided. The tests were identical with those of the previous night, "Dick, the pit lad," and his wife, the two sensitives, while their eyes were hermetically closed—alike by mesmeric power and bandages—to all external luminous influences, naming articles held up before them, stating the time from watches borrowed from the audience, and deciphering the numbers on a Bank of England note. The failures were slight, and the tests on the whole were marvellously correct. The audience was inclined—at least a portion of it—to be more critical and hostile than on the evening before, but there was nevertheless a good deal of satisfaction and surprise expressed, and the committee—which included Dr. Ellis—openly vouched for the fact that the eyes of the subjects were thoroughly closed.

PLYMOUTH.

Mr. W. J. Colville, of Boston, U.S.A., delivered two lectures at St. James's Hall, Plymouth, on Sunday afternoon and evening. Mr. R. S. Clarke presided on both occasions. The subject of the afternoon lecture was "The Religion of the Coming Race." Speaking in the evening on the subject "Does Death End All?" Mr. Colville answered the question in the negative, contending that when death ensued man retained a conscious entity as a living intelligent unit in the spiritual world. Man possessed elements which must exist eternally—elements which, though they were indivisible, were, moreover, to be perceived in their effect. The knowledge of immortality he claimed to have come to man intuitively. He condemned the doctrine of hell-fire, and considered that the virtue of the Roman Catholic Church lay in its belief and teaching of the doctrine of purgatory. He considered that the man who taught the doctrine of hell-fire was more a blasphemer than Mr. Bradlaugh, who merely gave utterance to his firm convictions, and when the blasphemy laws came to be revised he thought they would bear more readily upon the teachers of the hell-fire doctrine than on anyone else. He allowed that in all ideas regarding our life here and hereafter there might be fictions and imaginations, but his definition of these terms was "distorted fact." In his concluding remarks he referred to the subject of Spiritualism, and observed, like many other things, when used rightly, it was good in its effect, but when abused it was productive of evil. At the close of his address the lecturer founded an improvised poem on six subjects named by the audience. They were:—Hope, Evolution, Love, Secularism, Charity, and the Brotherhood of Love. The impromptu poem occupied over half an hour in delivery.

"WHEN God wishes to show that a work is entirely in His hands, He reduces everything to despair:—then it goes on!"—BOSSUET.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M.A. (Oxon)."

A correspondent informs me that "The Economy of Human Life," which I noticed on the 1st inst., is not, as it professes to be, the work of an ancient Brahmin, nor is it translated, as alleged, from an Indian manuscript. My correspondent possesses a copy (and that not of the original edition) published in Brook-street, Derby, in 1816, by Henry Mozley. It is the production of Robert Dodsley, the well-known author, and the means adopted to promote its sale were of the same questionable type as the story of the apparition of Mrs. Veal, in "Drelinecourt on Death," which has taken in so many wonder-hunters. I can only say that the sentiments contained in the little volume, whether Eastern or Western in origin, are pure and beautiful, and worthy of all commendation: albeit the moralist must condemn the means selected to attract attention. When critically examined the tone of the aphorisms is palpably Western.

"The Ghost-hunting Society" (as the Fall Mall Gazette always calls a society which has a proper name of its own—I wonder would it call the Entomological Society, "The Beetle and Bug-hunting Society?")—has found favour in French eyes. M. Darmstetter, in the Parlement, deplors the tendency of the age to make light of things spiritual, and to bound human knowledge and interests by what is material and objective to the senses. This, he thinks, is a reaction from the "debauched mysticism of the last two or three thousand years," but he finds it unworthy of any science properly so called. "It would be wiser," he says, "if science, instead of sneering at it, would study the subject; but it is afraid of being accused of Spiritualism, and therefore enshrouds itself in haughty ignorance." That has been the ostrich-policy of the past, but it is rapidly giving place. Facts are stubborn things.

The Spiritualists of America are endeavouring to organise themselves, with what success remains to be seen. At the outset, however, the desire for organisation is not unanimous. Moreover, the experience of the past is not encouraging. Even when Spiritualism was in its purely phenomenal stage, and when those who dealt with it were chiefly concerned with externals, it was practically impossible to organise with any hope of permanent success. Attempts in that direction, however patiently and discreetly made, were only partially and temporarily successful. There was a lack of cohesion, a tendency to individualisation that seemed to hinder all efforts at external union. Spiritualists had arrived at their convictions by such different methods that they regarded the broad subject very variously. Many, if not most of them, had come into a new sphere of liberty, from one where they had been tied and bound and subjected to a discipline against which they had finally revolted. They were in no humour to bind themselves again by any fetters. For these, among many other reasons, Spiritualism has never organised with real success.

From one point of view this has been its weakness. Union is strength if it be real, and a want of real union would necessarily imply a want of strength. But it was uniformity rather than union that was found to be practically unattainable. The whole complex scheme of spiritual thought and action which we loosely call Spiritualism, is disruptive, reformatory, and consequently, in its first methods of operation, destructive. The old must be changed; improved where that was possible, uprooted and got rid of where no hope of improvement remained. In any case the agency was not conservative in its apparent action, though frequently it was more so than a careless observer would imagine. But, be this as it may, the action of Spiritualism on human thought has been and is increasingly to throw down barriers of dogma, to clear away accumulated under-growths, of tangled thought or prejudice, to let in light and air and to prepare the ground for a new crop. No one method has been uniformly employed to effect this great change. Each individual soul has been approached by the means best suited to arrest its attention and awaken its dormant life. Infinitely various have been the agencies employed, and as a consequence the experiences of Spiritualists are as various as the complexion of their several minds, and the inner necessities of their individual souls.

To organise these newly-awakened individualities into a symmetrical body, animated by one mind, and acting on one plan, was an impossibility. It was apparently not desired by those who directed this great attempt to reform and influence human thought. Some cause or other frustrated the wisest plans, and led the most zealous advocates of organisation to feel that they were in the presence of a problem that could not be solved by the methods found applicable to similar ones that were not complicated, as this was, by the action and will of unseen spiritual intelligences. It became evident that whatever might be done in the future, when the seething was over, and the disturbing causes grew less active, the present was not the time for a hard and fast organisation. The attempt was one that it was well and wise to make, but it was also well to abandon it when it failed of a reasonable measure of success.

And if the attempt at organisation was without success then, its chances have not grown stronger now that Spiritualism has passed into a new phase of its existence. No careful observer can fail to see that this is so. The first feelings of mere wonder, and sometimes of awe, have to a great extent passed away, to be succeeded by a more philosophical and perhaps truly religious, though by no means theological attitude. Spiritualism, instead of crystallising into an independent form, has shewn a strong tendency to animate, modify, and influence other forms of thought. In the political terminology of the day, its method is permeation. It is toning down the harsh and crude lights and shadows of popular theology. Witness the breadth of view, the increased charity and tolerance, the loosening of rigid dogma, the large flexibility of belief, that characterise the best modern religious thought. It is leavening the literature of the day, and turning men's minds to the discussion of subjects which, a few years ago, would have interested no one, or which would have been held to be settled for ever by a text from the Bible, or a dogmatic definition of faith by the Church. Witness, among many such, a remarkable disquisition in the August number of the Nineteenth Century, by Mr. Norman Pearson, on the state "After Death." Witness the discussions in the various public journals on such phenomena as the Psychical Society has yet addressed itself to. All this is dispersive, not concentrative. Modern thought is permeated by the new ideas before it is aware of either their source, their nature, or their tendency.

And this method of imperceptible permeation is eminently characteristic of the working of Spirit. It is hard indeed to think how spiritual workers could have been supposed to act in any other way. It has been so at all times, when, as in the days of the Christ, an effort has been made to influence human thought. The wind, He explained to one of His inquirers who was best able to understand the similitude, is traceable only in its effects. Its action is unfettered, its origin and destination unknown, but its potency is evident. So with the action of spirit. What was true then is true still. It was not till centuries had passed away that the teachings of the Christ were crystallised and His followers organised into a church. It will apparently be long before this latest attempt to renovate and guide human thought is similarly embodied in an organisation that can act successfully as the medium of its spiritual influence.

I have been so long absent from home, and out of reach of books and papers, and deprived, which is worse, of that repose which is necessary for thought, that I have necessarily omitted to draw attention to many very interesting papers, such as that of Mr. Norman Pearson's to which I referred above, and to which I hope to recur next week. I trust I may then also acknowledge the comments made on my notes on "The God-idea," and shew that I have not altogether failed to profit by the correspondence which it was one purpose of my brief and imperfect notes to elicit.

A NEW CATALOGUE OF WORKS ON SPIRITUALISM AND THE OCCULT SCIENCES.—We have now before us the proof sheets of the autumn catalogue of new and other works published and sold by the Psychological Press Association, and have been requested to draw attention to it. This we gladly do and can say that we do not remember to have seen one more complete than that in question. It not only contains a list of the English standard works on the subject, but includes nearly every book or pamphlet published in America, and in the French, German, Spanish, and Italian languages, while to facilitate business, arrangements are being made to keep a stock of most of the books enumerated. The catalogue, which consists of 32 pp., will be sent post free on application.

"Think well of the dead" is a saying of deeper meaning than the world imagines. The writer was solicited by a communicating spirit to cease entertaining certain injurious thoughts about him. Our thoughts in the body are as perceptible to some spirits as words used to be to them when they were in the body.—Harbinger of Light.

STRUGGLE OF TRUTH IN EMERGING INTO LIGHT.

The unfolding of great Truths would appear to run ever upon the same divinely appointed lines; thus is it, that history is said to continually repeat itself. What has been the fate of a great Truth in one century, and of its apostles, disciples, and martyrs, we may safely anticipate will once more be its fate and the fate of its followers, in the succeeding centuries; the names of the actors, of course, changed, the manifestation of the truth changed, but the principle unchanged, and unchangeable, by which Truth Universal is ever being evolved.

Of this observation a noteworthy example may be found, if we compare the history of the unfolding of the modern manifestations of "Spiritualism" with that, in the last century, of their precursor, herald, and indeed, in one sense, of their mother, Mesmerism or Animal Magnetism.

The following extract, relative to the progress and persecution of the beneficent discovery of Dr. Mesmer, is taken from the forthcoming first volume of "Pioneers of the Spiritual Reformation," by Mrs. Howitt-Watts, from the Life of Kerner, where reference is made to Kerner's last book, "Researches after Memorials of Mesmer."

From the perusal of this extract, a salutary moral cannot fail to be drawn.

Something Regarding Mesmer's Followers and Opponents in Germany, also Regarding the Gradual Development of Animal Magnetism.

Through Puységur's investigations Animal Magnetism assumed a new phase during the time of Mesmer's sojourn in France. Puységur resided at Strasburg, from whence his doctrine spread itself throughout Germany. Puységur was the first experimenter who, quitting the simple magnetic influence upon the patient, assumed that Somnambulism and its power of inward contemplation alone, constitutes its healing power. A sick boy, his patient, in whom Somnambulism had unfolded the faculty of inward vision, had led him to these conclusions. In Somnambulism Puységur believed that he had discovered the veritable magnetism; and in this spirit gave publicity to his own discovery.

Upon Mesmer's return to Germany he found that these new ideas had spread throughout the land, and this circumstance again greatly embittered his life. Regarding what he considered the dangers of Somnambulism and the somnambulist treatment, Mesmer has written many papers which betray a wounded and suffering nature.

Affecting it is thus to observe two great discoverers and benefactors of the human race, through the narrowness of vision inherent in humanity, or through its unconquered egotism, thus blinded to the relative importance of the truth of each other's system, and through this pitiable blindness retarding the calm development of universal truth, of which each possessed a portion, and of which each believed himself the devoted servant.

From Strasburg, where Puységur's sect had arrived, Mesmer's doctrine was brought to Bremen. Lavater, giving his allegiance to Puységur's system, had received magnetism on the altogether mystical and religious side. Certain friends and imitators of his having exaggerated his views, the whole subject was exposed to the ridicule of the incredulous and of the utterly ignorant, and thus the very wildest ideas were entertained by the public of magnetism and magnetisers. Lavater, upon his appearance at Bremen, was greeted in the papers by would-be witty comic songs of a most disgusting and silly nature. That Lavater's own views regarding magnetism, were clear, philosophical, and calm, various passages in his writings bear testimony.

The circulation through Germany of the unfavourable opinion passed upon Mesmer's discovery by the French Academy, damaged Mesmer's reputation immensely; for especially in that age did Germany, not alone as regards dress and manners, but also in matters of opinion, follow the French nation with a pitifully servile imitation. Thus the opinion of a body of men, supposed by their learning and wisdom to be able to embrace and comprehend the whole of the laws of the world, was regarded by Germany as the utterance of an oracle. This feeling existed to so great an extent, that no one dared to defend Magnetism through the terror of being calumniated. The very name of Animal Magnetism was tabooed. Dr. Eberhard Gmelin, of Heilbronn, a contemporary of Mesmer, an intellectual investigator of his discovery, and to whom we owe the possession of six volumes of conscientiously recorded experiences, and much valuable theoretical matter, regarding Magnetism, already, in the year 1787, has said in one of his volumes, that he would prefer to call his magnetic researches, "Experiments in the Power possessed by Human Nature by means of the living Human-Touch," owing to the unconquerable objection in the public mind to the term "Animal Magnetism." In fact by calling one of his works, Materials for Anthropology, he thus gave way to the public prejudice against Mesmer's nomenclature.

Gmelin was a man in whom no qualification failed to render him a thoroughly competent observer of this subtle power of nature. His observation succeeded in awakening a lively interest in the subject; and that he was an enlightened and thoroughly experienced physician, as well as a clear-seeing psychologist, not even the most prejudiced opponent could deny. His works were full of instruction, even for the unbeliever, and although they might not always work conviction, they prepared the way for it. Before Reil and Humboldt's experiments, in 1778, Dr. Gmelin wrote about a fluid within, or rather upon, the nerves, bearing much relation to electricity, and which he termed nerve juice, or nerve ether; and, in 1793, after the publication of Reil's excellent writings and Humboldt's galvanic experiments, he published other important observations.

Neither did Wienholt in Bremen fare much better than Gmelin, in the opposition which he encountered from the learned world. He, in the years 1803 and 1806, wrote upon the subject of Animal Magnetism, at great length, in a sober, searching, and philosophical spirit, and proved it to be a special power of nature, and an extraordinary healing medium. But he also, for a certain time, bore reproach and was utterly misunderstood. Within fifteen years, however, Wienholt treated, either directly himself or through others, eighty sick persons. The greater number of these were cases which he either beheld abandoned by medical art, or which could only hope for a protracted cure: cases of various kinds of diseases, inflammatory as well as chronic, nervous as well as other tedious maladies. There were individuals of almost every age and rank, and of both sexes, married and unmarried; and the magnetic treatment affected these patients in the most remarkable manner. In some of these cases the improvement was only temporary, in other partial, in others—and these not a few—the cure was complete. Wienholt made use of electricity combined with Animal Magnetism in his experiments. In these cases the sleep-waking condition excited the greatest surprise, and became the chief stumbling-block.

During the period of Gmelin's and Wienholt's activity in this field of labour, Animal Magnetism attained, through the discovery of galvanism, to more respectful consideration in the learned world. Already, and principally through Gmelin's researches—to which we have already referred—the existence of a so-called life-atmosphere around the nerves, was believed to exist. This supposition was rendered more probable by Reil's excellent work upon the nerves, and at length was clearly demonstrated by Humboldt's galvanic experiments with animal-fibres; and thus was Animal Magnetism brought nearer to physical science. Equally favourable were the observations of Spallanzani and Fontana. On every side, old conventional opinions and doctrines which had taken deep root, were seen to be attacked and destroyed by new opinions and doctrines, and thus people at length accustomed themselves to inquire with more equanimity into Animal-Magnetism, and gradually discovered that it really did contain some truth.

Through Schelling's Nature-Philosophy, other worthy minds were encouraged to cast off the chains of the old systems, and take higher flights through the illimitable realms of nature. Thus the arrogant tone of the would-be-all-wise was not so universal, and practical physicians who formerly had been opposed to Magnetism, even deigned to operate by its means. The men who at that period principally accepted the Mesmeric theory were K. E. Schelling, W. Hufeland, Klug, Wolfart, Fr. Hufeland, Kuntzmann, Petzold, Nasse, Muller, and other physicians in Berlin. At a later period followed that remarkable man whom, comparatively speaking, we have only lately lost, Dr. Ennemoser; and who has given forth to the world, both practical and theoretical works upon the subject. Also Eschenmayer has been an invaluable labourer in the field. Dr. Karl Passavant, of Frankfort, we have also to thank for his Researches into Life-Magnetism and Clear-seeing, which has become a classical work. Also Count Zappari, and his unfortunate countryman Count Mailath, have both earned our thanks through their peculiar conception and development of the Mesmeric doctrine.

It is especially through the exertions of the above-named men that Mesmer's discovery enjoyed a triumph, already before the death of Mesmer; although at a period when personally he was entirely forgotten, and now (in the year 1856), forty years after his death, a yet greater triumph exists in the appearance of magnetic table-turning, and of Reichenbach's discovery of the odyllic light and force. (In 1883, however, more marvellous has become this triumph, through the ever unfolding confirmation of the truth of Mesmer's discovery, as demonstrated by the varied phenomena of Spiritualism: that fuller development of occult force, the dawn of which Dr. Justinus Kerner was one of the first to proclaim.)

It ought not to surprise us, that Mesmer was not comprehended by the learned men of his day, seeing that he was through his views of nature, forty years in advance of his age. Nevertheless it is almost inconceivable that during all these years of the progress of magnetic inquiry, personally, Mesmer should have been forgotten, and this not alone by his opponents, but by those who honoured and practised his doctrine. Throughout the numerous volumes of the writings of Gmelin and Wienholt upon Animal Magnetism, between the years 1787 and 1805, you may seek in vain for the name of Mesmer. And with other writers it is the same. They well knew what persecution and contempt Mesmer had drawn upon himself, by the expression of opinions which were the same as their own; nevertheless, nowhere throughout these writings does one meet with one single expression of sympathy with Mesmer: nowhere a defence of him. It seems as though they dreaded to touch upon that name of "Mesmer," so hooted at by the scientific world. Not one of these writers took the trouble to search out the discoverer of that power of nature which they were themselves thus developing and defending, in order to become personally acquainted with him: to know what kind of a man he was: to hear from his own lips the explanation of his theory: to learn from himself the practical part of his doctrine: to be shewn by himself his magnetic manipulation; in short, to drink of the knowledge which they sought at its very fountain head.

Mesmer, during the greater portion of his later life, took no part whatsoever in the discussions of the scientific world; took no interest even in the magnetic labours of his followers. He dwelt in the most perfect retirement at Frauenfeld, a blessing to the sick and the poor of that neighbourhood. He appears, however, to have deeply sympathised with the great political changes occurring in Europe.

Various of Mesmer's friends in France sought to recall him into their midst from Switzerland, representing to him that his ideas would never be comprehended in that country, and seeking to induce him to publish his writings in the French language. Nevertheless to France Mesmer did not return.

Mesmer was already an old man of seventy-eight, when a circle of his zealous disciples in Berlin applied to him by letter, through Reil and Wolfart, to visit them, in order that they might hear his doctrine explained to them by himself. Throughout the rest of Germany, at this period, Mesmer personally was as one dead. It is easily understood that Mesmer, who had in his earlier life declined a similar invitation, now, in his old age, and when he was weary of scientific discussion, did not accede to his friends' desire. We have reasons, however, to believe that from this application of his Berlin friends resulted Wolfart's invaluable edition of Mesmer's writings. With the greater portion of his fortune, Mesmer had lost in France the whole of his papers. Nevertheless, in the later years of his life, during his solitude, Mesmer employed himself with marvellous patience in re-writing his ideas and experience in French.

MRS. HOWITT WATT'S FORTHCOMING VOLUME.—In answer to correspondents we are requested to state that this work is now all but complete, and that it will be published almost immediately. We have seen the proof sheets and believe it to be a volume almost unique of its kind.

CHARITY makes the best construction of things and persons; and is so far from being an evil spy, a backbiter or a detractor, that it excuses weaknesses, extenuates miscarriages, makes the best of everything, forgives everybody, serves all—and hopes to the end. It moderates extremes, is always for expedients, labours to accommodate differences, and had rather suffer than revenge, and is so far from exacting the utmost farthing that it had rather lose than seek its own violently.—WILLIAM PENN.

REMARKABLE SEANCES.

No. II.

On Friday, July 18th, 1869, I attended a sitting at the house of Mr. and Mrs. Everitt, 26, Penton-street, Pentonville.

There were present, the Countess de Medina Pomar, (now the Countess of Caithness), Miss Anna Blackwell (the well-known translator of the writings of Kardec), Mr. Nisbet, of Glasgow, and Mrs. Nisbet (the two first named accompanied us to the house), and Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall.

The room in which we met was small, and the evening was intensely hot; so hot that the usual window curtains had been removed; the atmosphere was, therefore, unfavourable, and more than an hour passed before manifestations commenced.

The peculiar manifestations associated with the medium—Mrs. Everitt—are what have been termed “audible voices,” that is to say, voices apparently human, so far as tone and language are concerned; heard, not in isolated words, or detached sentences, but in conversations continuing during an hour or more, uninterruptedly. These sittings are always in the dark; indeed, there must be total darkness. A paper tube is to some extent a necessary accompaniment of these sittings; the spirit who speaks is understood to speak through it. I say to some extent, for on this occasion (and on a previous occasion), at my request, the spirit spoke for some minutes without the tube, telling me this: “The tube is not necessary; but we condense in it the breath of the medium, and we are thus able to use her for a longer time; we do not, as some think we do, speak by her lips.” When the spirit spoke without the tube, it was the same voice, only it had lost the peculiar tone it had received in passing through the tube.

The spirit who spoke by the aid of the medium called himself “John Watt.” His language was remarkably refined; there was no taint of vulgar intonation or common phraseology such as we almost invariably meet in persons of comparatively humble condition, and uneducated. On my remarking this, and asking him had he been in a high or low position while in this life, he replied, “I was in what you would call a low position. I was a mechanic engineer, but I have progressed greatly since I left earth.” I asked him how long ago that was. He answered, “Of your time is it thirty-two years, and I had been thirty years on earth when I was called from it.” The voice was clear, each word, in a loud whisper, being distinctly heard, the enunciation neither slow nor rapid, but somewhat emphatic and impressive.

Why darkness is a requisite, and why a tube should be an auxiliary at such sittings, I do not know; but in all such cases both seem to be requisite.

While the party was being arranged round the large square table (and the arrangement was not a matter of chance, but was made by some unseen power, dictating by heavy raps), we were directed, still by raps, to read the 6th chapter of the Acts, which I did, and then to pray, which we all did—silently, but, I believe, fervently. My own prayer was mainly that God would keep us from all evil influences, and give us only the influences of the holy and the good. After waiting more than half an hour, the medium became entranced. She was apparently rigid, her eyes were closed, and she seemed to have lost all will. She was moved, seemingly by no power of her own, to seat herself upon another chair, about a foot from the end of the piano. Leaning sideways over the end of the instrument, she made passes, as though magnetising it. No sooner had she ceased to make passes over the piano, than we distinctly heard the strings vibrating, and producing soft, wild snatches of sound, like the distant tones of an Æolian harp. All this time the medium sat passive, her hands on her lap, distinctly visible by the light of a candle, at a distance of a foot from the piano.

The candle was then extinguished, and we heard a tramp of measured footsteps in all parts of the room; and presently a whispering voice sounded from the direction of the medium—“The blessing of God and the Lord Jesus Christ be with you, dear friends: I fear I shall not do much to-night, the atmosphere is unfavourable: I cannot see you clearly: the room is full of mist.”

The persons present each and all, then questioned the spirit, “John Watt.” It would occupy too much space to give in detail the conversation that ensued. To some of our questions the spirit replied “I do not know,” to others, “I am not permitted to answer that.” To one lady he said, “You desire to know too much of too many things in Spiritualism: you are like the butterfly that goes from flower to flower and gets nothing.”

Mrs. Hall then asked him if he prayed in the sphere in which he was; he answered, certainly, prayer was continual with them, not in phrases, but in spirit; and he quoted—repeating them slowly, and with remarkably grave emphasis—the two well-known verses by James Montgomery:—

“Prayer is the soul’s sincere desire,
Uttered or unexpressed:
The motion of a hidden fire,
That trembles in the breast.”

“Prayer is the burden of a sigh,
The falling of a tear:
The upward glancing of an eye
When none but God is near.”

Not remembering at the moment the authorship of the verses, I asked him by whom they were written: he did not know.

Among other things James Watt told us, that persons should never come to sittings in dresses of silk: silk being a non-conductor of electricity; dresses should be of cotton or wool.

On a previous occasion I had asked him as to the form he now had: he said it was the body he had on earth spiritualised—a spiritual body. “But,” I said, “if you had been hunchbacked while on earth, how would it be now?” He said, “I should have no hunchback here; but if I were visible to you (which I could be, though not with this mediumship), I should appear to you with a hunchback in order that you might recognise me.” I had asked him if I had known him on earth, whether I should know him in his present condition. On that occasion he brought with him a little Indian boy who told, in a boy’s small voice, a touching story of his sad experience, and death by violence on earth, and of his present happy state. Several times during this sitting, we saw lights in various parts of the room: they resembled that which is given out by the glow-worms, but one was much larger, apparently six inches in length. I asked John Watt to explain them; he said he could not do so then, he must soon leave us, for the medium was becoming exhausted, but before he left us he hoped we should hear the music he knew we all desired to hear.

It was explained by Mr. Everitt that his wife’s guardian spirit sometimes brought with her several child-spirits who played on the piano that occupied one part of the room. He fervently hoped that manifestation might be given to-night. We waited patiently. The candle was then directed to be lit, and we saw the medium seated as she was when she first occupied the chair—rigid; her eyes closed, and apparently unconscious; the tube on the top of the piano; her right arm leaning on the piano, supporting her head.

The light was again extinguished, when sounds issued from the piano: the keys seemed to be lightly struck several times, though the cover was down. It was an ordinary cottage piano, the top was covered with books, a heavy inkstand, and two candlesticks. It was subsequently closely inspected by me and others. To have removed the top in order to set free the front, would have been a work of time and noise; some of us were seated within two feet of it, the room being very small.

Suddenly we heard a faint, sweet melody, not played on the keys, but on the wires; the melody continued for full five minutes; those present who were musical described it as of great beauty and originality: sometimes loud, sometimes soft—dying away at length into a murmur of sound, and leaving an echo, so to speak, of inexpressible delicacy and sweetness.

Mrs. Hall said, that the touch on the keys of the piano was like a child’s touch—picking out one note after the other—but the playing on the wires was that of an accomplished player, who understood melody, harmony, and expression.

John Watt, when it was over, said, “I am very glad you have heard that music.” Mrs. Hall asked, “Have you music where you are now?” “Oh,” he said, “music infinitely more beautiful than that.”

He told us the guardian spirit of Mrs. Everitt had told him that morning why she was specially permitted to attend upon her (her name was Anne Blower). “This morning Anne told me what made her wish to be with Mrs. Everitt. When she was a little girl at school, Anne was her teacher, and as teacher recommended all the girls to get a book, and set down in it all good and evil thoughts, all good and evil actions, that occurred to them, or that they had done. There were a few girls who got the books, and began attending to their teacher’s advice; but all except one failed in the perfect truthfulness that was required. They did not enter what was against themselves, only what was in their favour, but Mrs. Everitt had put down everything—she was perfectly true, and that won the heart of Anne so much, that she desired to be with her, to help her, because she was, and is true.”

After that John Watt said, “I must go now; but not without my prayer: May God and our Lord Christ bless you, comfort you, help you, and give you happiness in this world, and in that to which in due time you will come. May His light guide you; and His help be with you here and hereafter. Amen.”

The sitting closed, the candles were lit: and the medium was found exactly as I have described her.

I have merely related the facts as they occurred during the two hours occupied in the sitting. I could, of course, add much. We asked at least fifty questions; to most of which the spirit gave not only intelligent, but singularly terse and sensible replies.

Fraud was out of the question; it was a sheer impossibility that a human hand could have played on the wires of the piano, removing and replacing the top and front, and the books and other things on the top.

The medium was (I do not speak it disrespectfully) not an educated person; she could not play on any musical instrument; she has never, under any circumstances, received payment for the exercise of her gift; she is the wife of a humble, though highly intelligent, man; and in no way could he or she be benefited by these manifestations; indeed, the contrary is the fact.

But I say fraud was impossible on the five occasions I witnessed those manifestations—accompanied by several persons as scrupulously, nay, as suspiciously inquiring as myself.

Such sittings, and some even more astounding than these, were of frequent occurrence in this house. But two of these sittings, quite as remarkable, took place in my house. Moreover, I trust I shall induce belief that there are few persons so utterly abandoned to evil as solemnly to ask God’s blessing on a pre-arranged and pre-determined fraud, that a man and woman respected in all the relations of life, good parents and citizens, could be so entirely wicked as blasphemously to implore God’s aid and then wilfully to devise a profitless cheat.

I am sure that they themselves believed in these manifestations as truly as Martha and Mary believed in the raising from death of Lazarus their brother.

And I do not for one moment hesitate to express my entire conviction that these manifestations were real, true, holy, and emphatically for good.

We who were present at the sitting on the 18th July, testify to the accuracy of the above details.

A GHOSTLY NARRATIVE COMMUNICATED BY
A. M. H. W.

The Ghost of Peter Pearson.

From a letter of a lady residing at Derwent Bank near Broughton, Cumberland, to a relative.

“Jane Pearson, a minister amongst us” (the Society of Friends), and a native of Broughton, whose name is probably mentioned in the “Journal of James Dickinson” (also a minister and a native of these parts) with whom I believe she sometimes travelled “in the ministry,” lived here with her brother, a “Friend” of the yeoman class.

Peter Pearson, her brother, died and was buried in the old burying-ground between Maryport and Broughton (still belonging to “Friends” and planted with trees), known by the name of “the Sepulchre.”

Jane Pearson and her sisters continued to live here, inheriting, in common with some other member or members of the family, the land left by Peter.

Some time after the death of the latter, a neighbour, who, whether sailor or not I cannot say, had been over sea and did not know of Peter Pearson’s death, landing at Maryport, set off to walk home to Broughton, some four miles or less.

It was a moonlight night, and on passing a gate between the Sepulchre and Broughton, the man saw Peter Pearson standing by the gate, exactly as he had often done. He felt, of course, no surprise, but made some remark to him, on which Peter Pearson said, “Wilt thou tell my sister Jane I wish to speak to her here, and I wish her to come immediately?”

I suppose it would be about fifteen minutes’ walk from the village. The man went on, and gave the message, which was received with astonishment, but with no fear, by the intrepid Jane, who had already retired to bed. She merely replied, “Very well,” dressed herself and went to the place indicated and remained some time, to the surprise of her family, who, however, do not seem to have questioned her much. They were probably accustomed to receive Jane’s movements as right, without reason asked or given.

A short time afterwards a field was sold by Jane, and a sum of money paid by her to the person from whom her brother had bought the field, without further explanation than that it was owing to him. But she had not known this till the night in question.

It was said by her family that “Jane returned home in a very solemn and weighty spirit,” but gave them no explanation or account of what she had seen or heard, only that she “believed it was right for her” to act as she did about the field.

This was told to me as a child by an aunt of my own on passing said Sepulchre—not as a wonderful story, but as a simple and undoubted fact, and as such I heard it, and believed it. . . . I never heard the story again that I remember, and never asked any questions about it, but was greatly impressed with it, and am sure that this was what I heard, and as I heard it.

NUMBERS OF “LIGHT” WANTED.—To complete sets we require a few numbers, as follow: No. 105 for January 6th, 1883; No. 106 for January 13th, and No. 128 for June 16th, 1883. Full price will be given for any copies sent to our office.

CELESTIAL WISDOM.—“Confide to God that thou hast from Him! Oh, thou soul weary of wandering! Confide to the Truth that which is from the Truth within thee, and thou shalt lose nothing; and thou shalt again blossom forth from thy blight, and shalt become healed of all thine infirmities, and that which thou hast lost shall be compensated to thee and renewed; and shall no more remove from thee, but shall perpetually remain and continue with thee, as God perpetually is; and remains.”—ST. AUGUSTINE.

THE PRESENT POSITION OF THE C.A.S.

In order to avoid misconception and to correct the erroneous statement recently made by a contemporary that the C. A. S. had closed its doors, we think it well to put the more salient facts before our readers.

The announcement which appeared in the Herald of Progress that "the support is insufficient to maintain it (the C. A. S.) any longer" is quite unwarranted, and partakes more of the nature of gossip, than that of sober fact. It is quite true, we believe, that the Council of the C. A. S. find themselves just now in pecuniary embarrassments, from the fact that a good many members, on whose subscriptions the Council felt themselves justified in relying, have failed to keep their engagements; but this difficulty will no doubt be surmounted. The present position of the C. A. S., however much it is to be regretted, is doubtless the necessary out come of the transition state through which public Spiritualism in this country has passed during the last few years, and there can, we think, be little doubt that the work of the C. A. S. on the old lines is complete, and that to serve the present and future requirements of the movement, a somewhat different line of action is needed to that which has obtained in the past. None recognise this fact more thoroughly, nor are any more alive to the vital necessity of a change of action, than the present Council of the C. A. S., and, we need hardly add, they are thoroughly determined to conform their methods to the new state of things, and do all in their power to make the Association a still greater power in influencing public opinion than has ever been the case. The best work of the C. A. S. has been done very quietly. Yet its influence has probably, for that very reason, been the more marked, and we have little doubt, that under favourable auspices, and a wise modification of method, it will still be able to present a good record of its work to the friends of the movement.

It must also be remembered that from the onset the C. A. S. has had to contend with adverse influences, such as do not, except in very rare instances, beset other organisations of the kind. From the first, the Executive had to reckon with petty jealousies and needless opposition; and even now, late in the day as it is, we hear of attempts about to be made still further to divide the public forces of Spiritualism, by the proposed establishment of other reading rooms and a library, in the immediate vicinity of the C. A. S. premises.

This we look upon as not only unwise, but very unfair. Unwise in that the C. A. S. has attained a position and possesses a library, which any new organisation could not hope to attain or possess for many years to come, and the only outcome of any present effort, independent of the C. A. S., would be somewhat to drain that Association without producing any corresponding benefit; and it is unfair, seeing that it hampers the Executive of the C. A. S. at a time when they are using their best energies to meet the wants of the public.

Surely no new effort in this direction is necessary until the C. A. S. closes its doors for good, or has proved incapable of meeting the public needs.

Briefly and plainly then, the C. A. S. has not shut its doors through the support being insufficient. The rooms have only been closed, as is usual, during the vacation of the secretary, and at a time of year when very few Spiritualists are in London and when the number of calls made at the rooms are reduced to a minimum. Long before the winter's work commences, however, the rooms will again be opened, and we hope that under new auspices the C. A. S. will shew that it has still work in plenty to accomplish.

The foregoing is written on our own responsibility, but we thought it best in the absence of the secretary to make some such explanation with the view of preventing as far as possible any misapprehension.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO CONTRIBUTORS.

For some time past we have increasingly felt the arduous nature of the task we have assumed in the direction of a paper like "LIGHT." Undertaken, as it was, as a labour of love, and as a not altogether unimportant tax upon time and leisure which would otherwise have been devoted to relaxation from the cares and anxiety of business life, our duties are by no means lightened by the receipt of communications of extraordinary length. It is very perplexing to us to have to deal with them at all. They are, no doubt, in many cases, of sterling value, and the subjects on which they treat of absorbing interest to a few of our readers. The majority of these, however, complain (we think, with some show of reason) that special subjects are often allowed to monopolise too large a proportion of the space at our command. There is no doubt that this question of the length of contributions requires consideration; and, holding as we do, that an author can divide what he has to say, so as to complete any one branch of his subject in from two to two and a-half columns, we hope all concerned will take it in good part when we say that for the future we must absolutely decline even to consider the suitability of any communication for these pages, if it exceeds the stipulated length. By taking a little trouble, an author can, as a rule, very easily split his subject up into two or more sections, and make each of them complete in itself. In these circumstances, we think we may fairly ask for the co-operation of our contributors and correspondents, resulting, we hope, in mutual advantage, and certainly in our personal appreciation of any consideration shewn in this direction.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.—A special meeting of the Council of the C. A. S. will be held on Tuesday evening next, at 6.30 p.m. The business is urgent, and it is earnestly hoped that members of the Council will make a point of attending.

A UNIVERSITY INVESTIGATION.

A letter of interest has been addressed to the Revue Spirite (August) by Prince D. K. It is here condensed:—

A work has just appeared here in St. Petersburg, in the Russian language, by M. Aksakoff, well known as editor of the spiritual review, Psychische Studien, published at Leipzig. It is entitled "Scheming Unmasked: A History of the Investigation into Mediumistic Phenomena by the Physical Society of the University of St. Petersburg."

Certain members of the University formed a Society for Psychical Research. On the motion of M. Mendelef, the Professor of Chemistry, this Society appointed a committee in the early part of 1875 to investigate and report upon the alleged physical facts of Spiritualism. The committee consisted of twelve professors of the University, M. Mendelef being president, and, prominent among them, the professors of physics and mechanics.

Messrs. Aksakoff, Boutlerof, and Wagner, as recognised Spiritualists, were invited to join the committee, as members, and this they consented to, in the hope of giving practical direction to its work. The protocol of the committee, thus constituted, unanimously agreed to May, 1875, had three articles: 1st, that the committee should hold forty sances within the ensuing twelve months, and that the results should then be discussed and reported upon; 2nd, that copies of all notices, programmes, and minutes of business should be furnished to every member of the committee; 3rd, that each member should have the right to deliver his opinion before the drawing up of the report.

In order that the committee might enter upon its work intelligently M. Aksakoff furnished it with the standard books upon Spiritualism, and then, at his own charge, visited England and Germany to engage suitable mediums. At the recommendation of Mr. William Crookes and others he secured the attendance of three excellent mediums, the brothers Messrs. P. and Mr. C.

With Messrs. P. the committee held four sances, in November; and in June following, four with Mr. C.

The animus of the committee soon revealed itself by its withholding copies of notices, programmes of business and minutes, from its three Spiritualist members. Finally in violation of its protocol, it abruptly closed the investigation after the above mentioned eight sances.

After the four sances with the Messrs. P., namely in December, 1875, Professor Mendelef gave a public lecture in which he anticipated the committee's report. His lecture, in matter and manner, afforded a strong instance of the bad feeling and bad faith animating some men of science in approaching spiritual phenomena.

Then, after the sance with Mr. C., namely in March, 1876, the committee anticipated by two months the time fixed by its protocol, and ignoring their fellow-members, Messrs. Aksakoff, Boutlerof and Wagner, signed the fallacious report which appeared in the Golos, No. 85.

Those of our public who had looked forward to a real investigation were indignant, and protested against the report. Their protest was signed by 130 persons of recognised position, and was published in St. Petersburg, in the Moniteur.

To this Professor Mendelef replied by a coarsely-written pamphlet, in which he said that he thought the subject unworthy of investigation, and that Spiritualists were imbeciles, and mediums charlatans.*

A review of the whole proceedings was then written by M. Aksakoff, the result being the present volume, the publication of which has been delayed by circumstances

NOTE BY TRANSLATOR.—When the brothers Petty returned, they told friends in London that this committee, excepting Messrs. A., B., and W., treated them evidently on the assumption that mediumship was a kind of trickery, and that the committee had to find it out. The brothers expressed their sense of relief from having to sit with a dozen men of this sort, by saying that if they had had the option of being shot, or continuing the sances, they would have preferred the shooting.

beyond his control. He shews, with documents in hand, that Professor Mendelef exhibited throughout as much want of real science as of good faith, and that the committee's report was a tissue of misrepresentation.

M. Aksakoff makes his criticism the occasion of stating the case of spiritual manifestations in general, and the conditions for studying them. Without advancing any theory, he finally states the conclusions to be rationally drawn from them. Altogether, his book is a valuable contribution to our literature.

HAUNTED HOUSES IN HUNGARY.*

Kornel Albranyi, complaining of the superstition of the Hungarians, says that not only our country folk, to whom all things in nature are mysterious; not only that part of our aristocracy who withdraw from the busy world, and bury themselves in their ancient castles, but many even of those who take part in public life and in learned movements, standing on the height of modern science, clothed with its distinctions, and filling high offices of state, are inclined to mysticism, and in private and family circles recount superstitions and incredible stories. And they do this with such positiveness, such definiteness as to persons and dates, that an unbeliever will rather smile in silence than dispute with the assertors. Of those cases in which these particulars are given, and living persons play a part, the following are repeated by the writer above named:—†

On one of the immense Slavonian estates of Baron P. is an old castle, which, of all his houses, has the finest park and is the most splendidly situated and furnished. Nevertheless, it was for a very long time uninhabited. Even the household servants were withdrawn from it. In the year 185—Lieut.-Colonel W., being in the neighbourhood, was much surprised at the desertion of the rich and noble castle. On asking the cause he was told that the castle was under a curse, and was haunted nightly by a ghost. The officer laughed, but having then no leisure to remain, travelled on. Some time after he met Baron P., and the conversation turned on the haunted castle.

The Baron confirmed the statements made, and said that he could do so from his own experience. He described the mysterious noise which every night filled the large halls, and said that nothing would induce him to pass another night in that castle. The Lieut.-Colonel was a bold soldier, and declared that if he found himself again in the neighbourhood he would spend a night all alone in the house. He asked concerning the traditions connected with it. But those which Baron P. mentioned to him suggested no explanation of the haunting. No drama, still less any tragedy, not even an exciting episode, was among them.

The conversation naturally turned on other stories of ghosts and hauntings. For just at that time it so happened, or was said to have happened, that in a Bohemian castle of Prince Schwartzburg, three officers had undertaken an adventure similar to that proposed by our Lieut.-Colonel. They also would see the ghosts which caused nocturnal disturbances. They accordingly betook themselves to the castle, dining and remaining together until midnight. They then separated, each going to his room, and wishing one another good luck with the ghost. In the morning the servants sought the officers in their rooms, but found none of them there. After long search, one was discovered lying dead on the ground in the armoury; the second, huddled up in a dark corner of the corridor, was likewise dead. The third lay senseless on the further bank of the moat which surrounded the castle. He must have fallen down from the height of the second floor; yet his body shewed no trace of injury. He was brought back to life, but never more recovered his senses. He was mad, and died soon afterwards. The names were given, which are well-known in the Bohemian nobility.

Lieut.-Colonel W. was not deterred by this horrible story. After some weeks he went into Slavonia and passed a night in the haunted castle. He had his bed made up in the great hall, in which the nightly disturbances were usually at their height.

He was in bed when they sought him on the following morning, asleep as if stunned, and his face shewed traces of what he had gone through during the night. But on awaking, he came at once to his senses, immediately asked for ink and paper, and wrote a letter to the proprietor of the castle. In this he said he had kept his word, had slept in the house, and that something had happened of which he could not give a clear account. One thing, however, he recollected,—that someone had said to him that in a certain recess in the chimney of a bedroom (a particular description here followed) a skeleton would be found in the wall. And if this skeleton was taken away, laid in a coffin, and buried with funeral rites, then would no ghost any longer trouble the castle.

On receipt of this letter, Baron P. at once set out for Slavonia, and made search according to the directions given. And all happened as indicated in Colonel W.'s letter. At the place described, the skeleton was found in the wall. It was placed in a coffin, consecrated, and buried. All was henceforth quiet at the castle, and Baron P. usually resides there with his family at this day.

Not less interesting is a second case, of which the Szabolcs county is the scene. On one of the estates of the L.'s, at Th—, stands the hereditary castle, where, about a hundred years ago, a predecessor of the family employed a certain foreign artist to paint a fresco in the great hall. The artist painted the living members of the family of L. in fantastic groups, and finally also himself. He laboured long at the fresco, and as he was making the last strokes, the scaffolding on which he had so long stood gave way under him, and he was killed immediately by his fall. Since then, the family of L. from generation to generation have heard the ghost going about in Th—Castle during the midnight stillness; the steps resembling those of the fine, elegant shoes worn by the artist. Strangers sleeping in the house were awakened by a mysterious noise, and could not get to sleep again. And if the family went for a walk in the garden on a summer evening with their guests, it often happened that one of the latter pointed with surprise to the upper storey of the building, and asked, What figure is that? All would look up and see no one, and he who spoke would see the figure no longer. The footfalls at night are most frequent on the narrow wooden staircase leading to the upper storey. There were guests, and even members of the family, who could not believe but that the sounds were caused by living men or animals. The staircase was strewn day by day with the finest ashes, that the traces of the footsteps might be detected. They then watched for the next nightly sounds. These were repeated, and distinctly heard by the watchers, the steps advancing up the stairs and then going down again. Certainly it must be the footstep of a living man, and the marks would be left on the ashes. They went immediately with a candle to look, but the ashes were found undisturbed.—Trautenauer Wochenblatt, v. 13th August, 1883.

M. Adolphe Didier, who, with his brother Alexis, was so well-known years ago as a clairvoyant, and who has been an occasional correspondent to our pages, has, for family reasons, returned to his native country. During a residence among us of nearly forty years, he has acquired the respect and regard of all who knew him. He will be happy to receive old friends from England at his residence, 5, Rue du Mont Dore, Boulevard des Batignolles, Paris.

Christian Symbolism.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—It is as satisfactory as it is unusual to find a Catholic priest among your correspondents, because it supposes an amount of courage and independence which may lead to better things. But at the same time, it does not seem right to allow his startling assertions to go unchallenged.

In his first letter, he tries to prove the doctrine of Re-incarnation by the words of "Jesus," (why not Jesus?) to Nicodemus. To do this he takes unwise liberties with the sacred text, substituting fire for "spirit," flesh for "water" and physical facts for "earthly things." Now earthly things are by no means necessarily physical facts, however well the phrase may sound for the writer's purpose. Spirit does not mean fire. "He shall baptise with the Holy Spirit and with fire." Water is well known to be a symbol of truth, or purification, for it is by the truth that we are purified. But if he will turn to the first chapter of this Gospel, he will see that the children of God "are born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God:" or as St. Peter has it "begotten again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible by the word of God." There is not then in these words to Nicodemus, a thought or suggestion of incarnation,—nothing could be more diametrically opposed to our Lord's teaching, who spoke of a spiritual, not a natural rebirth.

Nor is there any more evidence in the saying that "Elias is come already." The Baptist came, it is said, "in the spirit and power of Elias." If another reformer should arise in the spirit and power of Savonarola, it would be rather a far-fetched conclusion that it was Savonarola himself come down from Heaven! If the "Catholic Priest" can discover this dogma in the expression, "the Captain of our Salvation was made perfect through suffering;" or, that those who are raised from the dead "shall not die any more;" or, that such as are pillars in the temple of God shall "go no more out;" or, that the "dead are blessed who die in the Lord, because their works follow them;" or, in that it is said, "Thou turnest man to destruction, and sayest, return, ye children of men,"—it is only another illustration of the well-known fact that anything may be proved from Scripture if only men apply their ingenuity thereto under the influence of a powerful preconception. Another instance of this is the bold assertion that Jesus taught that the wicked should go away into "after corrective punishment." He taught nothing of the sort, as every reader of the New Testament should know.

"The Protestant," says our friend, "may teach three Gods, but the Catholic Christian Church does not." To say so is a "monstrous injustice." I am afraid both Churches swim (or sink) in the same boat, because the former got its dogmas from the latter. The Nicene and Athanasian Creeds are accepted by the Catholic Church, are they not? In the latter we are told, "There is one Person of the Father, another of the Son, and another of the Holy Ghost." Here are three distinct Divine Persons. Now, in no intelligible sense can three persons exist in one individual, because a person is an individual. Three Divine Persons, then, must be three Gods; and, moreover, the people are taught to worship each distinctly and successively. And to say the Three Persons are One God, does not mend the matter: it only shews the absurdity and insincerity of such a saying coming after such a definition. It involves a contradiction in terms, and this Cardinal Newman acknowledges, while professing to believe it.

In the second letter "A Catholic Priest" tells us that "the Sacrifice of the Mass is not a bloody sacrifice, but a bloodless and pure oblation." What then becomes of the doctrine of Transubstantiation? The Church defines that the substance of bread and wine after consecration is changed into the real Body and Blood of Christ. Many a man and woman for denying this has received his death at the hands of the "Christian Catholic Church." If the definition is true, it is a bloody sacrifice. If the writer says it is false, he is doubtless right, but for all that he places himself in the position of those whom the Church calls heretics and enemies of God.

He speaks of those who at the Communion partake of the "body of God." What is meant by the body of God? He tells us—"i.e., the Divine substance, also the universe, the Church or Bride of God." Having partaken of and appropriated all these, he goes on to say, "And by the blood of God, i.e., the Divine Spirit manifested in form astral fluid which pervades all things, also the Divine Spouse who lifts up His Bride to union with Himself." Here we must remember that the poor laity are deprived of these advantages—they can have nothing to do with the "Divine Spirit" or the "Divine Spouse," for the cup is denied to the laity! Or does "A Catholic Priest" ignore the commands of the Church, and approve of Communion in both kinds? If so, I congratulate him sincerely, but all the same he lays himself open to the anathema pronounced against heretics.

* Several important matters having been kept waiting for some weeks through the pressure on our space in connection with the correspondence on this subject, and that on "Esoteric Buddhism," we are reluctantly compelled to close it next week.

Most Spiritualists, who are Protestants, and most Englishmen, who also delight to call themselves by this name, will look upon the Reformation as the emancipation of the human mind from a thralldom which made progress impossible. On the other hand, our friend informs us that "at the so-called Reformation the spiritual was cast out for the material" (we have always thought that the material was cast out that the spiritual might have free play); "the invocation of the departed, for the glorification of heroes; the intercession of Maria, for the supremacy of the devil." Since neither the "invocation of the departed," nor the "intercession of Maria" are matters of revelation, their abolition is a subject of thankfulness. But that the devil rules supreme over Protestants, we knew by infallible authority long ago!

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have read with interest the letters in your journal on Christian Symbolism, signed "A Catholic Priest." His views and explanations are ingenious, and may commend themselves to certain minds. But let your readers beware of accepting them as "the true doctrine, the mystic truth contained in the rites and ceremonies of the Christian Sacrifice, &c." These words have an authoritative ring, and might even be construed as containing a tacit accusation of dishonesty on the part of other accredited teachers of the Catholic Church, especially when taken in connection with the phrase, "which I fear they (your readers) will not be able to find thus elucidated in any book at present."

As an individual opinion, expressed as such, your correspondent's idea of the signification of the rites of the Holy Mass is interesting; but from the attitude he has taken up I think with "E. M.," though probably with far different feelings, that the prophecy "he will no longer be able to sign himself 'A Catholic Priest,'" will soon be realised.

No thinking Catholic can doubt that the Mass is full of mystery; but also, no true child of the Church will dispute that the way to the comprehension of that and of all the mysteries of the religious life is through the regeneration of the heart and life rather than through the subtleties of the intellect. Humility, self-abnegation, contempt of the world and its honours, love of the Cross and of the Crucified, penance, mortification, and true charity, these are the thorny paths by which Holy Church guides her children if they would enter into life, and to such the Spirit gives teachings which cannot be uttered; the results only are to be seen in their lives and in their works. Were this not so, and were the learned only able to know the true doctrine, where would be the poor, the humble, the lowly-minded, and the ignorant (as the world counts wisdom), whom the Church gathers in ever-increasing numbers, and with such motherly tenderness, to her bosom, and whom Jesus Christ has declared to be "blessed"?

The tone of "A Catholic Priest" might lead some to believe that the truth is being kept back from all but a favoured few, and that he is now making it known for the first time; whereas it is only his own interpretation of certain ceremonies which he has put forward with so much show of authority.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The letters of "A Catholic Priest" perplex me. The signature, taken in its natural sense as ordinary readers will take it, implies that the writer is a priest of that Church which exclusively calls itself Catholic, and which is presided over by the Pope. If this be so, the sentiments contained in the letters are very noteworthy, and are likely to expose the "Catholic Priest" to authoritative censure. If, however, he owes no obedience to Rome, the signature is misleading, and calculated to give readers a false estimate of what he says.

A PERPLEXED READER.

Pantheism versus Theism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—M. A. (Oxon.) occupies so prominent a position in the sphere of Spiritualism, and especially before the readers of "LIGHT," that we are naturally anxious to ascertain his exact opinions. Or if his opinions on the primal question of all are rather hazy and ill-defined—if he seems tracing a zigzag path, and returning on ground which we thought he had abandoned, still we desire to know that fact. However the case may be, it is comforting to feel assured that his honesty is sterling—he is true as the day; but if his mind is wavering, his language, to be true, must be wavering also. And such it seems to me to be on the question of the Personality of God. He gave at least a partial adhesion to the views contained in a letter of mine which seems remembered, but now he takes up quite different ground, and to my surprise coolly assumes that the Personality of God means His figure and outward similarity to the human form. It was the purpose of my letter, to which he seemed to assent, to eliminate that topic altogether as one utterly beyond the reach of the human faculties, and to concentrate attention exclusively on the indications of Thought, Purpose, Will in the universe, as proving that God is an Ego, or in other words, a Person.

Yet "M. A. (Oxon.)" now quietly assumes the exact contrary, without producing a single argument to shew that personality consists solely in the outward form and organisation. We do not so use the term in regard to ourselves. When we speak of Prince Bismarck as "a great personality" we surely do not refer to the height of his stature, but to his great intelligence, his over-mastering spirit, his tenacity of purpose, his commanding will. Nor do we blunt the force of the argument for design, and purpose, and goodness in creation by asking "What is the mode of the Being of God?" His attributes beam forth no less resplendently, and impress our minds, though we are utterly bewildered in attempting a solution of this question. Our minds are not to be cheated out of their inmost convictions by propounding an insoluble problem of another kind. Our perception and belief of the fact is not to be made dependent on our comprehension of the means.

Our weekly Mentor now seems to revert to a "refined and spiritual Pantheism." But however "refined," and however "spiritual" Pantheism may be, the real question is—Is this Pantheism possessed of a Mind—Thought and Will? Moreover, how does our author define Pantheism? Is it, as the term seems to imply, "the sum of all that exists—of things evil as well as of things good"? Does it mean the indivisible units of all that exists? In my humble opinion it is a mere jargon which begin in confusion of thought, and can only end in utter bewilderment.

I hold with an able and profound American writer, that "the Divine Being and the Divine Personality are inseparable in thought. We do not know God first as simple existence by the evidences of His power and skill, but we know Him primarily and directly as a Person. The personality of man has its foundation in that of God, and is the ground of the relations ship and communion between them. It is only by postulating the Personality of God that we can have any knowledge of God, while it is only through the realisation of the personal element in man—that is, through the deeper knowledge of himself—that man comes to the knowledge of God. The more strongly the human personality is developed the more clearly is the Divine Personality apprehended. The ages in which the consciousness of God is strongest are not the darkest and most barbarous, but rather the most prosperous and enlightened."

Pantheism is only a bright name for Atheism: "hiding the grossness with fair ornament." G. D. HAUGHTON.

Christian Spiritualism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I cannot refrain from stating through your valuable columns, how I unhesitatingly and cordially endorse every word contained in your correspondent's letter ("A. E. Major") published in "LIGHT" of 1st inst.

I will not attempt to enlarge on your correspondent's views, but still I may be permitted to add my testimony, and state that I know by a long experience that all who appeal to our loving Heavenly Father for assistance and guidance, will surely receive it, provided the request is made with humility, in sincerity, and in truth.

"Ask, and ye shall receive, knock, and it shall be opened unto you," will be true to the end of time.

God is no respecter of persons: all may come; the highly educated and the ignorant, the poor equally with the rich of this world, the old and the young, have all the same blessed right of appeal to the Throne of Mercy.

In my humble opinion, one of the greatest errors of the present time is, that we are too prone to trust to our own personal strength and knowledge, and too ready to worship our noble selves instead of our Creator and the Author of all life. This error, I am afraid, is common amongst Spiritualists. I attribute this to the want of careful and serious examination by those who have been blessed with the heavenly knowledge of communion with the departed spirits, many forgetting the solemn advice, try the spirits, to know if they are from God.—Respectfully yours,

Anesthetics and Clairvoyance.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In the last number of "LIGHT" "M. A. (Oxon.)" has some sensible remarks on "Hibbert on Apparitions" with especial reference to the experiences of Sir H. Davy with nitrous oxide, in which he felt as if "nothing existed but thought."

In my "Theosophy" and again in my pamphlet on Clairvoyance, I attempt to work out this idea, deriving my material from my own experience and from that of very many others when under the influence of anesthetics.

The grand facts are that, when under the complete influence of anesthetics the body is as dead, for you may cut it to pieces, without producing any pain, while at the same moment the mind seems to itself to be outside the body and revelling in the most ecstatic visions and delights.

I beg again to draw the attention of your readers to these great facts, because they seem to me to demonstrate the existence of the soul as a reasoning faculty, independent of fleshly organisation, and if so, they go to prove that the soul lives when the body is dead.

If this can be maintained, then the demonstration of the existence of the soul is as provable as the complex structure of physical compounds is provable by chemical analysis, and if so, then we have a psychology amenable to exact science.

It is true that many who take anesthetics have thereby no psychic experiences, but a large proportion have these experiences, and with an intensity of vision which reduces all organic vision to comparative blindness.

Those who have had such experiences know that the soul exists and that it is an immortal essence.

Probably, there are not fewer than 30,000 such anesthetic experiences in the world yearly, and if medical men would tabulate these experiences the scientific results might soon transcend in importance all other discoveries known to man.

Mr. Sennett's reply to Mr. Kiddle.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Having been travelling about for the last few weeks, I only received "LIGHT" of September 1st, on my arrival here yesterday evening. I hasten to acknowledge the letter signed "Henry Kiddle," commenting on the practical identity of some passages in one of my adept teacher's letters, published in the Occult World with certain others in the report of Mr Kiddle's lecture. Original manuscripts to which I should wish to refer in connection with this matter are in London, and until I return thither at the end of this month, I can only say a few words on the subject. I now have heard of the alleged plagiarism for the first time. I have no recollection of having received the letter Mr. Kiddle appears to have addressed to me. If such a letter reached my office in India and escaped my attention while I was burdened with the immense correspondence I had to deal with there as editor of a daily newspaper, I must apologise to Mr. Kiddle for the oversight, and regret it on my own account, as it would have been much easier for me to have dealt with the question raised, while still in India, than it is here.

For the moment all I can say is that as printed in the Occult World (a copy of which I have just succeeded in obtaining here for reference), I notice that the passage referred to by Mr. Kiddle is introduced by my revered friend with the expression "Plato was right," which seems to point to some origin for the sentences immediately following, that may have lain behind both the letter and the lecture. To obtain a further explanation of the mystery from India will take time, but meanwhile I may point out that the path leading to acquaintanceship with the adepts, is always found strewn with provocations to distrust them; for reasons very fully detailed in my books: their policy at present is rather to ward off than to invite European confidence. We, who are keenly desirous of penetrating to a comprehension of their philosophy, must be prepared at every turn to find traps set for our suspicions; as regards the matter before us it seems to me, in any case, hardly worth being regarded as a trap. Scarcely anyone who has realised the grandeur and sufficient completeness of the esoteric teaching, as already disclosed in its broad outlines, will be inclined to take notice of the relatively trivial question now brought up. That might have claimed attention when the Occult World came out; it is rather out of date now, that those of us who held steadily to our purpose have, by disregarding incidents that seemed to repel confidence in the beginning, got beyond them so far that in the retrospect they look merely ridiculous.

The Late Mr. C. F. Varley and His Contemporaries.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to the obituary notice in your paper of the late Mr. Cromwell Varley. While according all honour due to the illustrious dead, it is just to avoid even indirectly denying any of that which belongs to the living; and for this reason I beg your leave to correct the account given by your writer of Mr. Varley's connection with the Atlantic telegraph,—an account which would mislead all but the best-informed of your readers.

The first Atlantic cable was successfully laid on the 5th of August, 1858. It was one of the most arduous engineering tasks of modern times; and my father, Sir Charles (then Mr.) Bright, received the honour of knighthood chiefly as having been the engineer in charge of it. He was assisted by Mr. Canning (since Sir Samuel), Mr. Henry Clifford, Mr. Woodhouse, and Mr. Everett. The chief electrician was Dr. Whitehouse, and the manager the well-known American, Mr. Cyrus Field. This cable subsequently failed through defects in the manufacture—a matter over which those in charge had no control. In the Illustrated London News of the 4th of September, 1858, and other contemporary journals, full descriptions of this earliest Atlantic cable will be found.

As telegraphic engineering developed itself, particularly in the departments of paying-out machines and of insulation, the difficulties of laying and maintaining subsequent cables have been greatly diminished. In these improvements, the late Mr. Cromwell Varley took a considerable share, I believe. The notices of him which have as yet been published certainly cannot be said to err on the side of too great fulness or too great praise for his varied and indefatigable researches, and of the useful part which he has played in electrical science.—I am, sir, yours obediently,

September 6th.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

MR. GERALD MASSEY'S LECTURES.

Mr. Gerald Massey gave the second lecture of his course on Sunday in St. George's Hall to a large audience, his subject being "The Non-Historic Nature of the Fall of Man, and what it meant as Astronomical Mythos and Physiological Fable." The lecturer remarked that it is important to note that primitive man did not begin by personifying the elements in his own likeness. His process was one of objective comparison. He represented one mode of force by its equivalent in living form. The howling darkness by the black jackal, storm-wind by the angry blowing ape, the lightning bolt by the serpent's sting, the water flood by the hippopotamus, and thus the elementary gods were zootypes, the living zootypes of the most ancient totemic heraldry. Seven of these were continued as chronotypes, or tellers of time, and starry stations were assigned to them as intelligences to men. In Egypt the eight great gods are described as those who once dwelt on the summit of Am-Smen, and as Am means a residence in a paradise, this was literally the paradise of the eight great gods on the summit, one form of which was the Mount Meru. From this summit fell the seven, in consequence of their failure in keeping time. Whatsoever figures had been made out of the constellations would begin to lose shape in the course of Precession. The Mount of the Seven Steps would gradually sink and be submerged in the celestial waters. Hence the myth of the mount that disappeared at the time of the Deluge, with Eden on its summit. Hence also the Fall of the Seven (who failed to keep time) in the various forms of the mythos. The Fall of the Seven preceded that of the primal pair, who were traced by the lecturer to the great bear and dragon, and were shown on the Assyrian monuments as male and female, sitting one on either side of the typical tree of seven branches. Mythology makes no pretence to a primal human pair or a first man. The mythmakers were shown at work as primitive but perfectly sound biologists in expounding the natural origins of the race, not of the individual first man. The lecturer argued that every current superstition and fetichic belief had a natural origin and a true interpretation once; but it is only by tracing their genesis and development that it is possible to combat and overthrow false versions. The true nature of the physiological fable and its version of the human fall was known to the earlier teachers of the hidden wisdom. This crops up in books like the Apocrypha. In these it is declared that error and darkness had their beginning together with sinners, but through wisdom (or the learning to know better) the ways of them which lived on the earth were reformed, and mankind were brought out of their fall and saved through wisdom. Such was the doctrine taught by the Gnostics.—The discourse occupied upwards of an hour and a-half in delivery, and was frequently applauded. The third lecture of the course will be given at the same time and place next Sunday.—Echo.

ROCHDALE.

On Sunday, September 16th, Mrs. Groom, of Birmingham, occupied the platform of the Rochdale Spiritualist Society, both afternoon and evening, Mr. Peter Lee presiding. The room was full to overflowing on both occasions. The choice of a set subject or of a series of questions was left to the audience. The latter course was adopted, and Mrs. Groom's controls dealt with the whole in a concise and very pleasing fashion. The evening subject was, "Does Spiritualism meet the requirements of the age?" Mrs. Groom's controls of course replied in the affirmative. The religions of the past had failed; they were being weighed in the balance and found wanting, and the spiritual philosophy was fully calculated to meet the varied wants of humanity. There was abundant proof that there was a want of humanity unsatisfied, and this need could alone be supplied by the teachings of Spiritualism. None of the Churches had utilised the spirit power which they held had been amongst them; in fact, they rejected truths on which their fabrics rested. The creeds and dogmas of the Churches had failed to cope with the materialism of the age. Materialism asks whether there be a God which smiles at one nation and curses another when asked to do so. This idea was not suitable for thinking minds. The crimes done in the name of Christianity were severely noted, particularly that of hanging men for murder. It was affirmed no assassin could go direct to Heaven from the hangman's noose but must descend to the lowest spheres and there remain till he had "paid the uttermost farthing." In the after life, sometimes the murderer incited spirits in human form to do similar deeds. Spiritualism taught that we should not hang these men, it being argued that if we made them fit to die before execution they were fit to live. Spiritualism proved there is no death, that man lives for ever and is destined to progress. Creeds and dogmas did not do this; consequently, the spiritual philosophy was right, and creeds and dogmas were wrong. After each discourse Mrs. Groom gave excellent impromptu poems on words chosen by the audience and which were highly appreciated. In addition to these she gave several clairvoyant tests, all of which were recognised. The most remarkable was a test to a widow, whose husband's dying words were quoted, and acknowledged. Mrs. Groom's visit, ranks among the most important incidents of Spiritualism in Rochdale, and the best evidences of the interest taken in the subject are the large and intelligent audiences which went to hear her and testified their satisfaction by liberal giving to the collections.

THE GOD-IDEA: A REJOINDER.

I am sorry that the correspondence evoked by my Notes on "The God-idea" passed by without the possibility of my following it. Thoughts that might have been called forth at the moment it is now too late to put forward. It is plain to me on reading my own Notes in connection with these comments that most of those who notice them have regarded them as the expression of personal opinion, and not, as they in fact were, as a speculative embodiment of what finds a voice and utterance in various ways all round us. That which has hitherto been accepted as matter of faith is no longer so treated. What was regarded as unquestionable truth is widely questioned, and conclusions hitherto held to be beyond the reach of argument are freely discussed in language of exceeding boldness. Especially is this the case with respect to man's future and his relations with the Supreme Being. Paper upon paper in the leading magazines, such as that on the state "After Death" to which I adverted last week: volume upon volume, such as the fascinating speculations of the author of "Ecce Homo," issue from the press, and attract a large share of attention. It seemed to me not out of place to inquire what Spiritualism had to say to these various speculations. Under that loose appellation are included some schools of thought which by no means ignore such questions. What have they to say? Spiritualists are professedly in communication with those who may be assumed to know more about such matters than we do. They have gone some distance, at any rate, towards solving the "great perhaps." They have cast a strong light on the one great problem of man's immediate future. Have they any light to cast on the life in which they find themselves and on the God in Whom they and we "move and have our being"?]

Such were the queries that I ventured to propound. It may be that they transcend human knowledge, and are outside of the profitable limits of discussion. But people are discussing them; writers who find ready entrance to magazines which are nothing if not popular, are discussing them; and surely the one class of men who claim to approach such questions from a platform of experience and knowledge may fairly have their say—if only to say that they know nothing about the matter. So much will, doubtless, be conceded. But a broad ventilation for the purpose of eliciting opinion is a very different thing from "teachings" to which

"Theis" finds it necessary to supply an antidote from King's College. I did not presume to teach any thing or any body on such a profound subject. I hoped to be instructed myself, and to learn whether the distinguished author of "Ecce Homo," whose name commands respect ubique et ab omnibus, had not said something worthy of comment and criticism, if not of appreciation and acquiescence.

I wished also to discover whether among Spiritualists, who include among them representatives of the most divergent beliefs and negations in respect of religion, there was any strong consensus of opinion touching the subject which I ventured to open for discussion. I sufficiently indicated my own belief in the ideal of a Personal God revealed in the life and teaching of Jesus the Christ (I am obliged to the writer of the letter signed "A. E. Major" for pointing out that it would be unfair to me to charge me with any denial of those Christian doctrines)—but I wished to learn whether that view was or was not generally held by Spiritualists. We have, on the one side, very able and powerful thinkers, like Mr. Norman Pearson, who hold such a view in a modified form, who are "firmly convinced of the existence of a Deity," but who "see nothing in the least immoral in an opposite belief." * Among Spiritualists are many advanced thinkers; men who are not afraid to look facts in the face, and who have learned to value an argument solely for what it is worth. How does this view strike such men? What have they to say?

I am far from underrating the value of the letters which have instructed me in various ways when I say that the comments are not of the character that I anticipated. Two of my critics express the view of what I may call mystical Christianity. Two or three confound and confuse me with the old question of personality and individuality. The others do not raise any questions with which at this distance of time I need deal. The question of the personality of the Supreme Being is not one that can be discussed beyond a certain point. My correspondents are anxious to point out that I am confusing the ideas of personality and individuality. Perhaps so; perhaps no. But the point I was careful to draw attention to was that the average, ordinary, popular conception of God current amongst us is that of a man whose powers have been raised to the nth. What I or my critics may conceive, is another matter. The vulgar conception is what I was dealing with. Mrs. Penny can, as I well know, cast a halo of refined and spiritualised beauty round the Christian ideal. It is sublime; it is pure; it is grand; but it is not the ideal of popular Christianity. "J.W.F."—initials that seem to me imperfectly to hide the individuality (is it?) of one who is well able to expound the mysteries of Esoteric Christianity—states "the true faith of a Christian" in an attractive guise.† He frankly admits, however, that the ordinary Christian idea of God is that which I stated it to be, and he regards that as the highest ideal. That is matter of opinion. I, myself, think that it is, at least, open to argument whether such an ideal is not the product of the state in which we now find ourselves, and whether incarnation under quite different conditions would not have given us a quite different ideal. But that is not important, except in so far as men regard it as terrible to discuss such matters at all, or, still worse, are disposed to import into the argument a certain smack of theological dogmatism.

* "After Death," Nineteenth Century, p. 283.

† "J.W.F." letter suffers somewhat from the fact that it was written before he had seen the conclusion of my arguments. I am more in accord, even verbally, with what he sets forth than he probably thought I was. At the same time, his letter offers me points of divergent thought which are both interesting and instructive. A similar remark applies to the letter, signed "W. D. Avening," which I frankly admit that the ideal he puts forward under the name of "Father" is that which most commends itself to the heart. But I was dealing with the head. Science has no heart in such matters.

We shall not forget, I am sure, that we know nothing of a surety about these high matters, and that metaphysical interpretations of the esoteric meaning of individuality, personality, and the like, are beside the point. The conceptions of Heaven and hell, of God and the devil, current among average Christians, are crude enough, material enough, and it was with such that I was, and am, concerned. So that metaphysical niceties do not enlighten me ad hoc. I am by no means sure that I am not able to adore and worship that phenomenal manifestation of Supreme Power which is called Nature. I can at least conceive of such worship; and I see nothing at all irreverent in any mind that refuses to embody his God in any form, and "ignorantly worships" what he challenges more presumptuous minds to declare to him more circumstantially. It is, perhaps, a little difficult to import into such discussions the method of severe logic; nor is it necessary to quarrel with any who refuses so to deal with matters that he shrinks from handling by such work-a-day methods. Only a prolonged course of thought, that does not fear the directest handling of that which it most concerns man to know, can enable the mind to deal fairly, and yet reverentially with subjects that are encircled with a halo of prescriptive reverence where they are not enveloped in mists of prejudice and superstition.

I cannot agree with Mr. Haughton that it is of any importance to anyone to learn what are my private opinions on these matters. He will see from what I have now written that I was acting as the mouthpiece of current ideas rather than expressing any of my own. But if it be of interest to him to know it, I will frankly say that it seems to me that the earliest conceptions of Deity are the most crudely defined; and that the tendency to this rigid definition is less manifest as the race develops and thought grows. I am disposed personally to think this a gain and not a loss; but I can understand full well that to some minds it would be the very reverse. They need an embodied ideal, and they frame it, some of them objectively as an object of veneration if not of worship; and some of them as a realised conception of the mind. To talk to such as many very reverent and devout minds talk to-day would be to shock and startle them, and to extort such a cry as that which was wrung from a very loving heart by the discovery of the removal of the dead body of Jesus—"They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him." But they had not taken away the Lord: they had but removed His human body. I am not sure that they who realise what I have called a spiritualised Pantheism are not doing the same. I will not discuss the question of Personality. Mr. Haughton's view is not that current among ordinary persons who talk of "a Personal God" any more than Mrs. Penny's Christianity is that of the average Catholic or Protestant. Mr. Haughton's is a far more exact conception; and Mrs. Penny's is a far nobler faith. But I repeat, I was concerned with the popular voice, with the vulgar conceptions that are current, and not with these deep subtleties.

I have more than once alluded to Mr. Norman Pearson's attempt—bold and yet entirely reverent—to apply to the life after death the knowledge gained in this state of existence. The article is eminently worth serious consideration if only for this, that it shews the working of a clear and honest mind on the lines of its best convictions.

Mr. Pearson is an exponent of the Darwinian teaching, and he has the moral courage to apply its principles to the life beyond the grave. Incidentally he analyses with remorseless candour the popular conceptions of Heaven and hell, and shews how they are repulsive to his mind—earth-born and crude as they are in conception and detail. The orthodox view and the materialistic negation of a future life repel him equally. Whether mystical Christianity might attract him I cannot say. He is concerned, as I have been throughout, with the popular ideal, and it is profoundly unattractive in his eyes. The doctrine of evolution has familiarised him with the conception of a perpetual progress as the law of cosmic development; and this has led him to regard this present life as one of (possibly) many stages in our career. In elaborating this idea he treads curiously near to many of the lines of thought familiar to the Spiritualist. He looks forward to perpetual progress, to an increasing development of spirituality. He finds in sin its own inevitable punishment, and scouts the notion of hell as a "place of punishment devised for offenders against a code of Divine ordinance," or as a "torture-house where Divine vindictiveness may enjoy the agonies of some misguided heretics." Heaven to him is "the name for that complete harmony with our environment" which can alone bring perfect happiness, and which the most orthodox Christian may well regard as attainable only when the pure spirit reaches the presence-chamber of its God.

The singular flaw in a remarkable paper is conspicuous when the writer shews his absolute ignorance of things spiritual. He cannot conceive of happiness apart from material surroundings, although he somewhat inconsistently admits that the progress of the race in after-states must be towards pure spirituality. Some personal experience of what Spiritualism reveals would be to him a revelation indeed. But, short of that, he illuminates a number of problems that now vex men's minds, and handles all that he touches with a reverence and a directness of thought only too rare in the treatment of such subjects.

In discussing these matters it has been obviously proper that they should be dealt with broadly and speculatively as questions which intimately concern all men. To import (for example) any reference to revelation would be to open at once other abstruse questions as to the possibility and limits of a Divine revelation of unknown truths which man could not evolve for himself. All this must be avoided in a journal such as this, as indeed it usually is in such papers as that of Mr. Pearson's and others that find entrance into secular magazines. Hence I have refrained from any reference to the light that is thrown in the Bible or by the Church, on the questions under discussion. We are sufficiently acquainted with the orthodox ideas. What is wanted is to ascertain those of thinkers who are not orthodox. The light shed will be found, however, to be very small. The veil that hides the future state from our gaze is hardly lifted at all, and the relations of the Great Spirit to us are symbolised chiefly under those of Father and children. But, were this the place, it would be instructive to trace to the present time the growth of the God-idea from the earliest conception among primitive races, and in the oldest sacred books, until by long ages of development always in the direction of a less rigidly defined ideal, anthropomorphic conceptions fade away and are largely lost.

ASTROLOGY:

By C. C. M.

I am reminded by your correspondent "S." in LIGHT, of September 8th, of my undertaking, some years ago, to communicate the results of an inquiry I was then contemplating, into the principles and rules of astrology. This subject has engaged my attention, more or less, ever since the year 1877; and I heartily wish I could interest others more competent than myself in its pursuit. In this, as in other departments of the "Occult," my endeavour has been, in the first instance, to verify the alleged facts, being well aware that if true their explanation must be quite beyond the range of modern science. That, however, is not the order in which truth is made acceptable to the world, which usually demands that a fact shall be intelligible—that is, be referable to familiar principles, before or at the time that it is proved. Now I have no theory to offer in relation to astrology. As I wrote four years ago, "It is certain that any real explanation of celestial influences on the constitution, disposition, and affairs of mundane beings, would carry us into a very deep philosophy, and one which could only rightly be appreciated in connection with still higher truths." But the authorities on astrology (and there are great names among them) lay down very definite rules, and promise very definite results. I had made it my business to study, as far as I conveniently could, the literature of the subject from the "Tetrabiblos" of Claudius Ptolemy to the latest treatises of our contemporary Zadkiels and Raphaels. I found many positive statements, much disagreement on points which one would have thought that experience should have placed beyond controversy, and a very faint appreciation, where any at all, of the principles of scientific verification. Yet it should be possible, assuming only a modicum of truth in the propositions with which text books on the subject abound, to establish some of them by a sufficient induction. It seemed only necessary to collect sufficient statistics to render the verdict on some of the main principles of the so-called science, a mere matter of calculation. Certain definite casualties have appropriate astrological indications. The chance of one of these latter appearing in any horoscope whatever is easily ascertained, and consequently, also, the average recurrence of them in any given number of horoscopes—say 100—is deducible a priori. Now, if there is a real connection between the event and the alleged astrological indications, it follows that in a given number of cases where the event has happened, any selected one or more of the appropriate indications should occur in a proportion of the horoscopes exceeding the natural average which would be given by the doctrine of probabilities. No one or more could be expected constantly, for a reason which I beg may be borne in mind in appreciating the result actually arrived at in the case I shall immediately refer to. The alternative causes alleged in astrology are too numerous to be all taken into account in such an inquiry. To apply the doctrine of probabilities in relation to them all, would require an unobtainable number of cases. I had to restrict myself to a workable probability, and even then I found the affair less simple and easy than I had at first expected, though not beyond my very elementary mathematical powers.

Take the case of insanity. In the University Magazine for March, 1880, appeared an article by Mr. A. G. Trent entitled "The Soul and the Stars." The writer there gave the birthdays of nineteen royal and celebrated persons who had become insane, and in sixteen of those cases Mercury, one of the significators of mind, was on those days zodiacally "afflicted" by one or other of the three "infortunes." In the Spiritualist of April 30th, 1880, I shewed that the approximate natural average would be seven in nineteen. But while commenting on this remarkable result, I observed, "I must again premise, by way of caution, that this collection of cases is only valuable on the assumption that the writer in the University Magazine has given all the cases he can obtain of distinguished individuals so afflicted, whose birthdays are known, and has not merely made a selection of such as are conformable to astrological rules.* A fallacy which would imply ignorance or neglect of the most elementary principles of induction and common sense is not probable in a disinterested writer apparently of education and intelligence: it is, however, a pity that he has not explicitly stated that his list is exhaustive. I speak rather feelingly on this subject, having been constantly irritated in my astrological studies by 'illustrative cases' which are of course absolutely worthless when what is wanted is a valid induction." I concluded my letter as follows:—

"Suppose, now, I could be supplied with the birthdays of ten persons who have become insane to the knowledge of any of your readers (I should request an assurance that the dates were sent without previous consultation of an ephemeris, and therefore without any intention either to confirm or to discredit the astrological rule), if the results found by the writer in the University Magazine are accidental, I should expect that of the ten new cases in only three or four would Mercury be zodiacally afflicted. If, on the other hand, there is a true connection between insanity and those positions, I should expect to find the proportion shewn in the above cases to be maintained in the new ones, which should yield eight cases of affliction." There I went too far: I had not at that time appreciated all the conditions of the problem. But I set to work collecting cases; and partly through private sources, chiefly, however, by the kindness of one of the Commissioners in Lunacy, I got together eighty-one new cases.† I had soon reason to congratulate myself on the caution which prevented my accepting Mr. Trent's results as conclusive. Nothing like his proportion was maintained in my new cases. The actual excess of affliction over the natural probability was only five per cent.

But it was that; and though a figure so little imposing cannot be expected to make any impression on the public, it is in reality about what should be expected on the assumption of a true connection between this event and this astrological indication of it. The zodiacal affliction of Mercury within the arbitrary limit I took (5° on either side of the exact aspect—some astrologers take 7° or even more), is only one of the many recognised indications. There are the mundane aspects and parallels, the parallels of declination, affliction by retrogradation, sign, and position in the figure, and especially the afflictions of the moon (not considered by me in these cases), these testimonies all depending for their force on a complex view of the whole figure. Of course any single "testimony" (such as that which I selected for the experiment) is only one element in predictive judgment. I ought, indeed, to have suspected Mr. Trent's results from the first, just because of the great improbability that any single indication would be found with such remarkable constancy. A bad aspect of one of the malefics to Mercury will, I believe, always appropriately affect the mental disposition; but without concurring causes and particular occasions, there will only be an excess of some evil or unhappy quality, not amounting to a tendency to insanity, otherwise than as all such excess may be remotely conducive to it. Such indications are sometimes found in natiivities denoting, on the whole, fortunate lives and powerful characters. But five per cent. may be conceived as fairly representing the extra probabilities of insanity arising from intellectual causes, such as are denoted by the astrological indications in question. Had I included Mr. Trent's cases, I should have at once raised the excess to fourteen per cent. But I had to assume that these had been specially selected, seeing how far short my own indifferently taken ones fell of his results.* Now, if I could be supplied with 100 more cases, and could show about a similar excess in these, it is plain that some advance would be made towards a satisfactory inductive proof, though with so small a percentage, the experiment would have to be further verified in larger numbers.

* The writer considered all his cases so conformable. I considered three of them not to be so.

† And I shall be very much obliged to anyone who will send me others.

Now I think this is the way to go to work in order to bring the truth of astrological principles home to the public mind. Of course verified predictions are for the moment more impressive, and I could adduce scores of them from my own experience. But the failures which would have to be set off against them are truly formidable in number; and nothing but a plodding systematic induction where the average natural probability is ascertainable, (which it is not in such cases), can silence the suggestion that these fulfilments are only what must be expected from the chapter of accidents. I have given the case of insanity only as an instance of my method of proceeding. In like manner I collected numerous times of birth of children who have died in infancy, and I am still in quest of further cases. That it is a far more troublesome task. I hope before long to publish the results, of which I cannot speak definitely at present. I have also attempted to test the doctrine of Solar Revolutions, and other rules on which astrologers have long relied. The general result is rather tantalising. In nearly every head of inquiry I have found, I believe, a slight balance of evidence tending to establish an induction, but nothing as yet to justify a confident judgment. Of the fact of correspondence between planetary positions and the character and fortunes of nations and individuals, I have myself no doubt. But my conviction is founded on a multitude of considerations and on some personal experience which might have no probative force for other minds.

I have rather closely observed the predictions in the astrological almanacs during the last few years. So also have writers in the newspapers, who have usually contrived to extract material for public amusement from the failure of the prophets. No doubt these are very palpable. But in many cases that is only to the discredit of the professor who tries to give a definite character to true, but vague, indications by interpreting them according to his own conception of what is probable or "on the cards," and sometimes according to his political predilections.

An interesting question, however, arises, as to the evidential value of correct, but not very specific forecasts, satisfied by an event not in itself probable, a limited period—as a month—being given within which it is to fall. I could give many instances of this, did space permit. What, for instance, is the value of the two following predictions, which appeared in one of the almanacs for 1878 (published in the preceding autumn)? For January: "Victor Emmanuel's nativity is afflicted. Let him beware." The King died on the 9th of that month, "after a severe and sudden illness of only a few days' duration." (Annual Register for 1878.) For December: "Saturn's transits are evil for the Princess Alice of Hesse. Illness or death in the family." Her two children pre-deceased her in that month, she herself dying on the 14th.

I suspect that if any one were to make fifty such predictions at haphazard for a particular month in a particular year, the chances would be against his being once right. Now, astrologers can reckon a far greater proportion of successes than this, though I am not prepared to say what the proportion is. I have said nothing of horary, or divinatory astrology, the truth of which I have repeatedly verified to my own satisfaction. The essential condition of success is a genuine and deep anxiety at the time for which the figure is erected.

* That I got just eighty-one cases (this making a total of 100 with Mr. Trent's nineteen) was a mere accident. I included all I could obtain.

Another mode of testing celestial influence is by judging from personal appearance what sign was rising at birth, and consequently—given only the month and day of month of birth—at what time of the day or night, within about two hours, the birth took place. Each sign ascending gives certain characteristics of face and build; but this test can only be attempted with confidence when the physical traits are in marked correspondence with any sign. Every planet in, or throwing a close aspect to, the ascendent, infuses its own quality, and modifies the influence of the sign rising, making judgment of the latter extremely hazardous in most cases. The odds against success, as a mere matter of chance, are on the average 11 to 1. I have myself been right, I think, oftener than not. With some signs, as Cancer, Sagittarius, Libra, and Scorpio, I am almost uniformly successful. Nothing has more tended to convince me of these influences than that experiment.

I should like to advert to one plausible and popular objection—to many a conclusive one—which is very unsatisfactorily answered, when noticed at all, by astrological writers. Catastrophes, such as fires, explosions in mines, shipwrecks, earthquakes, battles, and epidemics, will kill hundreds and thousands at the same place on the same day. It is too much to suppose such a coincidence as that all the victims thus brought together have similar fatal directions in their nativities falling due at the same time. The objection is usually evaded as if it related to the fact of so many persons dying at the same time instead of to the coincidence of so many with fatal directions then due coming together at that time to the same place to die. The true answer, I conceive, relates to the superiority of mundane over genethliacal astrology, to the subordination of individuals as parts of a greater whole. If I enter with my small circle of influences into a larger circle, I am carried round with the latter, and am swept into its fatal vortices, however harmless my own influences may be apart from the greater danger.

I imagine this to be what Ptolemy means, when he says, "For the cause of Universals is chief, and so powerful that it overcomes the particular events of every man, happening according to the property of nature, the knowledge of which particular events we call the Doctrine of Nativities," &c. Thus the horoscope may determine a main fact in a person's life, and the particular results of that fact, though perhaps the most important of all need not be the subject of separate directions. The nativity may shew a propensity to a military or seafaring life, and that is necessarily common to a great number. That many of these should come together in a battle and be killed is a natural consequence of this fact. Possibly an accomplished astrologer might select the most likely victims on the eve of a battle by comparing their nativities with the transits, &c., then occurring. But he would not do it by "directing." So of accidents, I should esteem it the height of absurdity, for instance, to look for fatal directions in the case of all those poor children who were crushed on the staircase of a theatre the other day. Places have their ruling influences like persons, and the natives are exposed to local dangers according to circumstances.

I will conclude this letter with another appeal to your readers for statistics. What I chiefly want now are the times and places of birth of children who have died in infancy—that is, within four or five years from birth. The times should be as nearly as possible exact, but, for my present purpose, to get them within even an hour would in many cases not be useless.

PSYCHOLOGY AND BIOGRAPHY.*

Frascati, June 20th, 1817. "I have spent yesterday and last night in thinking of my Milly," (his dead wife) "and this day, too, is sacred to these recollections" (it was her birthday). "I saw her a few nights ago in a dream. She seemed as if returning to me after a long separation. I felt uncertain as one so often does in dreams, whether she was still living on this earth, or only appeared on it for a transient visit; she greeted me as if after a long absence, asked hastily after the child, and took it in her arms. Happy are those who can cherish such a hallowing remembrance as that of the departure of my Milly, with pious faith, trusting for a brighter and eternal spring. Such a faith cannot be acquired by one's own efforts. Oh! that it may one day be my portion! Not that I am a materialist; you know that no one can be further from that than I am; but the possibility of an existence, of which we can form no distinct conception, is not enough for me, does not help me; other and opposite possibilities always present themselves. I well know what is that faith which deserves the name, and recognise it as the highest good. But it would only be possible to me to attain it through supernatural communication, or wonders or signs beheld with my own eyes; it is one thing to respect and not to reject, quite another really to believe, as in one's own existence.

"Brandis is still undecided as to his plans . . . His father's book upon 'Magnetism' is on the way. One hears nothing of such subjects here. An extraordinary case of miraculous cure, which happened during the early part of my stay here, made a great noise. Perhaps we ought not to attempt to give a philosophical account of such occurrences, but to content ourselves with observing them and attempting to form a general conjecture as to the direction of the forces which produce them. An absolute denial of so many instances, still seems to me unwarrantable."—Vol. II. p. 122.

In another place Niebuhr speaks of having been peculiarly susceptible to the influence of spiritual magnetism. One wishes that either he or his biographer had been more explicit on the subject. Baron Bunsen, in writing to his friend, Professor Brandis, upon the receipt of the news of the death of his revered and tenderly beloved friend, and for many years coadjutor, Niebuhr, thus writes:—"Rome, January 22nd, 1831. Your terrible intelligence of the death of Niebuhr struck me like lightning from a blue sky. At the first mention of Niebuhr's name I was seized with anguish, for ever since the receipt of his last letter I had been conscious of an inexplicable sadness, which I endeavoured to explain by the melancholy tone of the letter, and of its prophetic utterances, and (what to you only I would mention) by my having not long since awakened from a dream about Niebuhr, in tears and agitation—a thing which never happened to me before. My soul must have felt that a portion of its life was about to be torn away. . . . Could a father do more for a son than Niebuhr did for me? Whom have I to thank for my household happiness, for the blessing of home never sufficiently to be estimated and acknowledged? Whom to thank for a position in the country, towards which, in the days of common misfortune, my strongest wishes had been directed? And, if these personal bonds of gratitude were not enough to attach me for ever to that great man's memory, who is there that I have honoured and admired like him, as the pattern of excellence, and dignity of soul? . . . The Pharos has perished in the storm and I cannot yet learn to steer without it."—"Memoirs of Baron Bunsen," Vol. I. p. 366.

THE SPREAD OF SPIRITUALISM IN AMERICA.

The belief in mediumship has become so prevalent that the churches have been forced to a liberal policy with members, the deacons and elders simply tolerating that which they cannot root out without material damage to the numerical strength of their congregations. A quarter of a century ago, an attendance at seances was a signal for a member's expulsion, as such a practice was held to be at total variance with the orthodox duties of a Christian. Speaking to our reporter, a leading member of the Pilgrim Congregational Church said:—"It may seem strange, and I do not believe the preachers are aware of it, but it is a fact, that Spiritualism has taken a decided hold upon the evangelical congregations, and it is not extraordinary either, after the facts are known. There are at least 100 mediums in this city, more ministers than can be found representing any particular creed. They are actively at work all the time, not only asserting and preaching their faith, but proving it by demonstration. Up to a year ago my mind revolted at the idea of belief in such a thing, and I would have preferred being detected at a variety show rather than a seance. On a certain occasion, I was shocked to learn that a member of our congregation had been attending circles. I asked him about it, and to my astonishment he did not deny it. He said he had received great comfort at them, and had seen his dead wife. He asked me to go with him. I at first refused, but after several urgent requests, consented to go just one time. I saw my dead mother—I will swear to it. After that, every time I found something to confirm the belief. I wouldn't make myself obnoxious in the matter, or cause trouble in my church by an open avowal, but that does not change my opinion at all. I could name scores of church people who are in the same boat with me." Our reporter then called upon the Rev. Dr. Snyder, the well known Unitarian pastor. When told that most of the Protestant ministers denied that Spiritualism had permeated their congregations to any appreciable degree the doctor said:—"Well, if they say that, they don't know what they are talking about. If they were to investigate the subject they would find that the avowed believers in Spiritualism now number millions, and are increasing every day, and that there is not a community in Christendom that is not strongly affected by it. There is not a congregation in this city a considerable percentage of which does not believe in Spiritualism, or is not earnestly investigating the phenomena." Dr. Snyder said he had attended a dozen seances himself and had observed many intelligent people there. A member of St. George's Episcopal Church told our reporter that he could put his finger on nearly 100 members of the flock who go to seances, and believe wholly or partly in the genuineness of the manifestations. In pursuing his investigations, our reporter called upon Dr. G. Walker, a leading physician of St. Louis. He said it was absurd to deny that the Protestant churches were all of them tinctured with Spiritualism, and it would be a low estimate to say that one-third of them believed in it. In the early days of Spiritualism, Protestant organisations would severely discipline members who had the slightest affiliation with Spiritualists, but now the faith had gathered such strength, that the church leaders were forced to a conciliating policy.—Globe Democrat (St. Louis).

SPIRITUAL LITERATURE IN SOUTHAMPTON.—Those of our readers who reside in, or near Southampton will confer a favour if they will order their copies of "LIGHT," or other spiritual literature, of Mr. J. F. Rayner, Bookseller, Stationer, &c., 180, High-street, Southampton, with whom we have made satisfactory arrangements for its supply.

The Herald of Progress of the 21st inst. again contains statements with reference to the C.A.S., which are entirely misleading, and without the slightest foundation in fact. We had hoped that under the recent new departure, our contemporary would not have stained its columns by a continuance of the misrepresentation which so disgraced its former management, and we cannot but think that the present editor is unaware of the unreliable nature of most of the paragraphs which have appeared under the heading of "Notes and Comments." The writer of these paragraphs having two weeks running signally failed to confine his utterances within the limit of strict veracity, any further communications from the same source will doubtless, in the natural order of things, be regarded with distrust, and corroboration sought from official sources before passing the editorial chair.

THOUGHT-TRANSFERENCE.

From the "Harbinger of Light."

The subject of "Thought-transference" and Mind reading is one that is attracting considerable attention in England, and the systematic experiments of the Society for Psychological Research are helping materially to substantiate the fact surmised by many, and known to a few, that thoughts and emotions are transferable by impression without the aid of voice or pen. The discovery of this fact opens out a wide field for psychological experiment, and reveals the existence of a force which, wisely used, might be made to exercise a powerful influence in the moral elevation of society. What we have more particularly to do with at present is the establishment of the fact, which is as yet far from being a generally accepted one. Those who have attended the exhibitions of itinerant Electro Biologists will have observed how uniformly they succeed in bringing those who have proved susceptible to their influence on the first nights to their subsequent meetings. In these cases there is a sort of artificial sympathy established, by the magnetiser having charged their brains with his influence and brought them for the time into sympathetic relationship with himself, the consciousness that he has done so giving him the impulse to exercise his will to bring them to him. In natural sympathy the individuals are rarely conscious of the power and hence wish or desire takes the place of will, and though less potent, is sometimes adequate to attract the person wished for. Incidentally we have had many instances of Thought-transference, and the influence of mind over mind, but unfortunately we have not tabulated them; some few, however, are distinct in our memory, and these will probably suffice. In one instance a friend, with whom we were in close sympathetic relations, used frequently to ask us "were we thinking of them, or what were we thinking of at a certain hour?" and whenever we could recall the time we found they were correct in their impressions, no matter what distance intervened. On one occasion, with a sensitive in the magnetic sleep who lucidly read the thoughts of the operator and any person they were put en rapport with, we asked, Can you read any sentence literally that I may impress upon my mind? The reply was, I will try. We accordingly thought distinctly a sentence of about eight words, and the subject gave them verbatim.

An instance in our experience of the transference of sympathy was published in the Lyceum Miniature, about three years since, of which the following is a condensation: We had directed the attention of a magnetised subject to a lady friend residing some miles away, with the view of obtaining some information on her behalf. The sensitive said she was unable to see clearly, as there seemed like a dark cloud hanging over the person which obscured the clairvoyance vision. We urged her to try as the lady was very anxious to get the information; she had seen much trouble, and we felt a deep sympathy for her. These last words were heartfelt, as the thought of our friend's troubles awakened our sympathy. Presently the sensitive said, "I saw like a light come from you when you spoke, and it seemed to flow into that dark cloud that surrounded her, gradually dissipating it, so that now I can see clearly." She then, having obtained the desired information, relapsed into silence for about five minutes, and then turning to me said, "I have learned a lesson; it is that no sympathetic thought is ever lost. When you spoke it was the sympathy which accompanied your words that flowed like a light to your friend, and dissipated the darkness that surrounded her. It is so always; you cannot think kindly of anyone without their being benefited more or less according to the intensity of the thought." This is a beautiful idea, but we must not lose sight of the fact that it cuts both ways, and that a malignant thought will be as likely to cause pain to those who are vulnerable to it.

The rudimentary phases of "Thought-reading" are easily evolved. We were present some two years since at an impromptu experiment, with the following results: There were about twelve persons present, and one being requested to leave the room and retire to a distance from the door, one of those remaining pointed at some object which it was understood all present should think of, but none look at. The outsider was then recalled, met at the door by one of the party, who rested a hand on her shoulder, and with very little hesitation she walked up to the table and placed her hand upon an apple in a plate of fruit standing thereon, which was the object thought of. The same results were obtained where the object was hidden; and in further experiment, where all present thought of a word, the sensitive being directed to speak the first word she thought of when she entered the room; promptly said the word which was in the minds of those in the room. Of six persons who were tested on this occasion, four were more or less successful in indicating the objects thought of, though some were hidden in most out of the way places. The large proportion in this instance was probably due to there being several known sensitives present; but we are inclined to think that out of a mixed company at least one in six could read thoughts with more or less facility.

The few incidents we have given are illustrative of the fact that words and ideas may be transferred from mind to mind wherever there is a sympathetic connection. When our experience in this direction enlarges, we shall have more to say about it; in the meantime we would advise any of our readers who are curious in the matter to try the simple experiment alluded to in the course of this article.

The Metropolitan Spiritual Lyceum is successfully continuing its Sunday Services at Cavendish Rooms. Next Sunday the platform will be occupied by Mr. J. J. Morse, who will deliver an address on "Prayers to the Living." Full details will be found in our advertisement columns. See page v.

ON CONDITIONS OF MEDIUMSHIP.

The Moniteur Spirite et Magnétique (Brussels), for the instruction of Belgian investigators, summarises the experience of a veteran Spiritualist, printed in the Banner of Light, as follows:—

Atmospheric influences affect mediumship. A clear atmosphere and a well-ventilated séance-room are generally found to favour the action of spirits in manifesting themselves. But I have met with many exceptions to this rule, and have witnessed most satisfactory manifestations under conditions the very opposite.

Personal influences have effect. Some inquirers with a given medium, obtain satisfactory results, while others, with the same medium and apparently under the same conditions, may obtain results vague and unsatisfactory, or none at all.

The faculty of some mediums seems to be paralysed by the presence of denying antagonists—whether the antagonism be expressed or not, while antagonism does not affect others.

With some mediums satisfactory results are obtained in a public or crowded room, while with others they can only be obtained in a private circle; the best results—with a few mediums—come in the presence of one sitter only.

The communications throughout are stamped with the medium's characteristics. This is comprehensible if we reflect that the medium is not a lifeless organism, but one whose latent powers may be excited by the action of the spirit in the process of impressing his thoughts and feelings. Some spirits, however, know more than others, how to control a medium and to almost efface his or her individuality.

Through some mediums, spirits easily give their former baptismal names, others their family names; some seem to forget names and identify themselves otherwise.

The most generally good condition, in my experience, for a medium has been that he or she should be in good health bodily, and mentally; but even this has been subject to exceptions. It has been observed especially in the case of mediums for spirit-photographs.

The study of the conditions of mediumship is only yet in its early stage.

BELL RINGING.

On Christmas Day, 1873, a family party was assembled at a country house in Hampshire, where, during the evening, three of the sisters left the drawing-room, and were chatting together round the hall fire, when one of them—a young widow, whose husband died five months previously, made the remark, "If poor H—(her late husband) were with us he would ring the bells in the house—his usual custom in the evening on Christmas Day, though I never knew why he did so."

Within a few minutes, while they were still talking of him, the handle of the bell was seen to move, as if some hand drew it down. The bell rang instantly, and loudly, and was answered by a servant who found the sisters standing in mute astonishment at the ringing which they heard as well as the servants, yet no one was in the hall but themselves.

The widow has also heard the voice of her late husband speaking to her.—In a letter from a friend to A. M. H. W.

SEÑOR CASTELAR A SPIRITUALIST.—We understand that Señor Castelar, one of the most prominent figures in the political arena of Spain, is a Spiritualist. He is an advanced thinker, a man of wonderful eloquence, and one who possesses in no unmarked degree the esteem and confidence of his countrymen. Señor Castelar has on several occasions publicly testified to the reality of the phenomena of Spiritualism.

SPIRIT TEACHINGS.

SECOND SERIES.

This series of Spirit-Teachings, like the former, is made up of selections from a great mass which have been automatically written during a series of years. They are selected on no other principle than that of printing what has been valuable to the person for whom they were originally given, in so far as this can be done without trenching on what is merely of personal and private application. The latter consideration excludes a great mass of what would otherwise be interesting and valuable matter. The phraseology has been preserved, as far as possible, intact, names only being omitted. The series follows directly on the first, from which, indeed, it is separated only by the accident of its publication in another journal, and after some considerable interval of time. The publication is resumed in deference to many repeated requests.

No. XLI.

I have thought this over and talked it over, and I confess it seems to me "a new departure." If these elementaries have the power you say, and if they do beset people, as you say, it seems that it ought to be known, and one cannot help thinking that a fact which is so fundamental, and so underlies the whole theory of spirit-communication, ought to have been frankly stated at first. That many would be deterred by knowing it from going into spiritualism at all is nothing to the point. Better that they had nothing to do with it, than that they should be misled: the sport of these elementaries, and follow a mere "ignis fatuus." According to your account most Spiritualists are deluded. What then to them is the good? and if so important a piece of information has been so long kept back, how are we to know that others equally important are not suppressed? This is subversive of confidence. Before one is led into an investigation fraught with such consequences the whole case should be put before one. It is an open question in my mind whether, considering what I know, I should recommend anyone to go into the question at all. Assuming the literal truth of all you say, the question is whether any meddling with the world beyond is not perilous to us, if not positively wrong. I do not value at much the orthodox objections about necromancy and the devil; and I personally think it worth while to penetrate as far as I can, but I am increasingly inclined to think that to the vast majority of men the game is a very dangerous one, and not worth the candle. Very few understand at all the issues at stake, and fewer still are fitted to face the difficulties. Those of you who ought to be able to give us a chart of the unknown land do not help us, and something very like a false chart is laid down now and then, as in the case of these elementaries. These are points that rise in my mind, and I put them as they occur.

When you consider more deeply, you will find for yourself a ready answer to all that you have said. We do not feel it necessary to enter at length into the points you have raised. You know that we have never disguised the existence of the undeveloped spirits whom Magus calls Elementaries. We have always warned you of their power: and, if we did not minutely describe their nature, it was because we were more concerned with their work than with their extraction and source. When you are more instructed you will see that the elementary spirits of whom you now hear for the first time, are only a portion of the undeveloped who include within their ranks those also who have passed through your world without progress. We would remind you, good friend, that you are the better, not the worse for knowing of the truth. You will not be more vexed for that you know the truth, but less. You will not be perplexed as you might be by contradictory messages from other circles. It will enable you to discriminate. And as to the time we choose for giving you instruction, it must rest with us. Review the past, and you will see that we have done wisely. We must use our own discretion in the matter. If we had judged it right and necessary to tell you of this before, we should have done so. We did not so consider. It is not within your power to decide such matters. What you say as to the risks and promises of intercourse with our world, may be left to another time. We have always impressed on you caution: and there may be unstable souls who should not meddle, as indeed there are. We do not dwell on the matter now. For yourself, you know that beyond the present trouble and perplexity there is promise of full development of man's highest faculties, which will more than atone for any risk or toil. In no other way can the heights be scaled. Peace, and seek patience and repose. The Supreme guard you.

You have not answered my question at all. You have simply walked round it. I am driven to the conclusion that I am right in my opinion. As to the danger that accrues round the whole subject, I fancy that thinking men increasingly see it. So long as men are concerned with the mere phenomena the danger is not apparent, though I know now that those who sit in promiscuous circles incur a very real danger. It is when the subject is looked at in its deeper bearings that the risk is seen. When sitting ceases to be a mere amusement, when the wonder ceases and phenomena are accepted as objective facts, then comes the time when every inquiring mind asks what does all this mean? That men are ignorant of some laws, and misinformed about others is conceivable. That spirits have power over matter which to us seems miraculous is quite conceivable. What to me is inconceivable is that they should be able to tell us (comparatively) so little of their land, their life, their conditions (I refer now to the general mass of spirit-communications), and that their statements should be so contradictory. The whole subject is perplexing, and the further I penetrate the more I am bewildered. If we are, as you seem to think, in many cases the sport of deceiving spirits with no means of knowing it, then was it an evil day when the gates were set ajar. But we are no fair judges of truth, and all I want to be sure of is that I am not following a mere delusion.

It is not always well to answer your questions fully. What you have said is partly true, and has all the fallacious verisimilitude of a half-truth. Substantially, you are right in the assumption that much risk accompanies a curious prying into futurity. But you have omitted to take account of what we have frequently said, namely, that there is an authorised and wise investigation and search after lawful knowledge as well as an unholy curiosity. Not to all it is given, as you know, to tread the heights of scientific research, or to dip down deep in the wells of human knowledge. But that which would be fraught with risk to mankind at large, becomes in the hand of the pioneer of knowledge a mighty engine for the enlightenment of his race. So it is with the special branch of knowledge which concerns the future of your race in its spiritual aspects. Those who pry, and peep, and meddle with the dwellers on the threshold, as the ancient sages called the elementaries, are in risk of deception and bewilderment. They are already befooled, and you exaggerate the danger that will beset them. The impure and unholy in heart and life do run more grievous risk in proportion as they open the avenues to spirit-influence. They are already possessed of evil, and the evil of their spirits attracts round them congenial companions from our world, who can and do drive them on to deeper depths of sin. It may be that such anticipate their ruin. You must not blame us and communion with us for that: or if you will, you must set against that the comfort and consolation, the enlightenment that we have been the means of conferring upon the sorrowing and yearning souls who found no rest for themselves on earth.

Why dwell on the evil and ignore the good? Between these two classes there is a great class of men for whom communion with us is neither matter of curiosity nor vehicle of temptation. Some of them are the world's pioneers, whose receptive minds drink in new knowledge with avidity, and who see in the truths we teach an advance on previous revelation; no less than in the fact of communion with us, a vast and portentous phenomenon. If such are to be debarred from seeking, then do you crush the aspirations of spirit, and make it the bond-slave of earth. Nor are these all. There are those who have realised for themselves, from evidence which we have been able to furnish, the fact of an existence external to the body, and an intimation of their own immortality. If any have been so convinced will you dare to say that the work is not a noble one? Is it nothing to rescue even one soul from despair, and to quicken into life the slumbering soul that was sleeping the sleep of death? You do scant justice to this aspect of the question. If you needed not the evidence yourself, remember, we pray you, that vast numbers do, and that such evidence as we can give must precede any wide acceptance by those external to Churches of the fact of immortality. Nor is it right for you to ignore those also who have found a ministry of consolation in communion with their lost ones. You are careful to dwell on the fact that personating spirits may and do deceive weak and credulous men and women, who find for themselves the evidence they desire; but you forget to dwell on the cases where anguish has been soothed, and a blessed hope restored by intercourse with the friends whom you call dead. Such are not all machinations of the undeveloped.

But it is fruitless to go further. We do but desire to point out to you that you ignore a vast amount of blessing and benefit that has already come to man from the angel world. Having pointed out this we are prepared to acquiesce in a modified statement of your views as to the risks which accompany the investigation of this matter. We desire that they should be understood. We have no disposition to cloak them, no desire to slur them over. But let it be understood that they proceed more especially from man's perverse ignorance, and from his refusal to learn the simple conditions under which it is safe for him to deal with spirits. When he learns what he may and may not do respecting the medicine, the circle, and the general conditions of communication, we promise him such a diminution of risk and deception as will practically enable him to ignore them both.

But so long as mediums are unguarded, and are held to be fair subjects for scorn and suspicion: so long as circles are composed as they are: and simple precautions are neglected, so long will you have risk from the undeveloped, and folly and mischief, and falsehood and deceit. But blame yourselves, not us. Cease, on your own principle, to use knives because they cut, and to eat because gluttons abound, and men have thereby brought sickness and death upon themselves. That men, eminent in your world as pioneers of truth in connection with communion with us, have not grasped the whole subject, is no argument against us. There are departments in which good work may be done, and all are not philosophers; nor are all so constituted intellectually as to grasp the philosophy of a new and deep subject. Be content. Some break up the strong ground and remove the weeds and rubbish. Some sow and some trim the hedgerows and repair the fences. Some study what may best advance the crop, and some busy themselves with the scientific theories on which the crops are sown. Some again go deeper still and study the hidden working of the laws by which seed springs and grows to maturity: or the habits of the fly which blights its leaf: or the causes of decadence in the fruit. Be content. There is room for all. And you may leave to the future the apportionment of praise or blame for work done.

And now, good friend, leave this outer aspect of the matter, and look forward. You know in your own heart that through the mist and vapour which befores your human gaze, there is looming the light of truth. You know that though there be much that is rude and shocking to a cultivated and refined taste in the surroundings of popular search into communion with us, that there is in it, despite of all, the nucleus of the greatest truth that ever blessed humanity. You yourself would be the first to rebuke anyone who should sneer at the instrument, or charge on science or art the follies of its professors. We pray you what are the materials whereby your great artists draw forth the harmonies of the spheres and embody them for earth? Is it the music that is base, or is it not the base materials born of your world which are the necessary pre-requisites for what we may call its materialisation? If you should gaze at one of your telegraphic instruments, not knowing its intent, you might laugh to scorn the aimless clicking: but you would be wise enough to think otherwise when you knew that those to you unmeaning sounds were the vehicles of thought that spans your world, and unites in articulate communication peoples whom space has separated far as pole from pole. In truth, good friend, that which is susceptible of easy ridicule is not the spiritual but the material part of that which you discuss. It is not chargeable to us but to you. If you are wise you will ponder this. May the Supreme guard and bless you.

"SPIRIT TEACHINGS."—The following estimate of "M.A. (Oxon's)" "Spirit Teachings," by a representative American Spiritualist, has just come to hand. Dr. Crowell is one among many who have expressed themselves in similar terms, but his position as an old and tried Spiritualist, and his large acquaintance with the literature of the subject, give additional value to his words:—"I have just finished a careful perusal of 'Spirit Teachings,' and cannot speak too highly of its great, and I may say, its unrivalled merits. The Teachings are in the highest degree moral and religious, in the sense in which religion is now understood by the most intelligent Spiritualists. The effect of this book on the minds of all earnest and intelligent readers must be refining and elevating, both morally and spiritually; and it will be evident to all such minds that the Teachings could emanate only from a high order of intelligence. And not only are our moral and religious obligations clearly defined and explained in these Teachings, but they also embody a system of spiritual and moral philosophy which leaves little to be said on these vital subjects. The analysis of the Bible and theological beliefs on pages 60 to 71 is masterly in its clearness and force. There is also a moral grandeur in these Teachings which has not been surpassed, if it has been equalled in any communications given through mediums since the advent of Modern Spiritualism. Their full import can be perceived only by receptive and spiritually unfolded natures that intuitively recognise the truth, and have learned lessons of wisdom while earnestly striving to elevate themselves and others."—(Signed) EUGENE CROWELL, Brooklyn, N.Y., U.S.A., September 10th, 1883.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

Parallel Passages.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Referring to Mr. Sinnett's letter in your paper of today, in reply to Mr. Kiddle's, three weeks previously, I venture to express the opinion that the question which has been raised is not one which can be set aside as "out of date" or dismissed as a "ridiculous incident that seems to repel confidence." No scholar would thus treat parallel passages similar to those which have been quoted, occurring in ancient books or manuscripts, either in sacred or profane literature.

On examining the context in the "Occult World" I find that Mr. Sinnett does not give any information how the particular letter, from which the passage in question is quoted, came into his hands. It would be both important and interesting to know if he is in possession of evidence as to this letter similar to that which he places before the reader in regard to other letters from which he quotes. The evidence he adduces seems to present almost absolute proof that some of the letters were transmitted by occult agency, and is also very strong in favour of the writing itself having, in some instances, been produced by means of which we can form no conception.

Mr. Sinnett's testimony is clear on one point. He says:—"I now most unequivocally affirm that I shall in no case alter one syllable of the passages actually quoted. It is important to make this declaration very emphatically, because the more my readers may be acquainted with India, the less they will be willing to believe, except on the most positive testimony, that the letters from Koot Hoomi, as I now publish them, have been written by a native of India. That such is the fact, however, is beyond dispute." (p. 100, first edition.)

It may be worth noting that the passage quoted by Mr. Kiddle is to be found on pages 149 and 150 in the first edition of the "Occult World."

It is, I think, clear, that the parallel passages placed side by side in your issue of the 1st inst., present either a deeply interesting psychological problem, or that they would lead us to seek a solution in quite another direction. In either case it seems to me that the matter is of sufficient interest and importance to deserve and to demand exhaustive investigation.

Christian Symbolism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Encouraged by the kind reception my first three letters have received, I will offer a few remarks on the doctrine of the Trinity, which, indeed, I should have placed first, had I contemplated writing a series, as I have done. In this case, before shewing its esoteric significance, I shall have to amend the expression of the doctrine in the formula at present used. As at present stated, the Christian Trinity appears to consist of two Persons and an influence of an undefined nature. I once heard a class of children taught in the North country. The vicar began, "Well, my dear children, what is the subject we meditate on this day?" "The Trinity, sir," said a little boy. "And what is the Trinity?" said the vicar. "God one Substance in Three Persons." "What are they, my child?" The first boy said, "The Father, sir." "Right," said the vicar. "And the second?" "The Son, sir," said a little girl. "And the third?" A pause. "The daughter, sir!" "Oh no, my child, you forget. What do you say?" turning to the next. "The mother, sir." Worse and worse. "Oh, my child, what are you thinking of? It is the Holy Ghost. Now let me hear you again. What is the Third Person in the Holy Trinity?" "A ghost, sir!" The vicar, who was a worthy Scot of the town of Aberdeen, indulged in the national resource under difficulties, "Hum! hum!" and the more freely as the dreadful answer came forth. I went home with the vicar that evening and supped with him; he was very absorbed; two or three times in the course of the evening, he exclaimed, "That child! that child!"

But that child had hit hard on a truth and there it was; the vicar had asked for three persons to be named and three persons did the child name, not two and an influence! In a Church paper of a few weeks ago an Anglican clergyman complained that "the personality of the Holy Ghost is very much lost sight of and very vaguely apprehended." No marvel! seeing that in the generally-received formula the Third Person has no personality at all given to Him!! The first and the second have, while the third is only "a ghost," a Spirit, which title is equally applicable to all three. Nor will the doctrine be any the more intelligently comprehended till it is properly expressed. "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Spouse."

Here we have at once the true and correct formula. For God is ever the FATHER of Regenerate Humanity (which is the true Maria), ever the SON of Man being ever conceived, and brought forth by this divine Maria; ever the SPOUSE of perfected Humanity, ever lifting up to Himself His Bride. And these Three Persons are One God, even as the one man unites in himself the three personalities of father as regards his son, of son as regards his father and of spouse as regards his bride. As above, so below, and thus it is below only because it is so above. And as God is perfect in three persons, so also each man and each woman must be perfect in having within themselves the Sacred Three. For each must bring forth God within, each must himself be the Daughter, the Mother, and the Bride of God, being united, at-oned with God, and so in each must be manifested Divine Fatherhood, Sonship and Spouseness; and this is the esoteric teaching of the doctrine of the Trinity, as truly stated, and no Catholic authority can controvert the formula as I have revised it, as it is the teaching of all Catholic manuals that "Mary is the Daughter of the Eternal Father, the Mother of the Blessed Son, and the Bride of the Holy Spouse (Holy Spirit)"; also Maria is called the "Complement of the Trinity," not in the sense of being a fourth person (which would be absurd) but in the sense of being the type of the feminine side of the Godhead; and this is what is expressed in the symbol, so common but so seldom understood, of two equilateral triangles interlacing each other—the erect one symbolising the masculine Trinity of Father, Son, and Spouse, the inverted one the feminine Trinity of Mother, Maid, and Bride. As God made man in His own image, male and female, so in God is male and female—Father-Mother—Son-Daughter—Spouse-Bride—and these could not exist in the material if they did not exist in the spiritual. I may end by quoting from a certain manual before me these lines:

"Glory to Father, Son, and Spouse,
Glory to Mother, Maid, and Bride,
Who, Two in One and each in Three,
From age to age One God abide."

More I would quote from the same source, but fear to weary your readers with what would be almost a repetition of the same ideas I have just expressed.—Yours,

A CATHOLIC PRIEST.

P.S.—Will the readers of my last letter, which the Editor has most kindly reproduced, correct two errors in it: for "materialistic" read material, for "interest" read intent.

Exeter Free Spiritual Church. An Appeal.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you kindly permit me to make the following appeal to the readers of your valuable paper?

At the end of twelve months of hard self-denying work, and severe conflict in the promotion of Spiritualism in this city and neighbourhood, I find myself involved in a pecuniary liability of about £10. As there are many of your readers who follow with kindly appreciation and sympathy every distinctive pioneer work in this movement, I appeal confidently to those friends to render me a little assistance at this juncture.

I am glad to say that we are realising good success in our efforts; and that our cause is winning for itself an excellent position in the locality.

With the removal of the above-named obstacle, we shall commence the second year under very encouraging auspices.

If those who feel impressed to respond to this appeal will kindly send remittances to the address below, I will acknowledge them in "LIGHT"—either by name or in whatever way they prefer.—I remain, sir, truly yours,

C. WARE.

11, West View-terrace,
St. David's, Exeter,
September 24th, 1883.

[We very willingly give publicity to Mr. Ware's appeal, and hope a few friends will assist in freeing the Exeter Society from debt. We have known of Mr. Ware's work from the commencement, and believe it to be in every way worthy of support.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

SPIRITUALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

THE GLASGOW TRANCE-PAINTING MEDIUM.
PRESENTATION OF A TESTIMONIAL.

A social meeting was held under the auspices of the Glasgow Spiritualists' Association, on the evening of the 11th September, on the occasion of presenting Mr. David Duguid with a testimonial, in acknowledgment of his long and valuable services on behalf of Spiritualism. The meeting was held in the Carlton-place Hall, and was attended by a goodly number of sympathisers with the object of the gathering. Mr. J. J. Morse occupied the chair, while on his right and left sat Mr. Robinson, President of the Association; Mr. Duguid, Mr. H. Nisbet, and Mr. Robert Harper, of Birmingham.

In opening the proceedings, the Chairman, in eloquent terms, alluded to the occasion of their meeting. He was younger in the movement, he said, than some of those on the platform, yet he would yield to none in the respect and admiration he entertained for Mr. David Duguid as a man and a medium. None knew so well what it was to fight the battle of mediumship as those who had passed through it. How often was it the case that the very life of the sensitive medium was eaten out of him by the querulous remark, or the suspicious glance, of a conceited onlooker. All mediums had more or less of this to endure; and Mr. Duguid knew better than anyone the sore trials he has had to bear for now nearly twenty years. But it was satisfactory to know that his name had gone abroad over the world, as a man and medium of the strictest integrity.

Mr. Harper, in very eulogistic language, alluded to the career of Mr. Duguid, and said that whatever else might be said in praise of him, he was doubtless an honest man. Notwithstanding the cold criticism of a too smart world, there is in the book called "Hafed," the clear potential elements of honesty all through—a wonderful book, when we know the man and read the book. Though many mediums will stand high in the history of Spiritualism, the name of the painting medium of Glasgow will take no hindmost place. I have sat (said Mr. Harper) in his circle over a score times, and paid nothing; and while I have paid considerably to sit with other mediums, and have been sometimes more than doubtful of the things I saw, I have carried away with me from Glasgow rare gems done, through Mr. Duguid's mediumship, without contact of human hands. I have exhibited these, stating the conditions under which they were done, and these little card-paintings and drawings told a powerful tale at many a public debate in Birmingham, and were looked upon by many as big facts. I have seen these card pictures done in light, good enough to perceive the card lying on the table—the torn-off corner being in possession of my wife all the time—the gas was turned up, and on the card was a picture in oil-colours that was not there a minute before. I have seen this and a hundred other manifestations. These direct card pictures, given freely to visitors, have been carried away to all parts of the world. Mr. Nisbet, who has stuck to this thing with a marvellous persistency, peculiarly British—especially North British—holds on by his gifted friend, and they don't mean to give up. Hundreds of people all over the country have, through the ministry of Mr. Duguid, been made to realise the great fact of a soul-world—people who never had had the fact brought home to them under the ministry of men who assume to be spiritual guides.

The Chairman, in a few pithy and humorous remarks, then called on

Mr. Nisbet, who said that he felt bound to say something on the present occasion, notwithstanding his well-known habit of evading platform duty. He said that, after such addresses as they had listened to, he saw no necessity for him to give more than a brief statement of facts in connection with the rise and progress of Mr. David Duguid as a medium. Some time (said Mr. Nisbet) in 1865, I, along with our friend, witnessed some spiritual manifestations in the house of Mr. Whittaker, chief designer in Messrs. Wylie and Lochhead's, which resulted in our trying the thing for ourselves at my own fire-side. We had not long to wait, for at the first sitting we had very striking evidence that there was "something in it." We continued night after night, and in a few weeks we had two full-fledged mediums developed—first, one of my daughters, and then Mr. Duguid. The one helped the other, as will be seen in the account given in my introduction to the volume, "Hafed Prince of Persia." The first painting sance open to visitors took place in my house on the 8th June, 1866, and from that date onwards, the sittings were continued twice a week, till February, 1868; and on reference to my first volume of MS. Records, I find we had admitted 600 visitors to witness Mr. Duguid painting in trance. At times we felt the pressure rather great, and occasionally we had to turn visitors from the door. Then, to the great disgust of the medium, a war of words got up in the newspapers, which had the effect of increasing the requests for admission. Our friend here did not at all relish the appearance of his name in the papers—even when accompanied by warm eulogium. Thereafter we restricted visitors to once a week. These were from all classes in society. We have had peers of the realm, magistrates, ministers, lawyers, doctors of medicine, professors of universities, artists and actors, merchants, and indeed people of every grade, not only in Glasgow, but from every quarter of the world. I calculate that not fewer than 4,000 persons have, during these 17 years, been freely admitted to witness Mr. Duguid at work in the abnormal state. In addition to the scores of large and small pictures painted in trance, about 900 direct paintings and drawings have been executed and given away to visitors, so that, being shown to others, they might be the means of creating thoughtful inquiry into Spiritualism. This was the end purposed when the direct cards were first given to us by the spirit artists. At an early period of the medium's development I was told by our spirit friends that all kinds of phenomena could be produced through him, and that in due time we might look for such. That promise has been fulfilled in the production, now and again, of a variety of spirit-manifestations; but we were told, at the same time, that they would not continue to use the medium except for trance-painting and communications in trance, which are the chief features in Mr. Duguid's mediumship. About fourteen or fifteen years ago he was controlled by the spirit of an ancient Persian—"Hafed Prince of Persia," who, up to the present time, has given a multitude of communications. Other spirits have also controlled, and contributed their quota. The communications have been for six or seven years regularly reported by Mr. Garriock, and would now form two or three volumes, such as that already issued to the public—I mean the book entitled "Hafed Prince of Persia." These records comprise a vast number of answers to questions—Addresses on a variety of subjects—A History of Persia, given by spirits living on the earth in prehistoric times, through Hafed—The Missionary travels of Hermes and his band of evangelists in Abyssinia, Arabia, Northern Persia, and Asia Minor—The Life of "White Star," an ancient American, who lived 5,000 years ago—The Story of "Little Bear," a Red Indian—The Life and Missionary Travels of the Brahmin (who was brought back to life by Jesus) in India, Tartary, China, Japan, &c.—The Evangelistic labours of the Two Brethren sent out by Hafed from the Church in Persia—The Story of a Scottish Priest, living in the reign of James III.—Life of Sir John Hawkins, the contemporary of Drake—Ghost Stories given by the spirit of an English Chemist of the 18th century—The experiences and persecution of a French Huguenot—Earth-experiences of Ruisdal and Jan Steen, the Dutch Painters, &c., &c. By this enumeration, you will be able to conceive the amount of labour Mr. Duguid has gone through during these years, and on behalf of the cause with which we are identified. It was in consideration of this that a zealous friend of the movement suggested the getting up of a testimonial to Mr. Duguid. The appeal was made by circular to a number of friends, but became public by certain of these getting it inserted in our weekly Spiritualist papers free of charge. Notwithstanding, the response to the appeal has not been up to our expectations. And now, Mr. Duguid, I have very great pleasure in handing you this cheque for thirty pounds, as a small acknowledgment, on the part of the subscribers, of their indebtedness to you for your lengthened and unwearying work on behalf of our noble movement. Before sitting down, I have to say that, in order to secure the presence of Messrs. Morse and Harper, as a representation of English friends on this occasion, the meeting was announced before receiving all the subscriptions promised, and that I expect to have the pleasure of adding to the cheque four or five pounds.

Mr. Duguid said he did not know how to express, as he should do, the feelings of his heart, for all that had been said of him, and done for him. He felt, as it were, tongue-tied, and could only express his deepest thanks for this mark of approbation.

Mr. Thomas Garriock, in a few pithy sentences, added his testimony to the genuine character of Mr. Duguid as a man and as a medium. He had been a member of the circle which met in Mr. Duguid's house for eight years, and he was in a position to say that he had never come across a man so unselfish, so obliging, so unassuming, so thoroughly to be trusted, as Mr. Duguid. Time would not permit to tell a hundredth part of what he had seen. He then briefly referred to the direct voice, the materialised forms, &c., and concluded by paying a high compliment to Mrs. Duguid for her courtesy and kindness to visitors.

Mr. Morse was then controlled by "The Strolling Player," who, in his usual pungent and pithy style, gave good and wise counsel to all and sundry. Thereafter, Mr. James Robertson alluded, in appropriate terms, to the kindness of Messrs. Harper and Morse on this and other occasions, and the proceedings (which had been greatly enlivened by songs and recitations from Messrs. Barker, Munro, Harper, Donald, and J. R. Nisbet) were brought to a close.—From the Spiritual Record for October.

A SPIRITUAL TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.—Mr. James Burns has been holding some open-air temperance meetings on Clerkenwell Green on Sunday mornings, and reports that he was listened to with marked attention. This is practical work, and of a kind which we wish were more frequently and systematically attempted by Spiritualists.

Professor Lankester, of Bow-street notoriety in connection with the case of Dr. Slade, pleads for "the Endowment of Research," which appears to be that he and such as he should be subsidised by the State, such people being generally understood to be in search of knowledge, but not bound to teach it, or to produce results! But Professor Lankester was always very modest!

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Contributed by "M. A. (Oxon.)"

Messrs. Gurney and Myers contribute to the October number of the Nineteenth Century, an elaborate article on mesmerism, which they propose to follow by another on the higher and rarer phenomena of clairvoyance, phrenomesmerism, and mesmeric healing. The present article deals chiefly with the known and, indeed, familiar phenomena which, as the writers justly remark, though eminently impressive in themselves, and impressively stated in such publications as the Zoist, and by such writers as Dr. Elliotson, have left little or no mark on the scientific thought of the age. It is indeed marvellous to any one fresh from a study of the works of Gregory, Elliotson, and other writers of unquestioned repute, that such facts so put forth should have fallen almost absolutely out of the public mind. The seed fell on a rock and found no chance of germination. It would seem that there must be a condition of preparedness in the public mind before ideas can fructify. There was no such condition then. Is there better hope now? The existence of the Society for Psychical Research, and the exhaustive series of experiments that it has conducted in Mesmerism as well as in other kindred fields of research, are a sufficient answer.

The theory of Hypnotism, started by Braid and elaborated by Heidenhain—which is, roughly, that the abnormal state is self-induced, and is not attributable to any external cause such as an effluence from any particular operator—is rejected by the writers as insufficient to cover the whole ground. The fact that some persons can operate successfully, and others cannot, has never been met. If there be no effluence from the operator how comes it that a given person can influence a given "subject" with unvarying certainty, even through a wall or curtain, and when the sensitive is quite unaware that the effort is to be made? How comes it that a "subject" so influenced can be released only by the particular person who controlled him, and by no one else? How are the singular effects of cross-mesmerism to be explained? If the phenomena are covered by the idea of "suggestion," as the scientists would have us to believe, how are we to account for such an experiment as this? A boy is mesmerised, and told he may have a sovereign if he can pick it up. He tries with all his might; the sweat pours down his face; his countenance shews the action of violent passions, but he is powerless.

The sovereign remains on the floor, in spite of his most energetic attempts. It needs something more than a mere theory of "suggestion" to cover such cases.

The elaborate series of experiments by which the Committee of the Society for Psychical Research disproved the hypnotic theory as applicable universally, are familiar to the readers of "LIGHT." They were absolutely complete, and showed conclusively that a given finger, for instance, that had been surreptitiously mesmerised (if I may so say), was perfectly insensible to pain. A lighted match applied to the sensitive region surrounding the finger-nail, and a sharp carving-fork driven into the finger, alike failed to elicit the faintest cry, or to produce any perceptible effect. But it is impossible to do any justice in a necessarily brief and rapid summary to the condensed arguments of Messrs. Gurney and Myers, by which they demonstrate the reality of the mesmeric force, or, in other words, the reality of the specific facts of mesmerism, as distinct from those of Hypnotism. These latter, by the way, are fully admitted. It is against the universal applicability of the theory that the writers contend.

One of the most interesting portions of a very interesting paper is that in which the writers point out that many of the more startling phenomena produced by mesmerism occur spontaneously in certain cases of abnormal nervous affection. "It is not mesmerism which is responsible for them, but Nature; i.e., mesmerism offers a special way of producing phenomena which have been spontaneously produced in ways wholly unknown to us before Mesmer was born." Spontaneous sleep-wakers shew certain modifications of waking consciousness, extending irregularly over one or more of five regions. (1) Sensibility to pain, (2) sensory and supersensory perception, (3) the current of consciousness, (4) memory, and (5) character or emotional disposition—shew certain marked changes. In each of these particulars science is "familiar with changes induced by states of nutrition, by expectant attention, by narcotics, by disease." "But in each case the spontaneous sleep-waking-state will be found to carry us on by an unbroken series from changes which are familiar, and in a certain sense explicable, to changes which are altogether baffling and apparently at conflict with recognised law." How this thesis is elaborated and illustrated I must leave my readers to find from a perusal of the article to which I am now drawing their attention. It is eminently worth careful attention, as one of (I trust) many attempts to set before the public facts of vast importance, and, in the words of the writers, to "drive a new roadway of direct experiment into the jungle of those obscure phenomena which Science neglects, because they cannot be accurately tested, and Ignorance distorts because they cannot be authoritatively explained."

To the names of eminent scientific thinkers—Zöllner, Clifford, Spottiswoode—who have speculated as to the existence of other dimensions of space, must now be added that of Professor Cayley, President of the British Association for the Advancement of Science. Though he frankly confessed his inability to demonstrate the existence of a fourth dimension of space, he was not afraid to speculate on the existence of any number of dimensions. The only difficulty, he rather naïvely admitted, was in taking the first step in the demonstration. He got round his difficulty by arguing from a two-dimensional space, which he could conceive, to a four-dimensional space inconceivable to one who is only a three-dimensional being. The probability to which Professor Cayley leaned that space is of infinite dimensions, and that we are, by the laws of our present being, limited to a miserable three of them, is one that thoughtful students of Psychological phenomena will not quarrel with. The experiments of Zöllner, and the deductions that he drew from his observations make entirely in the direction of the acceptance of that hypothesis.

The possibilities of a two-dimensional existence are amusingly put in a paper in the current number of The Spectator called "Space Fancies."

"Watch," the writer says, "the shadows thrown on the ground by the sun, how they slide and change, continually varying in shape and size, and constant in nothing but in this—that they never leave some surface or other. Endow your shadow with life, according to the fancy of the old story. Make him independent of yourself and of the sun, and imagine the existence he would spend, gliding over the surface of the world, never lifting his head into the air, not feeling fettered, because not able to conceive the motion of which he is incapable. Give him a quasi-substance, so that other shadows may be as impenetrable by him as ordinary matter by our own bodies. Fix and define his shape, if you like; or if you prefer it, imagine a state of existence in which no shapes are fixed or permanent. Imagine a world in which existence is shut in on the right hand and the left by illimitable walls of nothingness, where the only way of passing a man in the street would be to jump over his head, where books could only have one line in each page, and where the Morse Alphabet would be the only admissible form of writing, for even to cross a t would make a projection from the page like that of a book printed in raised type. Imagine a universe with suns, and stars, and worlds of its own, which could be rolled up like a scroll, and put away in a corner, without its inhabitants perceiving a change! Or again, suppose the shadow to have rigidity as well as substance, so as not to be unaffected by changes of curvature in the surface in which he moved. He would no longer be able to glide indifferently over surfaces of every shape. If he came to a sudden bend or a sharp crease in the surface to which he was confined, he would be brought to a stand. It is curious to speculate what his sensations would be. It might be that he would find himself mysteriously, and without perceptible cause, unable to move forward. It might be that the crease would have the effect to him of a solid wall of matter, perceptible by his senses as is what we call matter by ours. A small isolated wrinkle in the surface might appear to him a detached piece of matter. Nay, he might himself be merely a moving wrinkle, a wave, in the surface which is his space. Hence the bold suggestion of Clifford that in our own world also the difference between space where matter is and space where matter is not may be only a difference of curvature. Thus it would follow that men themselves are just wrinkles of a similar description, and that we differ from nothingness only by jutting out indefinitely little into the Fourth Dimension of Space."

The Rev. S. Houghton, M.D., F.R.S., a mathematician of eminence, preached before the members of the British Association at their recent meeting at Southport. He dealt speculatively with the evidences for a God as drawn from an observation of Nature. He discussed the question "as a matter of pure logic and reasoning, without any reference to revelation," and drew his arguments from sources which are commending themselves to the class of mind which he was addressing. The Bishop of Carlisle, preaching on the same day, set himself to harmonise the truth of religion and of science. He showed how increasing knowledge led men to see a close union between what, on a superficial view, seemed very dissimilar things, e.g., heat, light, electricity; and he argued that a perfect knowledge and an unclouded view could shew us that the knowledge of God and the knowledge of Nature were one and the same. It is surely a striking sign of the times that such views should be set forth by two such eminent men on an occasion which would so emphasise and give prominence to them.

An enthusiastic admirer of Gerald Massey's has been acting with some of the indiscretion that proverbially belongs at times to ill-regulated zeal. He proposed the formation of a fund to support Mr. Massey in his lecturing tour through America and elsewhere. But this by no means pleases the unwilling object of an unwelcome attention. Mr. Massey protests that "an enemy" might have done this. He has no sort of idea of fleecing his supporters, nor of accepting at their hands any subscriptions whatever. Though he deals largely with the symbolism of ecclesiastical functions, he does not add to them the commonest function of all—the "taking up of a collection." Mr. Massey is certainly entitled to protest against being made ridiculous by this "heartly admirer," whose notions of what is fitting are as strange as his way of phrasing his opinions. "Is this fragile man," he asks in a fine burst of feeling, "to take his tongue in his hand and march around the world with it as his stock-in-trade?" Mr. Massey declines to put his tongue to that remarkable service. He will not only not carry that very active member of which he makes such good use, in his hand, but he will carry nothing else with him, except, as he says, a brave heart. I do not suppose that all this can in any way hurt Gerald Massey, but he is entitled to have it known by all whom it concerns that it is extremely distasteful to him.

SYMBOLISM THE LANGUAGE OF GOD.

"Some from tongue or speech
Bunish all figure, comprehend it not.
Others read wisdom, through similitudes,
Through mediums of external sign and form;
Their speech by nature rich with images.
And this, if I with reverence so may speak,
Is God's own language; yea, that Eastern tongue
In which He chose to converse with mankind,
Is formed by symbols. Is not all His world,
And all His Word, one speaking parable,
Speaking to some of things invisible?
All things with Him are double; each event
Doth throw its shadow forward; all His Word
Is a full store of countless images:
Who knows them best is most Divinely wise."

From "The Baptistry," an anonymous poem, of great beauty, published by Messrs. Parker and Co., Oxford, twenty years ago.

"THE BANNER OF LIGHT."—With the current issue this excellent American spiritual journal enters upon its fifty-fourth volume, and upon the last half of its twenty-seventh year of existence.

The diary of Baroness Adeline Von Vay's days of childhood, "Tagbuch eines Kleinen Mädchens," has been translated into English by Miss Caroline Corner. It was originally published in aid of the funds of the hospital of which the Baroness is a zealous patron, and it is expected that five hundred dollars will be added thereto from its sale. The Baroness is a fine trance-medium.

SPIRITUALISM IN SPAIN.—Spain, rather than any other country, should receive distinction amid the higher records of our faith; for the people of this country have more to contend with than any other where Spiritualism has made conspicuous progress. Every one knows how difficult it is to throw off the impressions of childhood, the thralldom of early education; think then what the Spaniards have had to do in taking even one step along the path Spiritualism points out. The anathema of the whole Catholic Church is hurled at them; and the frowns of the priesthood they encounter at every corner; and they have been taught to dread the former as the direst calamity of their lives, and the latter as heralding downfall in any business they may undertake. It is wonderful, then, to witness the sterling strength which inheres, manifestly, in that body of our co-religionists who, thanks to a wisely liberal Government, can proclaim their sentiments in public assemblies and publish them to the world in the form of papers, magazines, and books; and, in respect of the two former, Spain has hardly a rival.—G. L. Ditsen, in "Banner of Light."

REMARKABLE SEANCES.

No. III.

I wish to relate three or four cases of "identity," in proof that the spirits who communicate are the spirits of those whose names they bear; are, in reality, what they represent themselves to be.

I know that very often there are wicked influences at work to deceive: sometimes for evil purposes; at other times deluding in a sort of "tricky" humour, followed, no doubt, by a laugh, (we may imagine, although we cannot hear it) at the credulity of the listener.

Happily I have not had much experience in that way; but I have heard of many of those who were great men and women on earth, appearing at sittings of men and women yet in the flesh, and telling them—nothing worth a doit. It is no unusual thing for persons to receive messages from kings and queens, statesmen, warriors, authors, artists, whose names

"In fame's eternal volume live for aye."

—and who were, for any evidence they adduce, cobblers and stone breakers—or worse—when they were earth-dwellers.*

Deceptions of the kind, I repeat, have rarely happened to me; very recently, however, I received a message from the —, to convey to the —. I did nothing of the kind: for it was accompanied by no communication I could recognise and adduce as a test.

The subject is far too large to be treated here; but I will relate three or four instances of such communications, where there could be no doubt that the spirits communicating with me, when on earth were the persons they represented themselves to have been.

I received—the medium being Daniel Home, who I am sure was rarely deluded, and never a wilful deluder—a message that purported to be from a daughter of Robert Chambers, concerning a family matter of much delicacy; when requested to communicate it to my honoured friend, I declined to do so unless I obtained some test that might convince him it was actually his daughter's spirit that had been with me. The spirit said, "Tell him, pa love." I asked Robert Chambers if he knew what that meant. He said they were the last words his dying child had uttered on earth, as he raised her head above the pillow. I then considered myself free to deliver to him the message intrusted to me to deliver.

At a sitting at our house, The Ferns, Upper Norwood, on the 23rd November, 1865 (I believe that to be the year, but am not quite sure), there were present Kate Fox, the medium (it was before her marriage to Mr. Jencken), Miss Ogden, an American lady, the artist James Orrock and his wife, Mr. Benjamin Coleman, and Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall.

There came to us a spirit, an utter stranger to all of us, who gave us the following message. In printing these details I give merely the initials of the names; but I think there is no reason why the right initials should not be given; although some may thus recognise the persons.

"Will you let me intrude my presence, first, and breathe a message to my father, who is inconsolable. I died very suddenly at Christ College. Tell my father to come and talk with me. I can comfort him. My name is H—B—W—. I died on the 17th November. My father's name is T—C—W—. I died at Christ College, Cambridge. Direct to Christ College, Cambridge, T—C—W—. I was twenty-one, and have one brother. I wish to tell my father the meaning. All this is true as there is a God in Heaven. Farewell."

Next day, the 24th November, I wrote to the father, * Abundant communications have, from time to time, been sent to me, purporting to be autograph poems from renowned poets who were, when "living," personally known to me, asking me to verify them. They were in nearly all cases utter trash, though "written" by Thomas Moore, L.E.L., Felicia Hemans, Coleridge, Charles Lamb, and others of equal earth-glory!

merely stating that if he had lately lost a son at Cambridge, I wished to make a communication to him. To that letter I received no reply: the subject, of which he probably had an "inkling," was no doubt distasteful to him: at all events, he did not answer my letter.

Guess my astonishment when, on the 27th November, I read this announcement in the "Deaths" column of the Times:—

"On the 17th Nov., at Christ College, Cambridge, deeply lamented, H—B—W—, second son of T—C—W—, Esq., of C—Hall, Yorkshire."

I offer no comments on this impressive evidence of identity. I find the record written partly in Mrs. Hall's handwriting and partly in mine, with the printed passage cut from the Times newspaper of the 27th November.

A more remarkable evidence of identity I have to relate. In 1862 (I think it was) I was invited to a sitting by the artist, Mr. Hannah, at his house at Queen's Elm, Brompton, to meet the medium, Mr. Colchester (an American, since dead). Anticipating the evening, I wrote a name in pencil on a very small piece of paper, and enclosed the paper in seven envelopes of different sizes, "criss-crossing" the envelopes, so as to render it next to impossible to open them undetected. When I entered Mr. Hannah's house, Colchester was there; he had never before seen me, and did not know my name. I placed the envelope enclosures in his hand and said, "Mr. Colchester, I desire, if it be possible, to receive a communication from one whose name I have written in that paper." He pressed it between his hands, and threw it into the grate, retiring into the next room—a lighted and not a dark room. I took it up, put it into the fire, saw it burnt, and followed him. Soon after we were seated, he pointed to me (whose name, I repeat, he did not know) and said: "Sir, there is a spirit by your side who desires to communicate with you." I said, "Let the spirit tell me his earthly name." He repeated the alphabet, and the letters spelt out "HAMILTON HALL." "Yes," I said, "that was the name I had written; now if you are the spirit of my brother Hamilton, tell me what I mean by this!" slapping my hand upon my thigh. The alphabet was again used, and the answer spelt out by raps at the several letters was this: "I did it with a knife."

When we were children about eight or ten years old) I was the elder, I was teasing him one day. Suddenly he took up the carving knife and threw it at me. It struck me in the thigh, and the mark it made is visible there to this day.*

I have one other incident to recall: In 1860, sitting with Daniel Home (some persons of distinction being present) the spirit of my father came to us. When the name "Robert Hall" was announced, I asked if he were my father or my brother, my sailor brother was so-called; the answer being "Your father, Colonel Hall." I requested some test to make me sure. The answer given was this. It excited laughter among the party by whom it was not understood, but I knew that a more conclusive and convincing test could not have been given to me: "The last time we met in Cork, you pulled my tail." Like all military officers of his time, he wore the queue; he wore it indeed up to his death, and was buried with it. Few persons living can remember the queue; the hair behind was suffered to grow long, sometimes as long as two feet; it was tied with black ribbon up to nearly the end; an idea may be had of its character from old portraits, or indeed from pictures of Chinese mandarins. We always call it the "tail;" its less respectable title was "pig-tail." Consequently, when my father's spirit gave me that test, he could have given me none, I repeat, so conclusive and convincing for none of the other persons present could have guessed what was meant. I have no doubt that when we did last "meet in Cork" (where in 1826 he resided) I did pull his tail, to remind him of an old playful practice of his children.

* I had another brother, a naval officer, who was the best swimmer in the service. He had left the navy, and was chief mate of an East India ship. A hundred miles off the Cape of Good Hope, one night he was missed; and was never heard of afterwards. The ship had been hove to, blue lights were burnt, and the boats lowered. It was a remarkably calm night; there was little wind; yet the captain and crew heard nothing and saw nothing of him—their much loved officer. In 1865 or thereabouts, I was at a sitting with Daniel Home (Lords Dunraven and Lindsay being present). Daniel was in a trance, when I chanced to say, "I have often wished to know how my brother Robert was drowned, a perfect swimmer, on a tranquil night." Daniel rose from his seat in apparent terror and agony, and exclaimed—"Shark! Shark! Shark!" I have not the least doubt that my brother accidentally fell overboard (a very trifling accident under ordinary circumstances, it would have been to him) and was seized by a shark before he could give alarm to the watch on deck; that his voice was stifled as he was drawn under the water.

No doubt I might add other cases of "identity" as strong as those I have given. But your columns will not bear treatment of the subject at greater length. Moreover, I think there must be some of your readers who can and will supply you with facts more effective than I can—as evidence that the spirits who communicate with us, though sometimes fraudulent cheats, are often entirely reliable witnesses to the truth of the doctrine in which so many of us thoroughly believe: acting continually, if not invariably, in accordance with the advice of the apostle, "Try the spirits!" None know better than Spiritualists, the truth of the poet's lines:—

"The devil can cite Scripture for his purpose,
An evil soul producing holy witness
Is like a villain with a smiling cheek,
A goodly apple rotten at the heart."

VISION OF JOSEPH HOAG.

The following is a leaflet printed by T. Lingard, printer, "Chronicle" Office, Barnsley, but bearing no date. It is, however, not of recent date, since it has been for years in the possession of the sender.

"Joseph Hoag's parents were Presbyterians, who endeavoured to educate their children in accordance with their tenets; but he early became a member of the religious Society of Friends, and, in process of time, an acknowledged minister, in which capacity he travelled extensively. He and his wife Huldah (who was also a minister) were the parents of a large family, all of whom became ministers. Joseph was born in the year 1762, and resided in early life in the wilderness part of New York, where he experienced many hardships. He afterwards removed to Vermont, and there died in 1846. Though the following vision was not known till recently, yet he communicated the same to his children and some of his friends many years ago. Joseph's estimable character, as well as that of his family, forbid the supposition of doubt as to the genuineness of the vision.

"In the year 1803 (he said) in the eighth or ninth month, I was one day alone in the field, and observed that the sun shone clear—but a mist eclipsed its brightness. As I reflected upon the singularity of the event, my mind was struck into a silence the most solemn I ever remember to have witnessed, for all my faculties were low and unusually brought into deep silence. I said to myself, 'What can all this mean? I do not recollect ever before to have been sensible of such feelings.' And I heard a voice from Heaven saying, 'This which thou seest is a sign of the present coming time. I took the forefathers of this country from a land of oppression; I placed them here among the people of the forest; I sustained them, and while they were humble I blessed and fed them, and they became a numerous people. But they have now become proud, and have forgotten me who nourished them and protected them in the wilderness, and are running into every abomination and evil practice of which the old countries are guilty, and have taken quietude from the land and suffered a dividing spirit to come among them—lift up thy eyes and behold!' And I saw them dividing in great heat. The division began in the churches on points of doctrine—it commenced in the Presbyterian society, and went through the various religious denominations; and in its progress and close, its effects were the same. Those who dissented went off with high heads and taunting language, and those who kept to their original sentiments, appeared exercised and sorrowful. And when the dividing spirit entered the Society of Friends, it raged in as high a degree as in any I had noticed or before discovered; and as before, they who separated went off with lofty looks and taunting, censuring language. Those who kept their ancient principles retired by themselves. It next appeared in the lodges of the Freemasons—it broke out in appearance like a volcano; inasmuch, as it set the country in an uproar for a time. Then it entered politics throughout the United States, and did not stop until it produced a civil war; an abundance of blood was shed in the course of the combat; the Southern States lost their power, and slavery was annihilated from their borders. Then a Monarchical power sprang up—took the government of the States—established a national religion, and made all societies tributary to support its expenses. I saw them take property from Friends: I was amazed at beholding all this, and I heard a voice proclaiming—'This power shall not always stand, but with it I will chastise my Church until they return to the faithfulness of their forefathers. Thou seest what is coming upon thy native land, for their iniquities and the blood of Africa—the remembrance of which is to come up before me.' This vision is yet for many days. I had no idea of writing it for many years, until it became such a burden, that for my own relief I have written it."

THE ANGEL OF DEATH.—"A correspondence on 'Death' has recently taken place in the columns of the Detroit Free Press, and in bright contrast to the general gloomy tone of the writers, is a short letter from C. Gordon Pulsford, of Cardiff. It would almost seem as if the light of knowledge had tinged his thoughts, gilding his life with a consolation to be obtained in no other way. 'I too have lost by the visit of the pitiful, not pitiless, angel, Death. I have seen him in his sterner aspect. I have seen two dearly loved children, brother and sister, pass away in the agonies of suffocation; the little forms writhing with the struggle for breath; and I have seen him come softly to the help of an aged soul, who, after patient years of toil and sorrow, had grown so young, so like her Father that she was ready to go to Him to the home prepared for her among the many mansions. I have seen the angel, Death, in many aspects, but always as an angel of God, telling the message afresh that 'it is better on before.' We live our lives here, we work and work, often for what seems but a miserable pittance, and miserable indeed it would be were it not that the earthly recompense we obtain is not all. We are able to look forward to death as a recompense, so full, so complete, so perfect, so lovely that we can have but a faint conception of it now. The images of earth are neither perfect enough in form nor colours to enable us to imagine the splendour of what we call death. For, what is it? It is the lifting of this curtain of flesh that now hinders our vision of the beauty of holiness. It is the passing from the outer to the inner courts of the tabernacle. It is admission into the holy of holies."

MR. BISHOP AND HIS BANK NOTES.—The following paragraph has gone the round of the Press, and we cannot help asking whether this is not another of Mr. Bishop's plans for obtaining a gratuitous advertisement at a very cheap rate. It would appear so, and we should not be surprised if Mr. Bishop professed to find the stolen notes. "Those who hide can find" would be very applicable in this case, at any rate:—"A robbery of an extraordinary character has been reported to the head constable of Liverpool, the person robbed being Mr. Irving Bishop, and the theft being, strange to say, of bank notes, whose numbers he claims to be able to read in the dark. It seems that Mr. Bishop, who was staying at the Grand Hotel, went from his room for the purpose of proceeding down to the bar of the hotel to settle his bill. He left on the table of his room four bank notes for a considerable amount, and it is reported to the police that on his return the notes were gone. A search was made everywhere for them, but they could not be found and the conclusion came to was that some person in the hotel must have stolen them. The police were sent for, and four detectives searched for the thought-reader's missing notes, but were equally unsuccessful in finding them. The detective police, by the instructions of the head constable, are still investigating this extraordinary robbery; and it is somewhat cruelly suggested that a person so clever as Mr. Bishop in divining the identity of bank notes ought really to have little difficulty in discovering where his own are to be found."

Christian Symbolism.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In addition to my last on the Trinity, which, I presume, will appear along with this, and be my last utterance, I see nothing to say to the letter of "S. C." but that he simply re-asserts all which I had shown to be erroneous, and so cannot have fully digested the explanations in my letters; nor can I agree with "K." that my expositions are only for the few and the learned, since their absolute simplicity and clearness, it seems to me, will commend themselves to all minds that think, while for the rest, the usual instruction "by parables" will suffice. One word more suggested by a contemporary. Has it ever occurred to the thoughtful that, at least the ecclesiastical and literal use of the words, Christian and christening can only apply to members of the Catholic Church (Roman or Greek), since they alone use oil or Chrism in the rite of initiation? Christ is anointed, Christian-anointed, and christen, to anoint; how, then, can these terms be correctly used of those outside the Catholic Church, who have consequently never been anointed or christened?—Yours,

A CATHOLIC PRIEST

(but not of the Roman fold alone).

Causation.

"Truth is the body of God, Light is his Shadow."—P. late.

SIR,—May I say a word on the great mistake in the attempt to fathom the nature of "the great First Cause least understood," itself without a cause—what must to us be occult and unintelligible, the incomprehensible of the Christian, the noumenon of Kant, "the unknowable absolute" of Herbert Spencer, the unfathomable of all—so that all speculation in respect to it must be mere fancy and untrue in a misuse of the human understanding resting on particulars observed in daylight experience—a mind in nature, or a being outside nature. All equally shew the mistake as to the nature of reason and human capacities. "God is hidden under all that shines" but the light itself hides its origin or efficient cause or reason.

HENRY G. ATKINSON.

Zschokke on Proofs of Immortality.

SIR,—Dr. Wyld's idea of the proof of an independent soul from the effects occurring under the influence of anaesthetics reminds me of a passage in the life of that remarkable man Zschokke, philosopher, statesman, philanthropist, Spiritualist, and clairvoyant. The passage is this: "It was at this time I wrote the 'Yearning after the Invisible,' which expressed the joyful state of my feelings. I often smiled at the strange proofs of the immortality of the soul, which philosophers had discovered, and thought that pure, disinterested virtue would be an impossibility to us, if we possessed any absolutely irrefragable and indubitable certainty on this point," &c., which seems to me to be highly spiritual and sound sense.

I have made experiments and have had the experience myself, as described in my letters to Miss Martineau, p. 152, that "when etherised myself, I felt all nature dissolved away, leaving only mind," because the senses being deadened the mind consisted in itself, and Bacon says under divination "the mind, when it is withdrawn and collected into itself, and not diffused into the organs of the body, hath some extent and latitude of pre-nation, which appeareth most in sleep, in ecstasies and near death, and more rarely in waking apprehensions; and is induced and furthered by those abstinences and observances which make the mind most to consist in itself." That is confined to its special organ of consciousness the cerebrum, which is the fact, the whole case and all that it proves.

The late Sergeant Cox as President of the Psychological Society thought that the constant exchange of the particles of the whole body whilst memory remained with the sense of possibility and sameness was proof of an independent soul, forgetting the animal magnetic transfer of the existing qualities and characteristics. Memory and the sense of self evidently include the fresh particle, or you must equally demand a permanent soul for your dog and cat, nay, for the mouse and rat and the little fleas that bite them. But what we wish to believe is powerful argument, for the feelings precede logic, and idealism that denies the existence of an external world has a rare time of it with Davy's case to prove it, but who when he came to himself would make a nice fuss if you trod upon his corn.

Errata in "Light" for September 1st.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I was pleased, on my return to England, to find my letter inserted in "LIGHT" for September 1st, but I very soon discovered that not only was the Editor out of town, but the printer was very obviously "abroad." This is so rare an event that I venture to ask a few lines for "correction of the press," especially as one of the misprints is almost as funny as "M.A.'s" "cucumbers." The corrections are as follows—

393	1	2 from foot	compounding	confounding.
"	2	17	top	this is
"	2	39	"	although

"	1	14	"	cometh
"	1	25	"	gifts unto

Please let me take this opportunity to thank "A Jersey Christian Spiritualist" for his or her sympathetic letter. It is always a pleasure to meet such confirmation of one's thought—I remain, Sir, faithfully yours,

A. E. MAJOR.

Kensington, September 22nd, 1883.

[We insert this letter in justice to Mr. Major, and were it not for a lively remembrance that Qui s'excuse s'accuse we should almost feel tempted to write a word of explanation, especially as from the oft repeated announcement, "the Editor of 'LIGHT' is out of town," our friends might be apt to think we had been "on pleasure bent," and had neglected their interests. This is not so. The Editor has not been holiday making, but has been, if anything, more pressed with his business duties than ever, and on an average these last from ten to twelve hours a-day all the year round. Then come in the claims of "LIGHT" for attention; and when we explain that added to the almost insuperable difficulty of editing a weekly paper seventy miles from London, the Editor had been obliged to take up his quarters seven miles from the nearest post town, we hope for a little consideration. This, however, is no reason for bad work,—and it was bad,—but we are glad to think that the many errors of the issue for September 1st are exceptional. "The Editor of 'LIGHT' will soon be free to return to town," and we do not think correspondents will have cause to complain again.—Ed. of "LIGHT."]

JOHN RUSKIN ON CURIOSITY.—There is a mean curiosity, as of a child opening a forbidden door, or a servant prying into her master's business; and a noble curiosity, questioning, in the front of danger, the source of the great river beyond the sand, the place of the great continent beyond the sea; a nobler curiosity still, which questions of the source of the River of Life and of the space of the continent of Heaven, things which "the angels desire to look into."

THOUGHT-READING.—The following letter appears in Part 106 of Cassell's Family Magazine:—"Sir,—When I read your article on 'Thought-Reading' in the February number of your Magazine, I determined to get all my friends to try the experiments described therein. It may be interesting to your readers to know that I have met with singular success. I have found two or three young ladies who possess the faculty, when blindfolded, of being able to describe objects placed behind them upon which the attention of persons present is wholly concentrated, and I may add that this is accomplished without any contact whatever. Imagined objects are also described, historical scenes or pictures are rendered, and familiar quotations agreed to be thought of are sometimes successfully named. With contact, real or imaginary pains on the part of the thinker are felt by the subject. The experiments were commenced with contact, but are found to be more successful without. The 'willing' experiments are also performed without contact. No doubt there will be great individual variations, and a series of carefully recorded observations is being made of the experiments with the above subjects for scientific purposes, and if any of your correspondents will kindly communicate to me the results of their studies, or send them to Professor Barrett, Royal School of Science, Dublin, they will confer a real favour upon those who are endeavouring to elucidate the subject.—I am, yours faithfully, MALCOLM GUTHRIE, 2, Parkfield-road, Liverpool."

"AN INCIDENT" IN THE LIFE OF MR. HOME.

Some years ago I was at a séance of Mr. D. Home's at the house of the late Elizabeth, Lady Dunsany. There were only four or five persons—all Spiritualists—and the sitting was most harmonious. We had flowers given to us, and loving messages from dear ones "gone before," and alto gether it was a peaceful, charming evening. We all regretted when it came to an end between ten and eleven o'clock by the usual "Good night, God bless you," being given. Just as we were seated round the supper tray, a loud ring sounded from the door bell, and a servant came to say that two gentlemen were in the hall asking for Mr. Home, who immediately stood up and begged Lady Dunsany's permission to go down to them, when she most kindly said, "Pray bring them up; any friends of yours will be welcome," and he quickly returned, introducing Prince Murat and Lord Adare (now Lord Dunraven). They had called hoping to catch Mr. Home at the end of the séance. After some very agreeable chit-chat, Prince Murat asked Mr. Home whether he remembered the first evening he met him at the Tuileries, and how very ill he had behaved, going under the table and laying hold of his feet, and declaring that he would "find out his tricks." "Was I not a saucy little dog?" he said, to which Mr. Home laughingly agreed, and we were all much amused by the Prince's lively tale, which ended by his saying, turning to Mr. Home, "When you left the room the Emperor leant forward with his arms on the table and said, in the most impressive manner, 'Whoever says that Home is a charlatan is a liar.'" This we felt was information from the fountain head!

JOHN WESLEY AND SPIRITUALISM.—"Good Angels," a sermon of John Wesley's which has been reprinted many times, has again been issued in pamphlet form, by Mr. W. V. Terry, the editor of the Harbinger of Light. It is well adapted for circulation in Methodist circles. In this sermon John Wesley distinctly affirms his belief in the ministry of spirits, good and bad, giving the preponderance in power to the former, whom he assumes to be round about us constantly protecting us from evil and assisting us in all good works, especially in healing.

PEARLS GIVEN THROUGH MRS. A.

More than ten years ago I was staying with Dr. and Mrs. A., and one hot afternoon in July, we were in their large drawing-room, widely apart, Mrs. A. lying on a sofa, and Dr. A. and I in easy chairs. Suddenly I heard a rattling sound on my silk dress, and, at the same moment Mrs. A. called out "Something has fallen down into your lap." As I started up I saw several small pearls drop on the floor. I picked up four. Knocks then sounded for the alphabet on a small table, close to me, and I got the following message: "There were five pearls given to you, and you shall have the other," for which, however, we all searched in vain; but that night, as we all stood together, Dr. A. lighting our bedroom candles, we heard something fall on a small table some way behind us, and on looking found it to be the fifth pearl. All this was done in full light—that of the sun in the afternoon, and of brilliant lamps and candle-light at night. Comment seems needless.

ERRATUM.—At page 426, first column, line 16 from the bottom, for "realise" read "criticise."

"A NEW BASIS OF BELIEF."—The new issue of the superior edition of this work contains a fine Woodbury type portrait of the author.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.—We are requested to call attention to the meeting of Council, which will be held on Tuesday evening next, at 38, Great Russell-street, and to express the hope that the members will make a point of attending if possible.

WILLIAM DENTON.—This popular lecturer on Spiritualism and cognate subjects has completed his engagements in Australia, and left Thursday Island in July last for New Guinea, en route for America. His sojourn amongst the Victorian Spiritualists has been a most successful and useful one.

Kersey Graves, a well-known American Spiritualist, has passed onward. A calm and abiding faith in the Spiritual philosophy him stood in good stead during his transition. His last words were—"A wave of comfort passes over me. It is all right"—a fit ending to a useful and honourable earthly life.

A NEW "EXPOSER" AT THE ANTIPODES.—A Mr. C. E. Jones is posing as an exposé of Spiritualism, and has been trying hard both at Ballarat and Castlemaine to get up a debate, but the gauntlets he has flung about are not clean enough to be picked up by any respectable Spiritualist. We are advised that at Castlemaine no Spiritualist attended his lecture, but three prominent members of the body distributed a substantial corrective in the shape of a circular containing a list of several hundred eminent scientists, philosophers, statesmen, jurists, nobility, and literary men, who have accepted, after investigation, the facts or philosophy of Spiritualism. It is significant that the three most recent exposers (!) of Spiritualism—Washington Irving Bishop, Thomas Walker, and C. E. Jones, are men whose antecedents will not bear critical investigation.—Harbinger of Light.

MR. CHARLES BRIGHT ON SPIRITUALISM.—This gentleman is a popular lecturer amongst our friends at the Antipodes. Speaking in the Gaiety Theatre, Sydney, on "Why I am a Spiritualist," he said:—"To him the fact of continued existence was a scientific fact of the universe, and he conceived that it was well that every now and again he should make it known that he entertained such a belief—nay, more than a belief, he might say absolute knowledge. He was a Spiritualist, because the facts which came under his notice made him one; because it appeared to him reasonable likewise, and lastly, because the Philosophy of Spiritualism, in his judgment, was sublime and soul-satisfying. Briefly defining a Spiritualist, he went on to describe the circumstances which made him one; how fourteen years since he was deputed by the Argus to look into Spiritualism with the view of writing a series of articles on it, the presumption being that they would be antagonistic to its claims. His investigations, however, led him to a different conclusion, and compelled him to write in its favour. After relating several incidents in his experiences which compelled belief, he referred to the experiences of several eminent men who, going over the same ground, had come to similar conclusions, and concluded by shewing the tendency of Spiritualism to make manifest the good in all things."

SPIRITUALISM—IS IT OF DIVINE ORIGIN &amp; USE?

An Address delivered by Mrs. E. H. Britten, in the Grand Assembly Rooms, Leeds, Sunday, September 23rd, 1883.

(REPORTED BY W. GANTREY.)

There are doubtless many here who have heard that Spiritualism is of anything but Divine origin, and that it is all the work of tricksters; whilst many others will have heard that it is some new form of modern infidelity. There are still others who have been told that it is the latest work of the great enemy of mankind. All, at any rate, have heard of Spiritualism. The speaker has gone twice round the world and into many lands—savage and civilised, in some of which the mystic name had never before been heard. The latest saying of the clergy is, that Spiritualism is the work of the devil. They do not deny its facts. In Australasia, in France, in Italy, throughout the lands of the West, and also in your own land, your speaker has publicly and privately met many ministers of the Christian religion, who claimed to know that Spiritualism was true, but who said it was demoniacal, and therefore, what was the use of it! Now, friends, we speak to-night but briefly, as to whether Spiritualism is Divine in the popular sense of the word, meaning by that, not what you or some other individual may choose to call Divine, but that which those who are placed in the seat of power, and are authorised to teach you the way to Heaven call Divine. They tell you there is but one Divine revelation; but one Divine book; but one Divine path to Heaven: and that is the Bible. Sometimes they speak of Divine beauty, Divine uses, Divine truths, Divine actions, but then they are only using the popular term. We shall shew that Spiritualism is Divine in both senses.

Spiritualism in the Bible.

First, as to the Bible. Try to take Spiritualism out of it, and what do you leave behind? Nothing but the history of a barbarous people, with their murders, their pillages, their shortcomings, and their abundant wickednesses. Now restore Spiritualism, and you find the footprints of the Divine Father and His angels at every place. We shall give a few familiar illustrations, because we propose to shew that they are similar to what has been known in our own times. Abraham saw spirits; and conversed, ate, and drank with them. He called them "Lord God," but we can scarcely question Jesus when He said, that no man had seen God at any time. Jacob, in a dream, beheld a ladder on which angels ascended and descended—angels on every round. Have you ever asked your clergymen, when that ladder was drawn up? If that was sacred and Divine truth, then it is sacred and Divine to-day. Joseph was a diviner, and saw into the future. Balaam was a trance medium—for he had his eyes opened and spoke, he said, "as the Lord God commanded him." He said, "If Balaak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the commandment of the Lord, to do either good or bad of mine own mind; but what the Lord saith, that will I speak." Gideon, too, beheld angels, but did not believe in them. You are told that angels appeared with wings, with hallowed glory, and with all the radiant paraphernalia of Heaven; and yet poor Gideon did not believe but that they were men. He asked as a sign that the dew should fall upon a fleece of wool without falling also upon the ground. Still he did not believe, and asked for another test; and that was that the dew should fall upon the ground without falling upon the fleece. Not till that was done did he believe. Samuel was a seer, and represented a class which has been spoken of by Josephus, and also in the Talmud. There was a school of prophets and Samuel was one of them. As a child, he heard voices; and as a man, he was in the habit of putting lost strangers in their way, describing and recovering lost property, telling hidden things, and accepting pay for what he did. We are told that Saul, the son of Kish, went to seek his father's asses; and that failing to find them, the servant who attended him said that within the city there was a man of God—meaning Samuel. In the 9th verse of the same chapter, (Sam. ix.) the man of God is again spoken of, but as a seer and a prophet, shewing that man of God, seer, and prophet, were one. Then the servant said, "Let us go to this seer," thus shewing that it was the custom of the times. Samuel, after he had passed from the earth, re-appears as a spirit to the woman of Endor, who tells Saul that she "saw gods ascending out of the earth;" so it is obvious that spirits were sometimes called gods. Elisha's causing two bears to come out of the woods to tear to pieces forty and two children because they called him "bald-head," has been spoken of by the clergy as an allegory. Would it not be better if they would tell you where allegory ends and truth begins? Elijah declares that the power of God is upon him compelling him to describe the future of Israel; and Daniel interprets dreams. In the palace, we find not only the interpretation of dreams; but still another mode of spirit manifestation, in the shape of the mystic handwriting upon the wall. When we come to the New Testament, we find it is full of records of the power of angels; but it is not always recognised, for we find that at the baptism of Jesus, whilst some of them heard a voice, another said that it thundered. Another similar case is the conversion of Saul, where some, besides seeing the light, heard the voice; whilst others did not.

Bible Spiritualism was subject to conditions.

You say that this power of God was made manifest, incarnate in the flesh, and dwelt among men; and that as long as the Apostles were with that Divine Being, they could perform those mighty works. How was it that that Divine Being Himself could perform those works in one place, and could not in another? Jesus could not perform some of His works in one place, because the conditions were wanting; or as it was said, because of the hardness of the people's hearts. In the 9th chapter of Mark, we find that He rebuked the Apostles, because they could not cast a devil out of a child: and when they questioned Him as to why they could not do it, He did not say it was because they were not Divine, but answered: "This kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting." They failed, because the psychological conditions were wanting. These powers were not peculiar to Jesus alone, because He said, "That which I do, ye shall do likewise; and greater works shall ye do, because I go to My Father." In the last chapter of Mark, He said that these signs should follow those who believe in Him: they should cast out devils; speak with new tongues, take up serpents; if they drank any deadly thing it should not harm them; and if they laid their hands upon the sick, they would recover.

The Signs that Follow those that Believe.

Not more than three years ago, in a public journalistic debate, Bishop Moorhouse, of Melbourne, asked your speaker why the spirits did not do this thing and another, and she replied by asking the Bishop why the clergy could not give the signs enumerated in this chapter. He said no man in his sober senses would expect such things now, because the words only applied to the Apostles. If those words were only addressed to the Apostles, then all other words of Jesus were likewise addressed to them, and you have nothing to do with the Christian religion. The promise of these signs or tokens was addressed to the Apostles in the same manner as He addressed all His words to them: and if He addressed the world through them as He is said to have done, how is it that Christians of to-day do not give the signs? Now we find in the Acts of the Apostles that on the Day of Pentecost there was a mighty rushing wind, and there being many strangers there, the Apostles spoke in divers tongues; and the building in which they had met is said to have been shaken. The prison doors were opened for Peter, and many signs and wonders were done by one and another of the Apostles. The Apostle James expressly declares (James v. 15) that when there are any sick in the church the prayer of faith will bring a power that will restore them. Why is it not done?

Post-Apostolic Spiritualism.

Now we have been told by more than Bishop Moorhouse, by the bishop of a large city very near to you—Liverpool—we have been told by him that these signs and tokens ceased with the days of the Apostles. We say that this is false. They continued over 600 years or so, and men, some of whom have been canonised as saints, were known to have worked miracles. The historical accounts cannot all have been falsified, for St. Augustine apologises in his "Ecclesiastical History" for not recording more of these wonders, because they were so common. The writings of the Christian Fathers are full of accounts of miracles, many of which we might quote, but it would take up too much of your time. In the fourth century, a council was called which ruled that, henceforth, no laymen should be allowed to heal the sick. In that synod, healing by the laying on of hands was claimed to belong to the province of the Church. Why does the Church not exercise it? It is because she has grown rich and strong, and the successors of the poor fishermen have exchanged their humble calling, changing their poor garments for the mitres and splendid robes of bishops and archbishops. The Man of Sorrows conveyed His powers to the Churches that are dedicated to His name, and now in our day there is no admission for them. Thus it was that the power left the Churches: but though it left them, it never left the world; for, from the tenth century up to the seventeenth, we read in the history of witchcraft of thousands, of tens of thousands, who were put to death for the crime of witchcraft. If you read their trials, you will see that they were condemned and killed for giving those signs which the Master Himself had commended.

Spiritualism in the Middle Ages.

All down the ages, you will find from history, that supernaturalism or spirit-power never left the world; but was to be found in every country. It was found in the house of Martin Luther, in the strange fantastic sounds known as hauntings. The founder of the Reformation heard a voice warning him, while he was performing penance at Rome. History is full of manifestations of the signs promised by the Master. In the story of Samuel you have evidence to shew that men of God, seers, or prophets, were accustomed to put lost travellers in their way, and received presents for their work. We have reminded you of the promise made by the Master, that some of the works which He performed, others should perform likewise. We claim that spirits appeared under the Old Testament dispensation as men. We are told that the word angel signifies messenger. Peter's spirit was called his angel, when appearing to his companions; they could not at first believe it was him, but said, it was his angel. We are told by reverend gentlemen that in olden times people never communed with the dead. Did they not? Well, they did not, because there are no dead, and in that sense, what they say is quite true. If these gentlemen, who are the teachers of the people, but remembered the sublime word of God, they would know that God is not the God of the dead, because there are no dead. They should remember that what they call dead in Samuel, reappeared in Samuel the living spirit. They should remember that on the Mount of Transfiguration, Moses and Elias appeared as spirits. They should remember that in the closing of what they call the Divine Word, when the revealing spirit appeared to John, he would have worshipped him, had not the spirit forbidden him, and told him he was but one of the prophets and a fellow servant. We close this, the earlier part of our subject, and now come to the modern part.

Modern Spiritualism.

It is now half a century ago, since word was received in Great Britain that there was a new force discovered, which could move tables. Earlier than this, news had come from Germany which astounded the philosophers. Mesmer had succeeded in transferring force from one body to another. His followers carried their experiments still further, till at last their subjects passed beyond their control, and went to a new country to the pure white city, the beautiful sunlit plains, glorious gardens, magnificent woods, lovely seas, and lands where never a cloud obscured the sky. Then they would go to dark and doleful scenes. They saw, in these visions, people who said they had once lived upon this earth: spirit men, spirit women, and spirit children. Mourners heard stories and descriptions of those who had once lived upon this earth; mothers heard of their lost children, husbands again heard of their lost wives, but this was not all. Death was annihilated. It was shown that a new power had been evolved across the Atlantic, by which telegraphic signals could be conveyed from the spirit world to this. In New York, disturbances had taken place, kinds of hauntings, of which there are thousands of records in Great Britain. The Yankees, by applying the simple alphabet, discovered that these signals or signs would respond, and in that manner spell out the names of persons who had once existed upon the earth. From that the spirits began to communicate through the lips of the uneducated and unlearned; and sometimes, even through the lips of little unconscious children. The doctors and schoolmen began then to determine that they would explode and explain what they called the modern humbug. When they attempted to show that table turning could be assimilated by muscular action, the ignorant then produced hundreds of portraits of deceased people. Spirit music was then heard. Poor uninstructed children and people who had never acquired a scholastic knowledge, began to speak in strange tongues, and presently, they found that not only in the land of the West, but in Australasia, in India, in the remotest parts of South America, and from every part of the known world, tidings came that the spirits had come.

Spiritualism in Relation to the Negations of God and Immortality.

Throughout the great instructed land of Russia, not among the ignorant—the serfs—but amongst the better informed thinkers—the students, and university men, and women of high rank—secularism, under the name of Nihilism, is proclaiming that there is no God. The schools of philosophy in Germany are full of negations of God and immortality; and in France, in this their day of freedom, religion is laughed at, and looked upon as simply the fashion of the hour. Have you not heard the cry in America, and in England, that religion is declining? Religion among many of the cultivated is now little more than a name.

Why Spiritualism is Divine.

God help those who need the comfort of religion; the homeless, ragged wanderers, who are hungry and miserable. Religion is almost being blotted out, and amongst some of the highest and most learned, there is a total absence of religious faith, as is shewn in the reasonings of not a few of the best writers of the day. Do you ask us of what use Spiritualism is, and if it is Divine? Is it not Divine to know of God, to know how to do good, and to believe in immortality?

Because it proves the Continuity of Life.

First, Spiritualism proves the continuity of life. Perhaps you may not have experimented, and if so, Spiritualism like other things, will not afford you any royal road to knowledge; for the same words which were spoken of old, may be used now: "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." Do that, and then Spiritualism will bring to you the proof direct of continued existence. Even now, there is flowing from the medium's pen proofs of it, which have come from every country in the world; and her words are being corroborated by facts that are being testified to by more than twice ten thousand living witnesses—all proving that life after death is a fact. That is its first claim to Divine use.

Because it demonstrates the Existence of God.

It also brings us into the presence of the great, mysterious Being, whom we worship as God. Scientists, of all men, deny spirit, and therefore deny the very existence of God. Go to the spirit circle, and there you will find that the spirits are spelling out by raps the names of your fathers, mothers, or the friends you loved; or perhaps you are told of the last dying words of some dear friend, and the secret things which he or she alone has spoken in your ear. If you ask us how Spiritualism proves the existence of God, we answer that it proves the existence of spirit, and God is a Spirit. Do you not recognise that the engineers who fashioned your machines were spirits, and that these very walls were erected by spirits? Do you not know that all great works have been planned by spirits—spirits in the flesh, but spirits still? Then can you doubt that God the Great Weaver, who has spun the green flowery carpet of the fields, the Great Mechanic and Builder who has reared the architecture of the earth, and all the wonders of creation, is a Spirit? It was His power and philosophy which caused to be created the grand universe, with its endless systems of stars; and the spirits that communicate are witnesses for God. There is no Spiritualist who walks the city streets alone, who does not know that the air is thick with people belonging to the unseen world, who are ever about him. Here you get two great elements of religion which are of Divine nobility, and are a guide and anchor to the soul. Spiritualism gives you a spiritual God, and it brings to you the proofs of a future life.

Because it inculcates right doing and the resisting of temptation.

Moreover, the enfranchised Spiritualist knows no sects, creeds, nor denominations, but recognises all truth as being sublime. His entire spiritual capital is the good he may do, and the temptations he may resist. Tell that to the outcasts in your streets, your Ishmaelites, and the hand of violence will be withheld; tell them that self-denial will purify their souls, and fit them for happiness; and then, they will starve for the want of bread rather than steal. Tell it to the monarch who is perhaps miserable, even on a throne; tell it to all, and they will become the better for it. It is hard upon us, to expect us to remake society, which, after 1,800 years' experiment with the dominant religions, is still wicked and full of pride, falsehood, and wrong. You cannot expect Spiritualism in thirty years to undo the wrongs and errors which have been accumulating for eighteen centuries. Any who, by becoming a Spiritualist, realise the fact that they are making their own Heaven, cannot but become better men and women for the knowledge. Then is not that Divine which makes for righteousness, which strikes down the assassin's hand, and snatches the intoxicating drink from the drunkard's lips? These are a few of its uses, and this is why your speaker wanders the world; and, as long as life lasts, and power is given to her, she will proclaim the truth of Spiritualism, and that it is of Divine origin and use.

SPIRIT TEACHINGS.

SECOND SERIES.

This series of Spirit-Teachings, like the former, is made up of selections from a great mass which have been automatically written during a series of years. They are selected on no other principle than that of printing what has been valuable to the person for whom they were originally given, in so far as this can be done without trenching on what is merely of personal and private application. The latter consideration excludes a great mass of what would otherwise be interesting and valuable matter. The phraseology has been preserved, as far as possible, intact, names only being omitted. The series follows directly on the first, from which, indeed, it is separated only by the accident of its publication in another journal, and after some considerable interval of time. The publication is resumed in deference to many repeated requests.

No. XLII.

[On the following day I inquired if there were more to add:—]

May the blessing of the Supreme rest on you. We have but little more to say. You have complained that so little information is given of the spirit land. You say well; and the reasons are not far to seek. In most cases it is again the fault of your circles. We are aware that in very many cases those who frequent circles have no desire for information. They are more concerned with material facts. No doubt there are great exceptions. If you will read the communications made to you, you will discover much information on such matters. Only lately we gave you a clear statement on the subject, and you have yourself obtained a large amount of instruction, more or less accurately given, from the friends who communicate in other ways. Much, too, has been given in America, where a higher degree of enlightenment as to the value of information given through Trance is current. The desire for knowledge would bring the information. It is not given till it is sought. That is invariable. Hence the best informed spirits through the most transparent medium could give no information at all unless it were sought by the sitters. Nay more, a desire and correspondent rapport must exist mentally in all the sitters in order to produce the conditions most favourable for communicating truth. But usually no such desire exists in any preponderating degree in a circle. In private it may possibly do so, and doubtless many friends learn much thus; but the information so given is esoteric and does not come under your notice. In public the circle is usually more concerned with objective phenomena which they can see or hear, but which they no more understand than they would the truths which we are waiting to teach them. They would be touched, or would grasp a spirit hand, or would exchange idle words with a voice, or would seek for anything rather than such information as you desire us to give. They seek the evidence that comes home to them, though in what way it should prove to them any whit of truth we do not see. For aught they can tell the manifestations they seek may be the work of the very fiend, and to prove the reverse they would be compelled to have recourse to arguments drawn from spiritual rather than phenomenal sources.
